A surveyor on a railroad is, while being transported from his home to his place of work free of charge, a coemployee with the conductor on the train, so that he cannot hold the company liable for the conductor's negligence. Ross v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 5 Hun, 488, Affirmed, 74 N. Y. 617. The court says, if the servant of a railroad company divests himself of his character as a servant, and becomes a paying passenger on the cars of the railroad, he would doubtless require and possess all the rights of a passenger or a third person unconnected with the master, but the lower court in the Russell Case held that after the day's work was over the relation of master and servant ceased, and that having paid for his passage by his labor during the day the laborer was entitled to be treated as a passenger. Russell v. Hudson River R. Co. 5 Duer, 39.

If the contract provides that an employee shall be conveyed to his home on the train every night after his day's work is done, he cannot recover from the company for an injury caused during such trip by the negligence of the engineer of the train. Russell v. Hudson River R. Co. 17 N. Y. 134; Vick v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 85 N. Y. 267.

A car repairer while being carried free of charge between his home and his place of work daily according to his contract of service is not to be considered as a passenger but as an employee. Gilman v. Eastern R. Corp. 10 Allen, 233, 87 Am. Dec. 635.

A carpenter employed by the day to work on the line of the railroad company's road, and carried by its cars to the place of such work without paying fare, cannot maintain an action for injuries received while being so carried by the negligence of the employees of the company. Seaver v. Boston & M. Railroad, 14 Gray, 466.

A common laborer cannot recover for injuries received while riding on a gravel train to his place

To this the defendant company, plaintiff in error, answered by a general denial, and, further answering, respondent avers that, even if said deceased was injured through any fault, negligence, or want of care on the part of respondent, its officers, agents, or employees, or those for whom it was responsible (all of which is denied), yet, even in such case, plaintiff cannot recover, because said deceased, Paoli A. Smith, was careless and negligent in said premises, and by his fault and negligence contributed to the accident complained of, and the results; that just before the said accident, he, said Smith, negligently and without necessity left the car, and, while the train was in motion, went out on the platform between two cars,—a place which is dangerous, and where he had no right to be; and he, said Smith, was injured because he was on said platform, as aforesaid, and he would not have been injured had he remained in the car; and said Smith in other ways contributed, by his fault and negligence, to said accident and its results. Or, respondent avers, said accident and its results were caused by the fault and negligence of fellow servants of said P. A. Smith, engaged in a common employment. Respondent further avers that said Paoli A. Smith was not a passenger on said train, but was traveling on a pass, under which he assumes all risks of accident and damages to his person or property, whether caused by the negligence of the railway company, its agents or servants, or otherwise. Respondent further avers that said P. A. Smith assumed all risks of his employment; and fur-of work by the negligence of the persons in charge of the train. Gillshannon v. Stony Brook R. Corp. 10 Cush. 228. The court, says, if the plaintiff was by the contract of service to be carried by the defendant to the place of his labor, then the injury was received while engaged in the service for which he was employed, and so falls within the ordinary cases of servants sustaining an injury from the negligence of other servants. If the contract had not embraced this transportation, it leaves the case to stand as a permissive privilege granted to the plaintiff of which he availed himself to facilitate his labors and service, and is equally connected with it and the relation of master and servant, and therefore furnishes no ground for maintaining this action.

An employee riding from his home to his place of employment in a caboose car without paying fare according to the custom of the road, from which car all persons except employees are excluded, is not a passenger but only an employee. Kansas P. R. Co. v. Salmon, 11 Kan. 83.

If without any contract with the carrier an employee gets into one of its cars to be carried to work, the carrier is not liable for an injury to him, especially if he takes a dangerous position. Moss v. Johnson, 22 Ill. 633.

If the injury occurs when the employee is being carried according to contract from the place of service to his home, there can be no recovery. Tunney v. Midland R. Co. L. R. 1 C. P. 291, 12 Jur. N. S. 691.

In Ryan v. Cumberland Valley R. Co. 23 Pa. 384, where the injury occurred while plaintiff, a laborer engaged to load gravel on a car, was being conveyed to the place of work, the court says: "He was not a mere passenger on the defendant's cars, because his travel upon them was really an incident of a different relation, that of a servant, and this is the character in which we must regard him here."

ther shows that at the time of said accident, and for some time prior thereto, said P. A. Smith, as resident engineer aforesaid, had full charge and direct control and supervision of the bridges and buildings on said railroad in Louisiana, etc., including the trestle or bridge mentioned in the petition which was burned; and said P. A. Smith was superintendent of the bridges and buildings department, and responsible for the condition of said bridge last named, and for the inspection, guarding and watching the same; and it was his duty to decide on what bridges watchmen should be stationed, and he was aware of all the facts connected with the said bridge or trestle, and assumed all the risks of his employment.

There is really little dispute about the facts in the case, and, in the view taken of it, we need not dwell upon them. The main question is the relation of the deceased to the company at the time of the accident when he received the injury which resulted in his death. He was civil engineer of the appellant company, residing at Marshall, on the line of the railroad, and was traveling on duty for his company at the time of the accident. The fact that he was traveling on the train and in a sleeping car did not make him any less the engineer of the company, charged with the duties and responsibilities of his position. It was doubtless contemplated in his contract of employment that he would be required, in the discharge of his duties, frequently to pass over the line of the railroad. Passengers ordinarily, at least, pay fare for their transportation, but the deceased was at the time traveling upon a pass, such as was usual for employees to travel on over the line of the road, which it may be noted had in it an exemption from liability for injuries to person or property; and the conductor, knowing, as he testifies, the deceased, and knowing his relation to the road, did not call for and did not see the pass. Witness Grant, vice president, general manager, and chief engineer of the railroad company, says: He (the deceased) was, first, assistant civil engineer; after that, resident engineer. The duties of his position were to "look after the buildings and maintenance of bridges, water tanks, and trestles of the railroad company." An employee is one whose time and skill are occupied in the business of his employer, and we think that the deceased was an employee of the appellant company, and not a passenger on the train of the company at the time of the injury which resulted in his death.

In the case of Texas & P. R. Co. v. Minnick, decided by this court, and reported in 10 C. C. A. 1, 61 Fed. Rep. 635, a case growing out of the same accident as this case, which resulted there in the death of the locomotive engineer, this court held: "An employee assumes the risks ordinarily incidental to his employer's business, and to the employer's known manner of having it performed, where there is no unknown defect of machinery or other unknown hazards,"—citing authority. The court continues: "He [Minnick] knew, or with the exercise of the ordinary care incumbent on him in his employment would have

He was no more a passenger than is the coachman, or wagoner, or carter, who is in the employment of another. He was simply a servant, with the privilege of riding, as part of his business, in the gravel train, which was one of the instruments of his work."

In some of the cases in which a tendency is shown to recognize a relation different than that of employer and employee, there are circumstances which may perhaps suffice to take the case out of the general rule and so harmonize the decisions. But this is not true in all of the cases.

In Pool v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 53 Wis. 657, 56 Wis. 227, a person employed as a detective on the road was directed to proceed from his home to another place on the road, and the company provided a hand-car to take him. The court held that, even though the relation of carrier and passenger did not exist, there was a legal duty to have the car safe to complete the journey.

A bridge carpenter who, in consideration of a reduced price per day, is carried to and from his work in the cars of the employer, and whose duties have nothing to do with the running of the train, is, while so traveling, a passenger and not an employee. O'Donnell v. Allegheny Valley R. Co. 50 Pa. 239, 98 Am. Dec. 336.

Fitzpatrick v. New Albany & S. R. Co. 7 Ind. 436, was decided on the doctrine that the employees were not fellow servants within the rule that the master is not liable to one for the negligence of the other, but the court takes occasion to say that the plaintiff, who was riding to his place of work at a gravel bed, was not a mere passenger; his travel upon the cars was an incident to the business in which he was employed, but under an agreement with defendant that he was to be regularly conveyed to and from his work. This includes an implied engagement that the company would convey him as safely and securely as if he really had been a passenger in the ordinary sense of the term.

An employee of a railroad company riding to his home on a free pass after the usual services of his employment are over for the day is in fact a stranger to the company and entitled to recover for injuries caused by a negligent collision. State, Abell, v. Western Maryland R. Co. 63 Md. 433, 19 Rep. 494.

In case of a person using a bridge by permission of a pass given him by his employer for use in going to and returning from work, the court held that he was a passenger over the bridge, and that the owner was liable to him for defects in the bridge which caused injury to him, although the owner sustained the relation to him of employer. Pembroke v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 32 Mo. App. 61.

A bridge carpenter who is directed to go to a certain place and assist in loading timbers is, while traveling to such place, a passenger, and the carrier will be responsible to him as such for injuries caused by its negligence. Gillenwater v. Madison & I. R. Co. 5 Ind. 399, 61 Am. Dec. 101.

A section man of a street-car company, who by direction of his foreman takes a place upon one of its trains to be carried to his home, is not a mere trespasser, but for the purpose of determining the liability of the company for injuring him must be regarded as rightfully upon the train. Denver & B. P. Rapid-Transit Co. v. Dwyer, 20 Colo. 132.

A civil engineer in the employment of a railroad company, who when ordered to do so rides on a train over a new track the laying of which he is superintending, does not assume risks resulting from negligence on the part of the company's servants in failing to keep the roadbed and track in good condition after it is laid, and in running the train at too great a speed, and he may recover from the company for injuries caused by such negligence. Meloy v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 77 Iowa, known, and must therefore be presumed to have known, the customary daily watch that was kept on the track and bridges, and that there was no track walker kept on that part of the track, or watchman kept at this bridge. He knew and understood the features and workings of the engines, and the character and extent of the watch that was kept on this bridge. He therefore, according to the settled rule just given, assumed the risk of being injured by the use of such machinery on the track and bridges thus watched."

This rule, applied in that case, seems to be equally applicable in the case now before the court, and finds support in many decided cases both in Federal and state courts. In Northern P. R. Co. v. Herbert, 116 U. S. 642, 29 L. ed. 755, the court says: "The general doctrine as to the exemption of an employer from liability for injuries to a servant caused by the negligence of a fellow servant in a common employment, is well settled. When several persons are thus employed there is necessarily incident to the service of each the risk that the others may fail in that care and vigilance which are essential to his safety. In undertaking the service he assumes that risk, and, if he should suffer, he cannot recover from his employer. He is supposed to have taken it into consideration when he arranged for his compensation. As we said on a former occasion: 'He cannot, in reason, complain if he suffers from a risk which he has voluntarily assumed, and for the assumption of which he is paid,'"—citing Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Ross, 112 U. S. 877-883, 28 L. ed. 787-789.

There is another suggestion which seems proper to be considered in this connection. Deceased, as we hold, was an employee of the appellant company, and the grade and character of his employment may properly have some influence on the question under consideration. He was an official of his company, occupying a position of high responsibility in connection with the operation of the railroad, and was particularly charged with the care and maintenance of the bridges upon the line of the railroad. If there was negligence in the watch that was kept at this burned bridge, and if the bridge was of such magnitude and character as, in the judgment of prudent and experienced railroad men, required more than the daily watch which was kept, then the inference would be no more than fair that he and his company were at fault in the matter of the watch which should have been, but was not, maintained at that bridge at the time of the accident; and that for that reason neither he, if he had survived, nor his representatives, can recover under the admitted facts of the case. It is claimed that the evidence tending to show negligence in the watch of the bridge in question and the alleged defective character of the appliance used upon defendant's trains to prevent escape of sparks and fire from the locomotive was proper matter to be left to the jury, and from which the jury might infer 743, 4 L. R. A. 287. In that case the court says the plaintiff was not a passenger within the ordinary meaning of that term, nor was he a trespasser. He was rightfully on the train.

Person riding for purposes of his own.

If the employee is riding on a private errand of his own, and not in connection with the business of the railroad, although he is permitted by the conductor to ride free, he will not occupy the position of an employee but that of a passenger in respect to the right to recover for negligent injuries. Washburn v. Nashville & C. R. Co. 3 Head, 638, 75 Am. Dec. 784.

A grader who is riding on a gravel train from the camp to the place of work to get his coat which he left there when through work for the day is not a trespasser on the train, but is one to whom the company is responsible for defects in the tracks. Rosenbaum v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. 38 Minn. 173.

An employee having a monthly ticket given him which is good for more rides than he is required to take in attending to the business of the company, with the express privilege of using the others for his own purposes, is not, when traveling for purposes of his own, an employee, but is a passenger entitled as such to hold the company liable for injuries caused by the negligence of its employees. Doyle v. Fitchburg R. Co. 162 Mass. 66, 25 L. R. A. 157. The court says it is clear that a person may at one time be an employee when passing over a railroad and at another time in passing over the same road be a passenger, though continuing all the while in a popular sense in the employment of the company.

That a person is an employee of the road and is permitted to ride without paying fare will not preclude a recovery from the company for negligent injuries, if, at the time he was injured, he was traveling upon purposes of his own and had nothing to do with the business of the company. Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Muhling, 30 Ill. 2, 81 Am. Dec. 336.

But in Higgins v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 36 Mo. 418, it was held that a person who is still in the employ of the company, although he had been off duty for a few days, and who boarded a train to go on a private errand of his own, but who took a place in the baggage car as an employee and was recognized as such and did not claim the rights of a passenger, was not a passenger within a statute regulating the duty of carriers to passengers.

So, it has been held that a former employee of a railroad riding on a freight train by permission of the conductor without paying fare while looking for work is not entitled to require the care from the company which it is required to give passengers. Powers v. Boston & M. R. Co. 153 Mass. 188.

So, a person is an employee and not a passenger who is running to get on to a train in obedience to the orders of his foreman, which is to convey him to the place where the men are paid off in accordance with the monthly custom of the road. O'Brien v. Boston & A. R. Co. 138 Mass. 387, 52 Am. Rep. 273.

Employees who borrow a car and engine to attend a meeting for purposes of their own do not sustain the relation of passengers to the railroad company so as to make it liable for injuries received during the trip. Davis v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 45 Fed. Rep. 543; Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. v. Bryant, 65 Fed. Rep. 909.

The mere fact that the conductor of the train receives and treats the employee as a passenger will not make him such if he was in fact acting in the capacity of a servant at the time. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Scott, 64 Tex. 549.

An employee whose contract includes transportation to and from work is entitled to retain a seat which he is occupying in the car to which he has been assigned, even as against a passenger who has paid for his passage. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. v. Burns, 51 N. J. L. 340.

H. P. F.

negligence on the part of the railroad company. That would be of force if the case turned upon the question of negligence as shown or not shown by the proof. This evidence, however, with all the inferences which the jury could fairly draw from it, leaves us in doubt, at least, if it was sufficient to justify the verdict for the plaintiffs; but, however that might be held, the general charge for the defendant should have been given in the court below, and the judgment below is reversed, and the cause remanded for proceedings in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion.

Toulmin, District Judge, dissenting:

I concur with the court in the conclusion that this cause should be reversed and remanded, but I do not concur in the opinion that the court below erred in not giving the peremptory charge for the defendant. I think there was sufficient evidence as to negligence vel non on the part of the defendant, and as to contributory negligence on the part of deceased, to require the case to be sent to the jury. But I think that the court erred in giving the charges noticed in the 4th and 5th assignments of error. These charges are as follows: "While it is true that the employee assumes risks incident to the service, the employer contracts with him not to expose him to other and greater risks than those necessarily incident to the service in which he is engaged;" and "that it was the duty of the defendant to furnish adequate material and resources for the work, and that a part of this duty was, when the plaintiff's husband was traveling upon the cars of the defendant, engaged in its service, to furnish him with safe cars and a safe track." Those charges were erroneous, as applicable to the case, and were calculated to mislead the jury. While they recognize the relation of employer and employee as existing between the company and the deceased, they declare a rule too strict and arbitrary in such case. The first charge, in effect, asserts that the employee assumes only such risks as are unavoidable, and that the employer contracts not to expose him to greater risks than those unavoidably incident to the particular service. The correct rule, as I understand it, is that the employee assumes all ordinary risks incident to the service in which he is engaged, and that the employer contracts with him not to expose him to greater risks than those ordinarily incident to such service. Minnick Case, 6 C. C. A. 387, 57 Fed. Rep. 362, 13 U. S. App. 520; Hough Case, 100 U. S. 213, 25 L. ed. 612; Ross Case, 112 U. S. 382, 28 L. ed. 789; Baugh Case, 149 U. S. 331, 37 L. ed. 779. The second charge referred to is, in effect, that the company was bound to furnish the deceased, its employee, with cars and track absolutely safe. The rule is that the company is not an insurer or guarantor, but that it is required to take reasonable care and precaution to provide reasonably and adequately safe cars and track for the use of its employees. Baugh Case, 149 U. S. 386, 387, 37 L. ed. 780, 781.

For the reasons stated, the judgment should be reversed, and cause remanded.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

Mary Jane NELSON, Appt.,

v.

John R. DAVIDSON.

(160 Ill. 254.)

- Possession for seven years by one claiming under a deed purporting to convey the interest of a remainderman, and sufficient to constitute color of title, coupled with payment of taxes for the same period, will bar the estate in remainder, notwithstanding the existence of the outstanding life estate, where the remainderman is under no disability and could have paid the taxes.
- A deed purporting on its face to convey the title of land to the grantee is sufficient to constitute claim and color of title in the grantee, although the title, when traced back to its source, is not apparently legal and valid.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Marshall County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover possession of certain real estate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Miss Effie Henderson, for appellant:

John Brown had curtesy in this land. The act of partition does not create a new title or give a new possession.

Kernan v. Baham, 45 La. Ann. 799; 2 Black, Judgm. § 660; Christy v. Spring Valley Waterworks, 68 Cal. 73; Fleenor v. Driskill, 97 Ind. 27.

A judgment in partition must be read with reference to the pleadings. All must be taken together to interpret the judgment or decree.

Christy v. Spring Valley Waterworks, supra; Covas v. Bertoulain, 44 La. Ann. 683; Fleenor v. Driskill, supra; Loring v. Groomer, 110 Mo. 632; Gage v. Goudy, 141 Ill. 215.

This decree was a substantial compliance with the statute, setting off John Brown's curtesy to him.

Knapp v. Gass, 68 Ill. 495.

John Brown's deed did not give title to Mrs. Nelson's fee in reversion.

1. John Brown was not her guardian. The letters of guardianship were void for want of jurisdiction. Such may be impeached in any collateral proceeding. The appointment must be made in the county where the ward resides.

NOTE.—For adverse possession against remaindermen and owners of future estates, see note to Gindrat v. Western R. of Alabama (Ala.) 19 L. R. A. 839.

9 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 94, 95; Ill. Rev. Stat. chap. 64, § 2.

2. The proceedings for sale were void for want of jurisdiction. Application must be made in the county where the ward resides.

Loyd v. Malone, 28 Ill. 42, 74 Am. Dec. 179; Spellman v. Dowse, 79 Ill. 66.

3. This sale and "deed" were void for want of approval or confirmation. This attempted sale was never in fact made—never completed. This deed itself shows the cause continued, and it shows no report nor investment as ordered, and no return and approval of sale nor confirmation of deed, as necessary by statute, in order to pass title to the ward's interest.

Ill. Rev. Stat. chap. 64, § 83.

No title passes till sale is approved.

Curtenius*, Id. 427; Young v. Dowling, Id. 482; Miller v. McMannis, 104 Ill. 427; Cooter v. Dearborn, 115 Ill. 509.

John Brown's deed did not give color of title to Mrs. Nelson's interest. It did not purport to pass her interest, not being signed by the grantor, i. e., the sale not being completed by the court, the only grantor of her interest.

Tooley v. Kane, Smedes & M. Ch. 522.

This court has twice held a void guardian's deed not to be color of title, made in good faith.

Rawlings v. Bailey, 15 Ill. 179; Cooter v. Dearborn, supra.

At the best a guardian's deed is a quitclaim made by the court, on behalf of the ward, of the ward's present interest.

Hardin v. Gouveneur, 69 Ill. 144; Bowman v. Wettig, 39 Ill. 416.

An official deed having no foundation for lack of jurisdiction is a nullity.

As no word or act of John Brown could by any legal possibility create a hostile and adverse possession to Mary Jane, the possession given by him to his grantees, or those under them, was not, and could not be, adverse to her estate in reversion.

McCorry v. King, 3 Humph. 278.

The statute will not run, even when the possession is both technically and in fact adverse,—if such a thing can be adverse in a legal sense,—unless there is a right of possession on the other side.

At common law a conveyance in fee by the tenant for life forfeited the life estate, and those having the remainder or reversion became at once entitled to the entire estate. But this depended upon feudal principles that have no existence here, and hence a conveyance in fee by one having a less estate, not affecting those seized of ulterior interests in the land, is harmless and will operate simply to convey such interest in the land as the grantor in fact has.

Bailey, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action of ejectment brought by Mary J. Nelson against Adam Davidson to recover lot 3, of the N. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of sec. 26, T. 12, N. of R. 8, E. of the 4th principal meridian, of Marshall county. The defendant pleaded not guilty, and the case being submitted to the court for trial without a jury, the court found the defendant not guilty and rendered judgment against the plaintiff for costs. From that judgment the plaintiff has appealed to this court.

The 80-acre tract of land of which lot 3 forms a part, was, with other lands, entered and purchased from the United States by Joseph Thompson, but before a patent was issued to him he died, leaving, among other heirs at law, Margaret Thompson, the mother of Mary J. Nelson, the plaintiff in this case. In a partition proceeding subsequently had, the 80-acre tract, with other lands, was partitioned and set off in severalty to Margaret Thompson (then Margaret Brown), she having intermarried with John Brown. After becoming seised of this tract as heir of Joseph Thompson, and about the year 1845, Margaret Brown died, leaving surviving her husband, John Brown, and Mary J. Nelson, her only child and heir at law. It seems that the parties then resided in Tazewell county, and the plaintiff being a minor, the county court of Tazewell county appointed John Brown her guardian. While they were residing in that county, in the year 1852, John Brown, as guardian for Mary J. Nelson, filed a petition in the circuit court of Marshall county, praying for an order and decree of that court authorizing and directing him to make sale of the title and interest of Mary J. Nelson in all of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of sec. 26, T. 12, etc., and in that proceeding a guardian ad litem was appointed for the minor, and the cause was referred to a master in chancery, and on the final hearing a decree was entered authorizing and directing the sale of the premises described in the petition, in pursuance of the prayer thereof. This order or decree was entered at the October term of 1852, and on the 25th day of November following, John Brown, as the guardian of Mary J. Nelson, conveyed to Thomas Keller and Justin L. Miner the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of sec. 26, in T. 12, above mentioned. This deed recited the filing of the petition by John Brown, as guardian for Mary J. Nelson, for the sale of the premises described; also the order or decree of the court authorizing and directing him to sell the premises as such guardian; the advertising of the premises for sale by posting written notices in three of the most public places, etc., for twenty days prior to the sale, and that Keller and Miner were the highest bidders; that they bid \$300 for the tract, and that it was thereupon struck off to them. The deed was duly acknowledged by John Brown, as guardian for Mary J. Nelson, and recorded December 25, 1852. By a deed dated November 1, 1854, Thomas Keller and wife conveyed to Justin L. Miner the N. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the quarter section above described, and by warranty deed dated February 27, 1867, Justin L. Miner conveyed the same tract to Catharine Mannock. Subsequently Catharine Mannock, who through divorce proceedings had resumed the name of Miner, her first husband's name, died seised of the 80-acre tract above mentioned, and in partition proceedings instituted by her heirs at the January term, 1879, of the circuit court of Marshall county, the 80-acre tract was divided into lots 1, 2, and 3—lot 1 being partitioned and set off to Justin L. Miner and Minnie Hull, lot 2 to Catharine Beebe, and lot 3 to Sophronia Miner, Catharine Miner, and Margaret Miner. By a quitclaim deed dated January 30, 1882, Carrie S. Wayne, who is shown by the evidence to be the same person to whom lot 3 was partitioned under the name of Catharine Miner, and G. W. Wayne, her husband; Maggie Sampson, shown by the evidence to be the same person to whom lot 3 was set off under the name of Margaret M. Miner, and Alfred Sampson, her husband; and Mary C. Sampson, being shown by the evidence to be the same person to whom lot 3 was partitioned under the name of Sophronia Miner, and Charles C. Sampson, her husband, conveyed lot 3 to Adam Davidson, the defendant. The evidence shows that Adam Davidson went into possession of lot 3 immediately after the execution of the deed thereof to him, and that he continued in the possession of the premises and claimed to own them under that deed up to April 26, 1893, the date of the commencement of this suit,—being over seven years,—and that during all that time he paid the taxes assessed against the lot. It seems to be conceded that John Brown, upon the death of his wife, in 1845, became tenant for life of the land in question by curtesy consummate. John Brown died November 21, 1892.

It is claimed by the plaintiff that the proceedings in the circuit court of Marshall county by the guardian of Mary J. Nelson, and the deed executed by her guardian in pursuance of the decree rendered in those proceedings, were void for the reason, first, that the proceedings were not in the county where the ward resided; and second, because there was no approval or confirmation of the deed. On the part of the defendant it is claimed that, even if that be so, the deed from Carrie S. Wayne and others to the defendant constituted claim and color of title made in good faith, and that by reason of seven years' possession and payment of taxes the defendant, under the provisions of § 6 of the statute of limitations, acquired a title to the land paramount to that of the plaintiff. The questions raised by this latter contention constitute the only matters which it will be necessary for us to consider in this case.

The position assumed by the plaintiff is that, as John Brown was entitled to a life estate in the land as tenant by the curtesy, the statute of limitations could commence to run as against her title only upon the death of the life tenant.

It should be noticed that even if the guardian's deed executed by John Brown is to be regarded as void for the reasons above stated, the chain of conveyances shown by the evidence is sufficient to establish the fact that the defendant entered into and holds possession of the land, claiming to be seised of the title formerly vested in the plaintiff. His title and possession were not in privity with the life tenant, but claiming, as he did, through the guardian's deed and mense conveyances, the title which he claims is that of the tenant in remainder herself. The question presented then is, whether possession by the defendant adverse to the tenant in remainder, for seven years, coupled with the payment of taxes for that period, is sufficient to bar the estate in remainder, notwithstanding the existence of an outstanding estate for life.

The case would seem to fall within the rule laid down in Enos v. Buckley, 94 Ill. 458. That was a suit in ejectment brought by Agnes D. Enos and Zimri Enos, her husband, against Buckley, to recover lands described in the declaration. The defendant's title was, first, a tax deed, which, by reason of a defect in its description of the land conveyed, was void for uncertainty; and second, a deed from the grantee in the tax deed, with proper description, to one Bracken, the latter being set up as color of title. It appeared that possession was taken and held by Bracken under the latter deed for seven years. This was held to establish a good title in Bracken, and the defendant, who deraigned title from Bracken, was held to have established a good title in himself. It appeared in that case that the title to the lands then in controversy was vested in Mrs. Enos prior to 1846, when she married Zimri Enos, and that the husband thereby became seised of a life estate in the premises, and, consequently, that the wife had only an estate in remainder, and it was urged that the statute of limitations could not run against Mrs. Enos because she had no immediate right of action for a possession of the land. The court, after discussing the case of Castner v. Walrod, 83 Ill. 171, 25 Am. Rep. 369, and distinguishing it from the case then under consideration, held that the estate in remainder of the wife, as well as the possessory life estate of the husband, was barred. In reaching that conclusion the court said (p. 463): "The present case involves a different section,—§ 6, of seven years' payment of taxes with color of title and possession. To prevent the acquirement of the bar under this last section it was only necessary to pay the taxes. The outstanding estate in the husband here formed no impediment to the payment of taxes any time after the act of 1861. The taxes should have been kept paid, not on any one's particular interest in the land, but on the whole land. As between the owner of the life estate and the reversioner, it is undoubtedly the duty of the former to pay the taxes; but the statute requires the payment of the taxes on the entire interest in the land, no matter how it may be divided and owned, and if they be not kept paid the whole estate in the land may become barred, as against the owners, under the statute. If, by reason of the husband's estate in the land, the wife might not have been able to derive from it the means to pay the taxes, she might otherwise, under and in consequence of the married woman's act of 1861, have become possessed of such means and which she would not except for that act.

It will be noticed that in the present case the owner of the estate in remainder was laboring under no disability, and no question can arise as to her ability to acquire the means to pay the tax on the land, and thus interrupt the running of the statute of limitations. The rule laid down in Enos v. Buckley, supra, would therefore seem to apply, and under it her title must be held to be barred.

In the present case the deed to the defendant was offered in evidence, not only as tending to prove title, but as color of title. There can be no doubt that it was sufficient to show color of title. It purported on its face to convey the title of the land to the defendant, and that was sufficient to make it constitute claim and color of title. An instrument of writing, to be effectual as color of title, must purport on its face to convey the title. It must apparently transfer title to the grantee. Not that the title, when traced back to its source, should prove to be an apparently legal and valid title, but the instrument under which the claimant holds and upon which he relies must profess to convey title to the grantee. Dickenson v. Breeden, 30 Ill. 279; Halloway v. Clark, 27 Ill. 484; Woodward v. Blanchard, 16 Ill. 433; Fagan v. Rosier, 68 Ill. 84; Dawley v. Van Court, 21 Ill. 460; Watts v. Parker, 27 Ill. 224; Hinkley v. Green, 52 Ill. 223. Where the deed purports, on its face, to convey title, it will be sufficient to show claim and color of title made in good faith unless bad faith is expressly shown,—and there is nothing in this case tending to charge defendant with bad faith or fraud on his part in relation to the claim and color of title set up.

But it is claimed that the rule laid down in Enos v. Buckley, supra, is inconsistent with the doctrine held in other and more recent cases. We have examined all the decisions having any bearing on the question to which our attention has been called, and find that all are clearly distinguishable from Enos v. Buckley. In Mettler v. Miller, 129 Ill. 630, a life tenant conveyed to a third person by a deed purporting to pass an absolute estate, and it was held that possession by the tenant for life cannot be adverse to the remainderman or reversioner, and that the possession of his grantee could not, during the continuance of the life estate, be adverse to the remainderman or reversioner, so as to set the statute of limitations running against the latter. In that case Enos v. Buckley and other similar cases were expressly referred to and held to be not in point. In the present case the defendant did not hold under or in privity with the life tenant, but adversely to the tenant in remainder. In Miller v. Pence, 132 Ill. 149, it was held that one entering into the possession of land under color of title acquired in good faith, by means of a tax deed, and continuing such possession for seven years, paying all taxes legally assessed thereon, will establish a good title to the land as against the prior owner resting under no disability, but not as against a merely inchoate right of dower. This was upon the principle that, the right of dower being only inchoate during the lifetime of the husband, the wife is under no duty to pay taxes on the land, or any part of it, for the protection of her inchoate right. In Rohn v. Harrie, 130 Ill. 525, the possession which was sought to be set up by way of limitation was taken and held under a conveyance from the life tenant, and it was held that the title of the reversioner was not barred.

Some other cases are referred to, but in none of them do we find a state of facts similar to those appearing in Enos v. Buckley, supra, or to the facts appearing here. We are disposed to hold, therefore, that the case must be governed by the rule established in Enos v. Buckley, and under the doctrine of that case it must be held that the defendant had acquired title by limitation, as against the plaintiff, prior to the commencement of this suit.

The judgment of the Circuit Court will therefore be affirmed.

1. A school district cannot, if it can recover at all, recover from another district which has collected taxes upon lands within the former, through a mistake of the clerk as to the location of the lands, a greater sum than it would have collected had there been no mistake.
2. A school district cannot recover from another district which has collected taxes upon lands within the former, through a mistake of the clerk as to the location of the lands, any of the taxes so collected, although the rate per cent of the tax as extended in the former was thereby made greater than it otherwise would have been, where the full amount of the levy made by its board of education was collected, as the district does not become a trustee for one taxpayer of an excessive amount collected from another.
3. Taxpayers in one school district, who voluntarily pay a tax for another district levied by mistake upon their lands, cannot recover back the amount paid, where the books were kept open for inspection by them, and the means of knowledge existed to learn and know all the facts, although they supposed that they were paying the tax of the district in which their lands were situated.

APPPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First Department, affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Cook County in favor of defendants in an action to recover money erroneously assessed and collected as taxes by defendant upon territory belonging to plaintiffs. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Taxes for various municipal purposes must be levied upon the property lying within the boundaries of the various municipal subdivisions of the state.

A payment can only be considered voluntary where the party pays with full knowledge of all the facts.

Falls v. Cairo, 58 Ill. 403; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. p. 24, ¶ 88.

On petition for rehearing.

There was nothing in the fact that the school tax was levied on their land to cause taxpayers to look for mistakes of the officers, for, as is averred in the bill, their land had been taxed for school purposes for several years prior, and they knew that it was liable to a school tax for that year.

They had a right to rely upon the presumption of law that the tax is just; that all the officers who have had any official connection with it have properly discharged their duties with respect to it.

The fact that the school taxes here alleged to be illegal were paid at one time with the state, county, and other taxes, as to which there could be no defense, does not render the payment compulsory. In such case the illegal tax would vitiate the whole sale, and a deed issued thereon would be void.

Phillips, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Five residents and taxpayers of school district No. 2, township 39 north, range 13 east, in Cook county, Illinois, with the board of education of that district, exhibited their bill in the circuit court of Cook county in behalf of themselves and all other taxpayers of that district, making defendants the board of education of district No. 1 of the same township and the treasurer of the latter township. The facts alleged in the bill, briefly stated, are, that by mistake of the county clerk of Cook county certain described real estate in fact located in district No. 2 was entered upon the collector's book of 1890 as lying and being in district No. 1, where the same was taxed, and school taxes to the amount of $2,195.90 were collected and paid over to the treasurer of the latter district, and paid out on orders of that district. The taxpayers who owned the above land had no knowledge of the mistake so made by the county clerk, and, knowing that their land was liable to taxation for school purposes in school district No. 2, paid their tax when called upon by the collector, supposing that they were paying school tax for said district No. 2, and did not discover or know of the mistake until there had been collected by the collector all the tax on said land amounting to the sum of $2,195.90, and paid over to the treasurer to the credit of said school district No. 1. As soon as the error was discovered, demand was made upon the board of education of said school district No. 1 for a return of money so wrongfully received by it, which demand it refused to comply with.

The defendants filed general demurrers to the amended bill of complaint, which demurrers the court sustained, and entered an order dismissing the bill and amended bill for want of equity. On appeal to the appellate court for the first district the decree was affirmed, and from the judgment of affirmance this appeal is prosecuted.

By the provisions of the act in relation to schools it became the duty of the proper officers of the district to levy a tax upon the property in the district and certify the same to the clerk, whose duty it was to compute and extend the tax on the taxable property of each person in the district. Had no mistake been made by the clerk the tax on the property in school district No. 2 would have been at the rate of about 1.88 per cent, as appears by the averments of the bill, but the rate extended by reason of such mistake was slightly more than 1.99 per cent, and the amount levied on the property in district No. 1, as extended, was at the rate of about 3.29 per cent. The actual amount extended on the books, and thus collected by the treasurer of district No. 1 on property belonging to district No. 2, was about $2,195.90, whilst if the tax as assessed in district No. 2 had been extended on that property there would have been extended and collected for district No. 2 about the sum of $1,255. The sum actually collected from the owners of the property by reason of the mistake of the clerk was about $940 more than would have been collected had no such mistake been made. The bill seeks to recover the amount actually collected by the treasurer of district No. 1 on the property belonging to district No. 2, included in No. 1 by the mistake of the clerk.

Even conceding a right of recovery, under no circumstances could a right exist in district No. 2 to collect a greater sum than it would have collected had there been no mistake by the clerk. The full amount of the levy made by the board of education of district No. 2 was computed, extended, and collected on the property in the district other than that described on the collector's books as in district No. 1. No part of the levy as made by the district is unpaid. No right exists to recover more than the amount levied, and to hold the bill sufficient would authorize a recovery of a greater amount by indirection. District No. 2, under the averments of this bill, shows no right of recovery. Whilst the mistake of the clerk caused the rate per cent of tax as computed, and extended on property in district No. 2, to be greater than it would otherwise have been, yet the relation of one taxpayer to another is not such as would authorize one to recover it from another because of a mistake in assessment by either omission of property from the collector's books by mistake, or by mistake in assessment or false or fraudulent valuation. The relation of the taxpayer is to the municipality, and as to each other a relation exists only by or through the municipality. The duties of the municipality are determined by law, and it may be required to discharge those duties, and it does not become a trustee for one taxpayer of the money collected from another.

The tax levied by district No. 1, as extended on lands belonging to district No. 2, was an illegal and void tax. That tax was paid by the owners of the property so illegally assessed, voluntarily. The books were open to inspection by the taxpayers, and the means of knowledge existed to learn and know all the facts. Money paid voluntarily by one with knowledge or means of knowledge of all the facts cannot be recovered back. Elaton v. Chicago, 40 Ill. 514, 89 Am. Dec. 361; Lyons v. Cook, 9 Ill. App. 543. To recover from a municipality taxes illegally collected and paid over, the tax must have been illegal and void, paid under compulsion, or, what would be equivalent thereto, received to the use of the municipality from the collecting officer. Elaton v. Chicago, supra; Union P. R. Co. v. Dodge County Comrs. 98 U. S. 541, 25 L. ed. 196; Preston v. Boston, 12 Pick. 14. The tax in this case was illegal and void, and received from the collecting officer by and for the use of the municipality, as appears from the averments of this bill. This would not be sufficient, but it must further appear that the payment was compulsory. A payment made to prevent the sale of real estate for an illegal tax is not under compulsion, but must be regarded as voluntary. Stover v. Mitchell, 45 Ill. 213; Falls v. Cairo, 58 Ill. 403; Swanston v. Ijams, 63 Ill. 165. A payment thus voluntarily made not being recoverable from the municipality by the taxpayer, and not having been paid for the use of another municipality or person in law or fact, no recovery can be had therefor.

No question is presented in this record as to the right to restrain, by injunction, the collection of an illegal tax. The only question here is the right of complainants to recover the amount of an illegal tax paid. All questions in reference to the levy and collection of taxes are statutory, and the rights and duties of the municipality are thus prescribed. The rule that an illegal and void tax voluntarily paid cannot be recovered from the municipality by the person paying being settled by the adjudications of this court, it must be held that what cannot be done directly cannot be done by indirection. No right exists in other taxpayers to recover such voluntarily paid tax. If there is an advantage acquired by the municipality receiving such tax, and a deprivation of a right of another municipality, the remedy to be provided is by legislative action. The bill did not state a cause of action.

The judgment of the Appellate Court is affirmed.

1. The sufficiency of evidence to go to the jury or to sustain a verdict cannot be passed upon on appeal further than to ascertain if at the close of the plaintiff's case there was evidence tending to prove the facts alleged in his declaration, and whether, at the close of all the testimony, the evidence with all the inferences which the jury could justifiably draw from it was insufficient to support a verdict for plaintiff.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First District, affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Cook County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

Statement by Phillips, J.:

This was an action on the case by appellee against appellant to recover damages for personal injuries received by him while attempting to board an electric street car. The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. A jury in the trial court returned a verdict of $8,000 for plaintiff, on which judgment was rendered, and on appeal to the appellate court it was affirmed. The case comes to this court on appeal from the judgment of the latter court.

Messrs. William H. Barnum, John A. Post, and John B. Brady, for appellant:

Negligence may become a question of law where in the facts admitted or conclusively proved there is no reasonable chance of different reasonable minds reaching different conclusions. It may also become a question of law if a single material fact is conclusively shown or uncontradicted, the existence or nonexistence of which is conclusive of the right of recovery.

Wabash R. Co. v. Brown, 152 Pa. 484.

The "fact" is conclusively shown, and is "uncontradicted," that the motorman neither saw nor knew that the plaintiff intended to board the car, and that it was not for such reason that the speed of the car was slackened, if as claimed by plaintiff's witnesses it was so slackened.

NOTE.—The above case presents the important question whether an electric car is to be classed with horse cars or with ordinary railroad cars in respect to the matter of negligence in getting on or off while it is in motion.

In order to make a defendant liable for an injury, where the plaintiff has also been negligent or in fault, it should appear that the proximate cause of the injury was the omission of the defendant, after becoming aware of the danger to which the plaintiff was exposed, to use a proper degree of care to avoid injury.

Isabel v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 60 Mo. 475.

The facts established by the plaintiff's evidence do not show that the plaintiff at the time of the accident was in the exercise of ordinary care.

Hayes v. Norcross, 162 Mass. 546 (1895); North Chicago Street R. Co. v. Williams, 140 Ill. 281.

The negligence of the plaintiff was the more proximate cause of this injury.

Missouri P. R. Co. v. Moseley, 57 Fed. Rep. 921; Holmes v. South P. Coast R. Co. 97 Cal. 161.

Where a person sees or has the means of seeing that upon a certain course danger is imminent, he is charged with want of ordinary care if he pursues that course and is injured, where he pursues it merely for its supposed advantages, in the belief that he will be able to escape, declining another course which he sees and knows to be entirely safe.

Before the plaintiff could recover, the proof should show (1) that the defendant was negligent as charged; (2) that such negligence contributed to plaintiff's injury; (3) that plaintiff was himself exercising ordinary care; (4) that all these matters must be proved by a preponderance of the evidence; and (5) that unless all were so proved the verdict should be not guilty.

Calumet Iron & S. Co. v. Martin, 115 Ill. 367.

The doctrine of comparative negligence only has application in a case where a plaintiff has exercised ordinary care.

The doctrine of comparative negligence is no longer the law of this court.

Lanark v. Dougherty, 153 Ill. 163 (1894).

Messrs. Brant & Hoffmann for appellee.

Phillips, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

One of the errors assigned for the reversal of this judgment is the refusal of the trial court to instruct the jury at the close of the plaintiff's evidence, to find for the defendant, and the refusal of the court to give a like instruction that, as a matter of law, the plaintiff had failed to make out his case, which was asked at the close of the argument.

It is urged that the evidence of plaintiff did not warrant the jury in finding that the injury of plaintiff was the result of defendant's negligence, as charged in the declaration, and also that the evidence of plaintiff establishes that he was not, at the time of his injury, in the exercise of reasonable care and caution. Both of these matters are ordinarily questions of fact, to be determined in the trial and appellate courts. As this court has frequently held, it is not our province to determine or pass upon such questions, further than to ascertain whether or not there was, at the close of plaintiff's case, evidence tending to prove the facts alleged in the declaration, and whether, at the close of all the testimony, when the motion to instruct for defendant was refused, the evidence, with all the inferences which the jury can justifiably draw from it, was insufficient to support a verdict for plaintiff, and that if one was returned it must be set aside. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Richards, 152 Ill. 59, 30 L. R. A. 33; Wenona Coal Co. v. Holmquist, 152 Ill. 581; Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Laack, 143 Ill. 242, 18 L. R. A. 215; Purdy v. Hall, 134 Ill. 298; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Dunleavy, 129 Ill. 132; Bartelott v. International Bank, 119 Ill. 259; Simmons v. Chicago & T. R. Co. 110 Ill. 340.

Two elements alleged in the declaration, and necessary to be established by plaintiff before he could recover, were negligence of the defendant as charged, and that the plaintiff was in the exercise of due care and caution for his own safety. It is not the province of this court to say whether these facts are proved. The evidence before the trial court and jury tended to show that plaintiff, on August 10, 1891, was on Madison street, in Chicago, about two blocks east of Desplaines avenue. He was walking east on the north side of Madison street, intending to board an east-bound car on defendant's line. When a car approached and was distant 150 or 200 feet, plaintiff, still being on the sidewalk on the north side of the street, signaled to the motorman by throwing up his hand. He then proceeded diagonally to the middle of the street, and continued walking eastwardly in the space between the two street-car tracks. The next street crossing east of him was Thomas street. He continued between the two tracks some 25 feet east of this crossing, when the car overtook him. Plaintiff contends that before the car reached him he had seen the motorman turn the brake, so that when he attempted to get on, the car had slackened down to a speed of about 4 or 5 miles an hour. He was still on the left hand or the north side of the track, and desired to get on the front platform. As the car went by he caught the hand rails on each side of the front platform, when he says the speed of the car was suddenly accelerated, and he lost his hold, was dragged some 40 feet or more, and thrown under the wheels and his left hand crushed off. The material parts of plaintiff's testimony, as above set forth, were corroborated by two spectators who witnessed the occurrence,—one from the street and the other from an adjoining yard not far distant. Many of these facts were contradicted by the motorman and four passengers on the front platform, who testified that the car was running at a speed of 7 or 8 miles an hour when it reached plaintiff, and that the speed had not been decreased for the reason that no signal was seen, and that the speed was not accelerated, but, on the contrary, the current was turned off and the brake applied as soon as plaintiff attempted to get on. It was contended and testified to by these witnesses that plaintiff had his back turned to the car while walking, and as the car approached and overtook him he attempted to catch it with both hands; that the motorman at once attempted to stop the car, and did so within a space of 35 or 40 feet. Some passengers in the car also testified that there was no decrease in speed until after the accident occurred.

In the discussion of the question as to whether the court erred in refusing to instruct the jury to find for defendant, only the facts as presented and shown by plaintiff's evidence will be considered.

The serious results of the injury to plaintiff are not disputed. He was, a cabinet maker, and his skill as such depended on the use of both his hands. We have examined the record with the utmost care to ascertain if this judgment is by it sustained. Negligence is ordinarily a question of fact for the jury. In Wabash R. Co. v. Brown, 152 Ill. 484, this court said (p. 488): "Negligence is ordinarily a question of fact. Where the evidence on material facts is conflicting, or where, on undisputed facts, fair-minded men of ordinary intelligence may differ as to the inferences to be drawn, or where, on even a conceded state of facts, a different conclusion would reasonably be reached by different minds, in all such cases negligence is a question of fact. . . . With all the facts considered, if there is a reasonable chance of conclusions differing thereon, then it is a question for a jury. Negligence may become a question of law where, from the facts admitted or conclusively proved, there is no reasonable chance of different reasonable minds reaching different conclusions." To hold that the trial court should have given the general instruction as asked, this court must hold that it was not a question of fact as to whether or not plaintiff was guilty of negligence contributing to the injury, but that it was a question of law, and was negligence per se for the plaintiff to attempt to board the car in question running at the rate of speed shown. If it was a question of fact, then it was properly submitted by the trial court to the jury.

This court has held in a number of cases that it is negligence for a passenger to get off a train, of which the motive power is steam, while the cars are in motion. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Lutz, 84 Ill. 598; Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Stratton, 78 Ill. 88; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Chambers, 71 Ill. 519; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Statton, 54 Ill. 133; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Randolph, 53 Ill. 510, 5 Am. Rep. 60.

In Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Scates, 90 Ill. 596, this court said (p. 592): "If it is to be regarded dangerous for a passenger to get off a train of cars in motion, it is likewise dangerous to get on a train when in motion. If a person is guilty of such negligence in getting off a train of cars in motion as will preclude a recovery for an injury received, upon the same principle and for the same reason a person injured in getting on a train of cars in motion, and in consequence thereof, should be regarded guilty of such negligence as will prevent a recovery." The courts of other states have adopted the same rule that it is negligence for a passenger to alight from a moving train of cars the motive power of which is steam.

The rule as applicable to steam railways is relaxed when applied to horse cars or street railways. Terre Haute & I. R. Co. v. Buck, 96 Ind. 346, 49 Am. Rep. 168; Stoner v. Pennsylvania Co. 98 Ind. 384, 49 Am. Rep. 764. Beach on Contributory Negligence (§ 90), says: "It is well settled that it is not contributory negligence per se for one to alight from or to board a moving street car, and here again we find the severity of the rule as applicable to steam railways essentially relaxed." Booth on Street Railways, (§ 336), lays down the same rule in the following language: "Although the act of boarding a car while in motion is always attended with some risks, the rules applicable to persons entering cars operated by steam are not usually applied with the same strictness to street railways operated by horse power. It is a general rule, established by numerous decisions, that if a person, who has the free use of his faculties and limbs, has given proper notice of his desire to be taken up, and the speed of the car has been slackened in the usual manner, it is not negligence per se to attempt to get on while it is moving slowly, and that if a passenger is injured under such circumstances the question of his contributory negligence is ordinarily one of fact for the jury."

The doctrine is established in nearly all of the states where the question has arisen, that it is not negligence per se for a passenger to board or alight from a street car operated by horse power, and the question of contributory negligence is one of fact for the jury. McDonough v. Metropolitan R. Co. 137 Mass. 210; Eppendorf v. Brooklyn City & N. R. Co. 69 N. Y. 195, 25 Am. Rep. 171; Ganiard v. Rochester City & B. R. Co. 50 Hun, 22; Morrison v. Broadway & S. A. R. Co. 130 N. Y. 166; People's Pass. R. Co. v. Green, 56 Md. 84; North Chicago Street R. Co. v. Williams, 140 Ill. 275. In the case of Sahlgard v. St. Paul City R. Co. 48 Minn. 232, where the motive power of the car was a cable, the same rule as above stated was held also to be applicable.

In large and populous cities, where cars are constantly receiving and discharging passengers at crossings, it is a well-known fact that many of such passengers board cars and alight therefrom before the car has come to a full stop, and that they do so usually with perfect safety. It is well-known, also, that street-car companies tacitly invite many passengers to board and alight from their cars by checking up to a slow rate of speed, and immediately starting up at a greater speed when the passenger is safely aboard or has alighted. It would be impossible for a court to lay down the rule as to what particular rate of speed would be sufficient notice to a passenger that if he attempted to get on or off he would be held guilty of contributory negligence. It would also be a great hardship, and unjust, to lay down a general rule that a passenger attempting to board a street car while in motion at all should be held in contributory negligence. Every person is supposed to know that the boarding of a moving train or car is attended with the danger of a misstep or fall and a fall beside a moving car is liable to bring some part of the body or limbs in danger of being crushed. It is the duty of those having control and management of cars designed for traffic on the public streets, to bring such cars to a full stop at such places as are convenient and necessary for the purpose of discharging and receiving passengers, and it is no less the duty of passengers in getting on or off such cars to observe due precaution for their own safety. We cannot say, however, that it is inconsistent with ordinary care and caution for a person to board a street car while in motion. Whether one has not exercised due care or caution in so doing is to be determined by the particular circumstances in each case, and is therefore a question of fact to be submitted to the jury.

The cases heretofore cited, in which it has been held that it is not negligence per se for a person to board or alight from a street car while in motion, have reference in a great degree, to horse cars. Where such motive power is used the act is not in itself negligence, while in the case of cars propelled by steam the act is held to be negligence. Where the motive power is electricity, a question not entirely free from difficulty is presented. The modern progress of methods of transportation, the recent discoveries of the possibility of electricity as a motive power, and the perfection which it has within a few years developed and attained, have demonstrated a power popular as a method of transit. The purposes to which a power of this character is applied must, to some extent, be considered. Electricity has now in a great measure superseded horse power. The same style of cars, and often the same cars, are used, the same streets are traversed, and a like number of stops, and in like places, are made to receive and deliver passengers. Electricity as a motive power, while stronger and more powerful, and with possibilities of a greater speed, is at the same time more nearly under the control of the person in charge than horse power. The strict rule in force regarding the negligence of a person alighting from or boarding an ordinary train of steam cars had for it many good and sufficient reasons which are not applicable to the electric car as in general use. In the latter case, stops are frequent and opportunity for great speed is not presented; steps for passengers are near the ground, and the chances of a misstep or fall are not so great as in steam cars as constructed; streets on such lines are generally paved, and in that respect passengers may as safely depart from or board such cars in one place as another, whereas in the case of steam cars platforms are generally provided. While in electric cars the possibilities of speed are greater than in the case of horse cars, yet the general operation and management of such cars so nearly approach those of horse cars that it must be held that the same rule of law which in the cases cited and a long line of other cases holds that it is not negligence per se to board or depart from such cars while in motion is also applicable to electric cars.

It follows, therefore, from this application of the rule, that in the case at bar it was solely a question of fact as to whether or not there was negligence in the acts of the defendant or contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. There was evidence tending to prove the facts alleged in the declaration, and it was not error in the trial court to refuse the general instruction asked. It was proper for the court to submit the question to the jury.

It is also urged as error that the trial court refused certain instructions which should have been given, and modified certain other instructions which should have been given to the jury as asked, and that such modification was error. Sixteen instructions were asked on behalf of the defendant below, nine of which were given. Too much space would be occupied in considering in detail the objections to the instructions refused and modified. We find, upon examination, that the fifth instruction, to which a modification was made by the court instructing the jury on the doctrine of comparative negligence, should not have been so modified. The doctrine of comparative negligence is no longer the law in this state. Lanark v. Dougherty, 153 Ill. 163; Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Kelly, 156 Ill. 9. It appears, however, that in the 12th instruction asked by defendant below, and given by the court, the jury were instructed, in substance, the same as by the 5th instruction after its modification by the court. In the 12th instruction referred to, the jury were told that if they believed, from the evidence, that both the plaintiff and motorman were guilty of negligence contributing to the injury, they should find their verdict against the plaintiff, unless they believed that the plaintiff's negligence was slight and that of the motorman was gross in comparison. While it was not proper for the court to make the modification of the 5th instruction, appellant is not now in a position to complain of such modification, from the fact that it, by the 12th instruction, asked the court to instruct the jury that such was the law. The nine instructions given by the court to the jury for appellant fully covered the law and the facts in the case. There is no reversible error in the refusal or modification of instructions.

It is strongly urged by appellant that certain remarks of counsel for appellee on the trial of this case were such as should cause a reversal of this judgment. We have examined the record very carefully, and while we find the remarks and acts of counsel which are objected to, were not of the character a trial court should permit, we are not prepared to look at them with the degree of seriousness that counsel for appellant urge in their brief. We have frequently said that it is the duty of the trial court to control counsel, in the conduct of a trial and in the argument of a case, within reasonable bounds. It is not always possible to bring before this court the expression of counsel in making objectionable remarks, and the acts of counsel in connection therewith, so that what might in the trial court be extremely improper is not presented to us with the same force. We are not able to see, after having carefully examined this record, that the remarks and conduct of counsel for appellee were such as in themselves should call for a reversal of this judgment.

Finding no error of law in this record, the judgment of the Appellate Court for the First District is affirmed.

Rehearing denied.

GAGE TRUST COMPANY et al. Respts.

(.....Mo.....)

1. The appointment of a receiver by a Federal court after a judgment establishing a mechanic's lien against specific property and directing a sale of it to satisfy the demand will not defeat the right of the lien claimants to have the property sold on execution under the judgment.

2. A sheriff's sale for $250, of property worth from $40,000 to $50,000, under a description so misleading that the sheriff did not know what property he was selling, on account of which he failed to give notice according to his custom to mortgagees, together with the fact that they had paid off or compromised other liens on the property and supposed that all were thus satisfied, may be set aside on the application of such mortgagees, although the owner of the fee of the property, who is insolvent, does not complain.

APPPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Greene County setting aside a sale to enforce a mechanic's lien upon motion of respondents, mortgagees of the property. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

MERRIS, Massey & Tatlow, for appellant:

This case must be governed by the rule that refers to the conflict of jurisdictions of courts of co-ordinate jurisdiction, which is, that whichever court first acquired jurisdiction over the property in question—by either taking actual and physical possession of the property through its arm (its receiver), or constructive possession by a proceeding in rem, or a quasi proceeding in rem, such as attachments, mechanics' liens, action to foreclose mortgages or establish other liens, such court draws such property to it for the purpose of such jurisdiction and excludes it from the jurisdiction of any other co-ordinate court as completely and as fully as if such property was beyond the territorial jurisdiction of such court.

Waddell v. Williams, 50 Mo. 216; State, Reid, v. Griffith, 63 Mo. 545; Eidemiller v. Kump, 61 Mo. 344.

The property was at the time of the levy and sale under the execution in the possession of the Federal court through its receiver, and the burden devolved upon defendants in the motion to show, even upon their own theory of the case, that the levy and sale were under and by virtue of proceedings in which a court of co-ordinate jurisdiction with the Federal court had first assumed jurisdiction of the property itself. This necessitates the proof of a valid judgment upon which to rest the levy and sale.

Since the proceedings were before a justice of the peace in a statutory proceeding to enforce a mechanic's lien, no presumptions will be indulged in favor of his jurisdiction.

The evidence failed to show the justice of the peace had jurisdiction, because there was no showing of a proper service on the parties to the contract under which work was done.

The levy upon and sale of the property while in the possession of the Federal court made such levy and sale void.

The jurisdiction of the justice of the peace in the suit brought before him for the enforcement of a mechanic's lien in no wise prevented the Federal court from entertaining jurisdiction of a suit for the foreclosure of a mortgage upon the premises, and from the appointment of a receiver in that case to take possession of the property.

Burgess, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case was transferred to the court in banc, after an opinion reversing the judgment had been rendered. We adopt the statement of facts therein made, as well also as the first paragraph of the opinion by our learned Brother Barclay. They are as follows:

"The questions to be determined on this appeal arose upon a motion in the circuit court to set aside a sheriff's sale, which motion the court sustained. The plaintiffs appealed, after having taken proper steps to give the trial court opportunity to review its ruling, and saving the evidence and all exceptions, in the usual way. The original cause in which the motion appears is entitled: 'W. C. Rogers and A. A. Baldwin, Composing the Firm of Rogers & Baldwin Hardware Co., Plaintiffs, v. The Cleveland Building Co., A. B. Crawford, John D. Porter, Seth Tuttle, Marion Davis, W. H. Keyser, Owners, and Jarvis-Conkling Mortgage Trust Co., Mortgagees, and Samuel M. Jarvis, Trustee, W. W. Baldwin, Mortgagee, B. U. Massey, Trustee, Defendants.' Stated first in the shortest form the case is this: Plaintiffs obtained a judgment against the owners of the Baldwin theater or opera house property for a small amount, and of lien against the property under the mechanic's lien law. A special execution issued on that judgment, and the property was sold by the sheriff. Mr. McAfee became the purchaser, as trustee, on behalf of the plaintiffs and other holders of liens against the building for work and materials furnished towards its construction. Before the sale, but after the judgment of lien, Judge Philips, at chambers, as judge of the United States circuit court for the western district of Missouri, appointed a receiver of the theater property, in the suit of Lubbock et al., plaintiffs, v. Marion Davis, Ellen Davis, and A. B. Crawford, defendants, to foreclose a mortgage upon the same property. The order of appointment was of wide reach, and is said to be a barrier to the execution of the mechanic's lien judgment, pending the receivership. The plaintiffs in this case are not named as parties to the proceeding in the Federal court. After the sale under the execution on the mechanic's lien judgment, the Jarvis-Conkling Mortgage Trust Company and Samuel N. Jarvis filed in the state court the motion which is the basis of this appeal. The principal grounds of the motion are that the sale was an interference with the receivership of the property established by the Federal court, and was hence void. There are other reasons assigned in the motion which will be mentioned further on.

'Passing now to some of the necessary particulars of the case, it will be convenient to keep the following dates in view: September 9, 1891, date of mortgage sought to be foreclosed in the Lubbock Case in the Federal court; December 5, 1891, beginning of plaintiffs' lien account; March 5, 1892, close of lien account; May 1, 1892, notice of lien; May 31, 1892, lien filed in the circuit clerk's office; August 17, 1892, plaintiffs' mechanic's lien suit begun; September 20, 1892, judgment in mechanic's lien suit for $37.36, and of lien; March 13, 1893, transcript of the judgment filed in circuit clerk's office; March 16, 1894, petition for receiver in Federal court; March 17, 1894, receiver appointed by Judge Philips; March 19, 1894, receiver took possession of the property; October, 1894, special execution issued from circuit court on mechanic's lien judgment, returnable to January term, 1895; November 23, 1894, sale on special execution, property bought by Mr. McAfee; December 15, 1894, sheriff's deed recorded; January 14, 1895, motion filed to set aside sale; January 23, 1895, motion sustained, sale set aside. Although the mortgage first above mentioned ostensibly antedates the opening of the lien account, it seems that the bonds (for $49,000) secured by it were placed later. When that mortgage was recorded does not appear. The investigation of the facts in regard to that instrument was cut short at the hearing by an admission by one of the attorneys for the motion, who conceded that the 'lien part' of the judgment (under which the sale took place) was a prior lien.

'The proceeding to enforce plaintiffs' mechanic's lien was begun before a local justice of the peace, after the filing of the lien in the circuit clerk's office, according to law. Rev. Stat. 1889, § 6161. The defendants in that original cause were the parties named as such at the outset of this opinion. The moving parties in the present motion are the trust company and the trustee, Mr. Jarvis, both defendants in that case. Five of the defendants were personally served; the others (including the trust company and Mr. Jarvis) were ultimately brought in by posting advertisements, as prescribed in such cases. Id. § 6163. The justice's judgment refers to the mortgage or deed of trust in which Mr. Jarvis was trustee for the Jarvis-Conkling Trust Company, and finds plaintiffs' demand (for the amount of judgment rendered against the owners) to be paramount to the mortgage, and adjudges that it is a lien on the property described, including the estate or interest of these defendants. A transcript of that judgment was duly filed in the circuit clerk's office, and the execution sale now in question took place upon process issued for the circuit court upon that judgment. No appeal from the latter was ever taken, and the judgment became final in due time.

The order made by Judge Philips in the foreclosure suit is quite long, and need not be fully recited now. Its substance is that, upon a hearing before the judge at chambers, Mr. Jewell was appointed receiver for the United States circuit court for the western district of Missouri, and directed to take immediate possession of the property (which was described), and to 'carry on the business connected with said opera house, and carry out contracts already made by the respondent A. B. Crawford in connection with said opera-house business and the procurement of amusement enterprises therefor, to make new contracts in that respect,' etc. The usual directions in regard to funds and accounts were included. The receiver was authorized, among other things, to pay 'any sums necessary for the payment of taxes, or which from time to time may be required to save from sale or sacrifice the said real property.' The order further declared 'that the respondent A. B. Crawford, his agents, employees, and all other persons, whether claiming through or under him, or otherwise, are hereby enjoined and restrained from attaching, seizing, levying upon, or otherwise taking or interfering with any of the property above described, or with the said receiver in his possession, control, and management of the said property.

'Other facts will be stated in the course of the opinion, in connection with some subordinate points on which they bear.

'1. The chief issue concerns the relation of the original lien case to the receivership in the Federal court. It will be seen that, by the terms of the order appointing the receiver, 'all persons,' whether claiming through the defendant Crawford 'or otherwise,' were enjoined from 'attaching, seizing, levying upon, or otherwise taking or interfering with any of the property,' etc. This language might reach the proceedings under the lien execution in the state court against this property. But if the property, at the time that order was made, had been already subjected to the judicial control of the state courts, which had not yet concluded their action upon the property, then the Federal order might be disregarded by 'all persons' (not parties to the foreclosure suit, at least) who were entitled to demand the exercise of the state court's jurisdiction upon said property. The question is whether or not the mechanic's lien proceedings subjected the theater property to the judicial power of the state courts until that jurisdiction was exhausted, so that no other court might meanwhile remove the property from the control necessary to make the use of that jurisdiction effective. The comity which should govern the actions of courts of concurrent jurisdiction in such circumstances has passed into a rule of law, now generally recognized in the United States, and which has been thus stated by the highest Federal tribunal: 'When the object of the action requires the control and dominion of the property involved in the litigation, that court which first acquires possession, or that dominion which is equivalent, draws to itself the exclusive right to dispose of it, for the purposes of its jurisdiction.' Heidritter v. Elizabeth Oil Cloth Co. (1884) 112 U. S. 305, 28 L. ed. 733. The proper application of this rule to the facts in judgment depends somewhat on the nature of the mechanic's lien suit. Such suits in this state are regulated by positive law, which clearly indicates their nature. An action to enforce such a lien deals with certain described property, against which the lien is claimed, and, upon establishment of the claim, judgment goes first against the principal debtor, on the account. The amount ascertained to be due is then adjudged a lien on the specific property, and a special execution thereafter issues, directing a sale of the identical property to satisfy the demand. Whether such an action (so far as it concerns the realty) should be regarded as in rem or be placed in the class which some jurists have described as 'quasi in rem,' we do not stop to inquire. The true inquiry is whether the action deals with the property it seeks to affect in such a specific and definite manner as necessarily to withdraw the property from the exclusive control of other courts while the action is pending. We think it does, and that such is the plain effect of the Missouri statutes governing that action. Rev. Stat. 1889, §§ 6159-6167, 6705-6729. The jurisdiction of the state courts (having attached to the property a long time before the suit in the Federal court began) was not exhausted by the rendition of the judgment of lien. The ultimate process (in this instance, of special execution) needed to make the judgment fruitful was an essential part of the exercise of power comprehended in the term 'jurisdiction.' A grant of power is considered to include the use of all incidental powers necessary to make the principal grant effective. Broom, Legal Maxims, 8th Am. ed. pp. 479, 486; State, McLorinan, v. Ryne (1887) 49 N. J. L. 603. In a leading Federal case it was said that 'process subsequent to judgment is as essential to jurisdiction as process antecedent to judgment, else the judicial power would be incomplete and entirely inadequate to the purposes for which it was conferred.' United States, Riggs, v. Johnson County Supers. (1867) 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 187, 18 L. ed. 774. The subject of the mechanic's lien suit (namely, the opera-house property) was thus plainly within the control of the state courts, and neither the appointment of the receiver nor the order then made withdrew the property from that control. The establishment of the receivership did not transfer the title to the property, nor did it divest liens already fixed upon it. To hold that such was the effect of a proceeding to which the lien claimants were not parties would be to deprive them of their rights in the property 31 L. R. A.

without a hearing, which we certainly decline to do. As the learned Federal judge had no authority or jurisdiction to take the property out of the judicial control of the state courts in the manner attempted in said order, it follows (if his order is to be construed as having that effect) that it is void and of no force, as to the rights of the lien claimants in process of assertion in the state court. In Gates v. Bucki (1898) 12 U. S. App. 69, 4 C. C. A. 116, and 53 Fed. Rep. 961, the Federal court of appeals of this circuit, by Judge Shiras, declared that, 'this property being thus in the custody of the state court in proceedings intended to affect the title and control the disposition of the same, the property was for the time being withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the Federal court, and when the foreclosure suit was filed in that court it could not and did not bind or reach the property, because the same was not then within the plane of Federal jurisdiction.' 12 U. S. App. 81, 4 C. C. A. 116, and 53 Fed. Rep. 961. The above ruling was made in a case wherein the jurisdiction of the Federal court was challenged by appropriate moves in that court. But if the principle announced in it is sound, as we believe it to be, it is not essential for the lien claimants to go into the Federal court to secure the recognition of that principle. It is one of those rules of 'general jurisprudence,' binding alike on Federal and state tribunals. It follows that the ruling of the trial court on the motion to set aside the sale, in so far as it is referable to the pendency of the receivership proceedings, was erroneous."

2. The next question is as to the correctness of the ruling of the court in setting aside the sheriff's sale. That the court had control of its own process and the power to set aside the sale if there was gross inadequacy of price, and the interests of the movers are injuriously affected by the sale if they were by mistake or misapprehension prevented from attending it or preventing it, we think, is well-settled law. It is equally well settled that inadequacy of price alone will not justify the setting aside of a judicial sale, and the court so declared; but when the inadequacy of price is very great, as in the case at bar, slight circumstances tending to show that interested parties, such as mortgagees, were misled, or by accident or mistake prevented from attending the sale or preventing it, will justify its being set aside. While the court declared, as a matter of law, "that inadequacy of consideration, however gross, is not sufficient ground of itself to set aside the sale," it did set it aside; and it may reasonably be inferred therefrom that, in its opinion, there were other facts in evidence which justified it in so doing. The execution under which the sale was made was a transcript execution, issued by the clerk of the circuit court of Greene county on the transcript of a judgment, rendered before a justice of the peace of said county, enforcing a mechanic's lien against the property in question in favor of Rogers & Baldwin Hardware Company against the Cleveland Building Company, A. B. Crawford, J. D. Porter, Seth Tuttle, Marion Davis, and W. H. Keyser, owners. The Jarvis-Conkling Mortgage Trust Company, mortgagees, Samuel M. Jarvis, trustee, W. W. Baldwin, mortgagee, and B. U. Massey, trustee, were also made parties to that suit, but no judgment was rendered against them. The execution could not be found, but must be presumed to have been in accordance with the judgment. The judgment after describing the tract of land by metes and bounds, proceeds as follows: "Together with the four-story brick building known and designated as the 'Baldwin Opera House,' situated thereon, and that said land and building be charged with the payment of said debt. In the notice of sale by the sheriff no mention was made of the opera house, other than as the "buildings and improvements" on the land, although the property was generally known as the "Opera House Block." The sheriff testified that, at the time of the sale, he did not know that he was selling the opera house property. The property had been previously advertised for sale by the sheriff under nine executions issued on transcripts of mechanic's lien judgments in favor of different parties, amounting, in the aggregate, to about $5,000. The judgment creditors in those cases, as well as in this, were represented by Capt. McAfee as their attorney, the purchaser of the property at the sale in question. Those judgments were all compromised or paid off by T. J. Flannelly, who represented the Jarvis-Conkling Trust Company. J. T. White, one of the attorneys for said company, testified that, about the time they were paid, Flannelly asked Capt. McAfee if he would not assign the judgments which he had paid off to him, or to his clients, and Capt. McAfee said he could not, for the reason that he had other suits pending, but that, if he would pay off the claims he had pending, "I will sell them to you, but it would not be fair to assign to you all those I have in judgment, and leave out those that are still pending." Witness further stated that his recollection was that Mr. Flannelly asked the captain if those were all the judgments that he had, and he answered that they were. This conversation, or the chief part of it, Capt. McAfee testified did not occur. White also stated that Mr. McCammon and himself were the attorneys for the mortgage trust company in Springfield, and represented it in all the litigation about this property, and the sheriff did not notify them that he had any execution in this matter at all; that it was his custom to do so in such cases; that the service was had by publication, and the judgment obtained without their knowledge. The property was worth from $40,000 to $50,000, and was sold by the sheriff for $250. The purchaser represented a number of lien claimants, whose demands, not then in judgment, amounted to about $11,000; and, by an arrangement between himself and them, they were to share the property in proportion to the amount of their respective claims.

While the notice of sale was a technical compliance with the law, it should have given a more particular description of the property, and in failing to do so was to some extent misleading; so much so, in fact, that the sheriff did not know what property he was selling. Herman, in his work on Executions (page 415), in speaking of sheriff's sales for inadequacy of price says: "A sale of $12,000 worth of property for $400 is strong ground for relief, especially where the advertisement contains an imperfect description of the property. The fact that the advertisement was so framed as to mislead, so that no one, not acquainted with the premises, could have conjectured from the advertisement what the property was that was intended to be sold, in connection with the fact that there were no bidders at the sale but the purchaser, and the property was sold at a very inadequate price, makes a sale constructively fraudulent against a defendant and others having liens on the property, and constitutes a ground for equitable relief, although the advertisement may have been a technical compliance with the statute, so as to vest a valid title in the purchaser." Hodgson v. Farrell, 15 N. J. Eq. 88. The imperfect description of the property in the notice of sale should be taken into consideration, in connection with other facts in evidence, in passing upon the validity of the sale. The weight of the evidence clearly showed that Flannelly, as the agent and attorney of the mortgage company, was misled by the supposed statement of Capt. McAfee with respect to the payment by that company of all the lien judgments which he represented against the property; for it is fair to presume that he would not have paid all others, and left remaining unpaid the judgment under which the property was sold, amounting to so small a sum as $87.60. His object seems to have been to pay all liens then in judgment, and it is unaccountable why he did not pay that, unless he was misled by what he understood the statements of Capt. McAfee to be with respect thereto. We do not undertake to say that Capt. McAfee was guilty of any intentional wrongdoing, fraud, or unfairness in buying the property, and only speak of matters connected with the sale from a legal standpoint. These facts, taken in connection with the evidence of White that the custom of the sheriff was to notify him with respect to intended sales of this property, and his failure to do so on this occasion, and the inadequate price that the property sold for, fully justified the court in setting the sale aside. Seaman v. Riggins, 2 N. J. Eq. 214, 34 Am. Dec. 200. The purchaser was attorney for plaintiff, and was not an innocent purchaser. Harness v. Cratens, 126 Mo. 233. Moreover, the sheriff, in selling the property, was the agent of both plaintiff and defendant, owing a like duty to each, and bound to protect the interest of all parties concerned. It was his duty to see that the property was not sacrificed, and to that end could have returned the execution, "No sale for want of bidders." Conway v. Nolte, 11 Mo. 74; Shaw v. Potter, 50 Mo. 281; Holdeforth v. Shannon, 113 Mo. 508; Cole Co. v. Madden, 91 Mo. 585; State, Central Type Foundry, v. Moore, 72 Mo. 285. His failure to do so can only been accounted for on the ground of his want of knowledge of the property that he was selling and of its value. His course cannot be justified or excused on the ground that the owner of the fee in the property is not here complaining, and the mortgagee is. That, however, does not legalize the sale, which in its result is the transfer of defendant's property to the purchaser for about one eighteenth of its value, a merely nominal sum. All the plaintiff company is entitled to is its debt, and that end is not defeated by opening the bid but will certainly be attained if that be done. The plaintiff suffers no loss if the sale be set aside, while the mortgage company lose a large amount of money. The object of the sale is, not to transfer the property of the execution debtor to the execution creditor, "but to pay the debt. He cannot, therefore, be injured by any proceeding which has that for its object, and does not cause any unnecessary delays or expense." Littell v. Zuntz, 2 Ala. 256, 36 Am. Dec. 415. Justice can be but subserved by a resale of the property, for it cannot result in any injury to the purchaser of plaintiffs, the purchase money being refunded. The sale, if valid as against the movers, could not in any way be legalized by reason of any private arrangement between the purchaser and his clients as to how the property was to be shared by him with them, to which they were not a party.

The judgment is affirmed.

Brace, Ch. J., and Sherwood, Macfarlane, and Robinson, JJ., concur. Gantt, J., concurs in second and last paragraphs, but expresses no opinion as to the first. Barclay, J., dissents from last, but concurs in first, paragraph.

Barclay, J., dissenting:

Upon the leading proposition in the case a majority of the court in banc have adopted the unanimous opinion delivered in the first division. But they discard some of the minor rulings announced in that opinion, and conclude to affirm the circuit judgment. This change in the result does not seem to me entirely satisfactory.

1. My view still is that the cause should go back for a rehearing. The reasons for that view were given in the divisional opinion, and others will be added. The opinion of the first division was as follows (omitting the passage approved in the learned opinion of Judge Burgess):

"2. The defendants next insist that, as the trial court had control over its process, it might set aside the execution sale on equitable grounds satisfactory to that court. It is true, as pointed out in Ray v. Stobbs (1859), 28 Mo. 35, and recently repeated in Bryant v. Russell (1895), 127 Mo. 422, that a court, on motion has jurisdiction to regulate and control the use of its own writs, so as to see that no injustice is done by them. But the exercise of its judgment upon such motions is not beyond all review. The reasons assigned in such motions must be considered in determining the conclusiveness of action thereon by the trial court. The lien judgment in the case at bar was rendered by a justice of the peace. But, when the transcript thereof was filed in the circuit court, it came under the control of the latter court for purposes relating to its execution. Rev. Stat. 1889, § 6287. That control includes the power, on proper occasion, to set aside sales on execution to satisfy such judgments. The grounds of the motion in the pending cause were four. Two of them related to the proceedings in the Federal court. The comments already made dispose of them, so far as we are concerned. The first of the two remaining grounds was that the sale was for an inadequate sum; that the defendants, bringing the motion, had no actual notice or knowledge of the judgment, execution, levy or sale until long after the sale; and that the sheriff had a custom (which he failed in this instance to observe) to notify interested parties or their attorneys of the demand of such an execution, and to thus give opportunity to pay the same. The circuit judge, upon an instruction, given at the close of the evidence on the motion, declared that mere inadequacy of consideration in the sale was not sufficient ground to set it aside. So it is probable that his order sustaining the motion was not based on that objection. The circuit court also excluded questions of defendants directed to the point as to the sheriff's custom to notify defendants in execution. As defendants are not in position to complain of that ruling, we need not go into it on plaintiff's appeal. Want of actual knowledge by, or notice to, defendants of the proceedings to enforce the lien would not alone form a just or substantial ground to vacate the process on a judgment for its enforcement, where the proceedings were valid against collateral attack, those defendants having been duly brought before the court by constructive service, as allowed by law.

"3. The remaining ground of the motion is that the 'sale was inequitable, unjust, and contrary to good conscience,' for the reason that defendants, long after the judgment was rendered, and 'before the issuance of said execution, were led to believe, and did believe, by statements made by said C. B. McAfee to the attorneys, that there were no other lien judgments at said time against said property on behalf of any clients of his, and that the sum of $5,000, which was then paid to said C. B. McAfee, on settlement of a large number of lien judgments held by his clients, then and there settled all his lien claims and those of his clients, which at said time were reduced to judgment; that these defendants and their said attorneys were thrown off their guard by said statements of said C. B. McAfee, and by reason of the same did not investigate as to whether there were any such other judgments, and did not watch for said sale, and said property was sold without their knowledge for the grossly inadequate sum of $250.' We have examined the evidence carefully on this point, and find that it does not establish the facts above alleged. We are unable to discover any proof of any statements by Mr. McAfee which should reasonably have been interpreted by adverse counsel as charged in the passage from their motion above quoted.

"4. Some minor objections to the execution sale are made, as, for instance, that there were certain supposed irregularities in the lien judgment or proceedings; but, on examination, we find none of those objections tenable or requiring special comment.

"5. On the case as it was submitted to the learned trial judge, we hold that he was in error in setting aside the sale. For that reason we shall reverse his order. As he sustained the motion, the moving defendants had no occasion to except to the ruling (against them and favorable to plaintiffs) excluding proof of a custom of the sheriff to notify parties interested before enforcing executions, and declaring by instruction that mere inadequacy of price was not a sufficient ground to set aside the sale. In view of these rulings, to which these defendants had no need to except (because of the final ruling in their favor), we are unwilling to substitute a conclusive ruling to the contrary, on the record as it now stands. While the court's declaration (as to inadequacy of price) is correct as a general proposition, when applied to sheriff's sales which have become final, it is not more than a half truth as applied to the review of such a sale upon motion made before the sale has become a finality under the process on which it took place. It has been expressly held in this state that it may sometimes be the duty of an officer, in charge of process, to postpone such a sale, on his own motion, in case a gross and unnecessary sacrifice of property is threatened. Conway v. Nolte (1874) 11 Mo. 74; State, Central Type Foundry, v. Moore (1880) 72 Mo. 285. And in cases where the officer would be warranted in postponing the sale, the court itself, if the sale occurred, might set it aside, upon prompt and timely application to that end, if the property has been in fact sacrificed by a grossly inadequate sale, in circumstances which call for such relief against the abuse of the court's process. In the present case the property sold for $250. It was certainly not worth more than $40,000 or $50,000. It was admitted that it cost about the latter sum, and there is proof that it was worth at least $15,000. It bore an encumbrance to secure $49,000. There are special facts, however, which indicate that the purchaser at the execution sale represented a large body of lien claimants whose demands reached the amount of about $11,000, and the sale (under § 6727, Rev. Stat. 1889, as well as by their own mutual agreement) would inure to the benefit of all of them in proportion to their demands. So that, in effect, in view of the insolvency of the building company, the principal debtor, the price may be considered as substantially equivalent to the last-named sum, which we do not think sufficiently out of proportion to the value of the property to warrant a court in vacating the sale on the sole ground of inadequacy in the price. But here the evidence which the court excluded, as to the custom of the sheriff to notify defendants in execution, might have laid a basis for the court's remedial discretionary action, when coupled with great inadequacy in the proposed price. Where inadequacy of price (such as would not alone warrant interference with such a sale) is accompanied with any circumstance of surprise, mistake, or even excusable neglect, the court whose process is involved may, in the exercise of a sound discretion, relieve against a sacrifice of the property, where such course appears to be dictated by the demands of justice in the particular case. Cole Co. v. Madden (1887) 91 Mo. 585. This may be done on timely motion, without resort to an independent suit in equity.

"We hence reverse the decision upon the motion to set aside the judgment, and remand the cause, with directions to rehear that motion in conformity to the principles announced in this opinion. Brace, Ch. J., and Macfarlane and Robinson, J. J., concur."

6. To the reasons given in the above-quoted part of the divisional opinion, it may be well to add a few further observations, in view of some positions taken in the opinion of my learned associate, Judge Burgess. His opinion holds that the setting aside of the execution sale was a proper use of the discretionary power of the circuit judge. It is plain, from the record before this court, that the circuit judge did not intend to exercise his discretion upon the facts, because he was convinced (as his rulings show) that the pendency of the receivership prevented a valid sale. All the court here differ with him on that point, yet a majority favor affirming the order to set aside the execution sale, nevertheless. The proposition is undoubtedly true that a circuit ruling should always be sustained where it is right, though wrong reasons may have prompted it. But, where a reviewing authority undertakes to say that a decision in the trial court is correct on discretionary grounds, when that decision was evidently based on other and untenable grounds, the reviewing court should at least be very sure that ample foundation for a favorable exercise of the discretionary power (which was never exerted) exists in the facts, and it should also be very sure that the conclusion announced accords with the demands of the situation which confronted the trial judge in the particular case. The application of discretionary authority to set aside execution sales by the court out of which the process has issued is governed by equitable considerations, though the form of relief may be legal. On motions directed to that end, the court (though the form of action is not changed) applies rules of common fairness and justice according to the very right of the case, and on such terms as may be just. Here the parties moving to set aside the sale are not the primary debtors. They are persons claiming rights in the property under a mortgage, and they profess to have been surprised at the sale, and to have been willing to pay the claim without a sale. These facts are emphasized in the learned opinion of the court in banc. It appears that the moving defendants concede that the plaintiffs' mechanics' lien judgment "is a prior lien" (to use the language of their admission in the record), and that the lien judgment has become final as to all concerned. The gravamen of defendants' complaint now is that they were misled by Mr. McAfee when they were trying to pay off all claims reduced to judgments. Should any court, on such a showing, set aside an execution sale, in the exercise of discretion, without putting some sort of terms upon the parties moving for such relief? Ought not the latter, in such circumstances, to be required to do that equity which their admissions concede? Ought they not to pay, tender, or at least secure, the plaintiffs' judgment, which the moving parties have no ground to contest (and do not contest), before an order for resale is made? The trial judge merely set aside the sale, without more. Even the costs of the first sale were not required to be paid by the moving parties. Plaintiffs are thus put to the hazard of paying costs of the resale, and of the possibility of losing their present full security for payment. At all events, plaintiffs must lose considerable time, now, in obtaining payment of their demand, though the latter is practically undisputed. It seems to me that a court, proceeding to deal with the situation described by this record, should at least require security for plaintiffs' judgment before setting aside the former sale, in the circumstances here shown, especially where the chief ground of the objection to the former sale is that these parties were trying beforehand to pay the plaintiffs' demand. But no terms were imposed of any sort, for the manifest reason that the learned trial judge thought the sale should be vacated as an interference with the Federal receivership. Had he reached or considered the general equities of the motion, he would, no doubt, have fully recognized the soundness of these suggestions as to the propriety of imposing reasonable terms on the moving defendants as a condition to setting aside the sale. The imposition of fair terms, in such circumstances, is approved as well by precedents as by the obvious demands of justice. Savin v. Mount Vernon Bank (1858) 2 R. I. 382; Winterson v. Hitchings (1895) 18 Misc. 201. At the hearing of this motion, Mr. McAfee, who purchased the land on behalf of the lien claimants, was a witness. In the course of his examination he said: "If these gentlemen will pay my clients to-day, I will deed them this property. . . . I had the sale made because I wanted to bring these men up to the mark in some way. . . . If these gentlemen will just pay off these claims, they will own the opera house." But these gentlemen were then contesting his purchase chiefly on the legal ground that the receivership was an obstacle to its consummation, and so they paid no heed to this polite invitation to pay off the mechanics' liens.

7. The pendency of the receivership and the well-known power of the Federal authority account in a great measure for the small price the property brought. But those factors in that result were not chargeable to the mechanics and materialmen, or their attorneys, who seem only to have sought payment for the labor and improvements upon the property. Whoever bought in such circumstances bought a certain lawsuit, with its probable terminus in the Supreme Court of the United States. What wonder, then, that no one bid at the sale but the lien claimants, or their attorney to protect their interest? The condition of the property and of its title had quite as much to do with the small price realized as any of the facts that have been mentioned as warranting interference of the court on discretionary grounds.

8. It has been intimated that the advertisement was misleading because the sheriff says he did not know he was selling the opera house. The description was used by him in his published notice of sale, and it so closely re-embled the one adopted in the learned district judge's order appointing the receiver that no one acquainted with the property could have been misled. The Federal receiver was manager of the advertising department of the paper in which appears the advertisement of sale. It is not likely, in such circumstances, that any fraud or secret sale was contemplated or perpetrated by the parties seeking to have the sale brought on.

9. The court, on a direct ruling, excluded evidence of the sheriff's custom to notify parties defendant in executions of his demand, before proceeding to a sale. Later on, one of the witnesses testified to such a custom. That fact was volunteered by the witness as part of an answer to this question: "Have you looked in the office of the attorneys for the judgment creditors, since that, for it [namely, the lost execution]?" Though the evidence of the custom thus came in, and was not stricken out, it is clear, from the court's definite ruling on the point at an earlier stage of the hearing, that the learned judge regarded the fact as irrelevant, and gave no weight to it. It does not seem necessary to discuss its value to support a conclusive judgment in this court on a question properly referable to the discretion of the trial judge.

All things considered, it seems to me that the order setting aside the sale, without any sort of terms imposed on the moving parties, should not be affirmed, but that the cause should be remanded to the end that the motion may be reheard on its merits on the circuit, and such conclusion be then reached as the facts disclosed may appear to warrant, in view of the ruling of the supreme court that the Federal receivership is, of itself, no impediment to the sale.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Union County awarding a mandamus to compel defendants to deliver to plaintiff the insignia of the office of county superintendent of schools. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. D. Slater and R. Eakin, for appellant:

When the office is full de facto, the proper method of proceeding to oust the occupant is by quo warranto and not by mandamus.

State, Leeds, v. Atlantic City, 52 N. J. L. 332, 8 L. R. A. 698; Williams v. Clayton, 6 Utah, 86; New York v. Conover, 5 Abb. Pr. 171; Blackwell, Tax Titles, 117; State, Leal, v. Jones, 19 Ind. 356; 5 Cent. L. J. 27.

A de facto officer is one in possession of the office without title but by color of right.

5 Cent. L. J. 27; State v. Fritz, 27 La. Ann. 689; Hamlin v. Kassafer, 15 Or. 457.

This note is confined exclusively to the question of the remedy by way of mandamus to compel the surrender of an office, and of the books, papers, and other documents appertaining thereto, and does not include that class of cases wherein the surrender of such office and the delivery of the books and papers appertaining thereto have been enforced by proceedings in the nature of a quo warranto.

I. General doctrine governing.

It is the duty of every public officer, at the expiration of his official relation, to surrender to his successor the property of the office which the law commits to his custody, as in such property he has no individual right or interest, the title to it residing in the public, and of that he is merely custodian during his continuance in office, the duty is ministerial merely, no matter on what officer it devolves, and at common law its performance was enforceable by mandamus. Thompson v. Holt, 52 Ala. 491, 497 (1875).

When the power has been executed in due form it is the duty of the suspended officer to cease to exercise the duties of his office, and it is likewise his duty to turn over the books to the appointee commissioned to perform the duties of the office, and if it is not done voluntarily mandamus is not excluded or avoided by the mere fact that there is another remedy, the law being that there must be no special and adequate remedy; and mandamus is the only adequate remedy for preventing the confusion in government matters, particularly as the Senate, and not the court, is the body to pass upon the correctness of the action of the executive so long as he keeps within the range of power confided to him. State, Atty. Gen., v. Johnson, 30 Fla. 433, 497, 18 L. R. A. 410 (1892).

Where the defendant is not an officer de facto, it is his duty to surrender to the relator the property of the office at the commencement of the relator's term. State, Jones, v. Oates, 36 Wis. 634 (1893).

Mandamus is a writ to restore a party to an office from which he has been illegally ousted, or to put him in possession of one which is illegally obtained from him, and to cause its books, papers, etc., to be delivered into his possession. Nelson v. Edwards, 55 Tex. 399 (1881).

At common law mandamus was the proper remedy to compel the transfer or delivery of the books, records, papers, seals, and other paraphernalia of a public office to the officer entitled to their custody, and by virtue of the writ the surrender of public belongings pertaining to the office could be compelled. Thompson v. Holt, supra.

In State v. Bruce, 3 Brev. 264, 270, 6 Am. Dec. 576 (1812), it is stated to be an established maxim of law that such writ is the proper remedy where there is a specific legal right, and no other specific legal right and operative remedy, upon reasons of justice and public policy, in order to preserve order and good government; and where any one has been unlawfully kept out, or dispossessed, of an office to which he is entitled, it lies to admit or to restore him.

Many circumstances may control the court in exercising its discretion, but where the relator shows a title, prima facie or otherwise, the mere fact that there is another person claiming the same office will not operate, in itself, to prevent an allowance of the writ. State, O'Donnel, v. Duman, 39 N. J. L. 677 (1877).

Mandamus will lie to command an ex officer, as a mayor or his deputy, to deliver up the books and papers and seal of office, and will not be defeated by a pretended exercise of the office de facto. People, Brewster, v. Kilduff, 15 Ill. 492, 60 Am. Dec. 799 (1854).

An officer whose term has expired may be compelled by mandamus to surrender to his successor all records, books, and papers pertaining to his office, where such officer on demand refuses to deliver the same. Fasnacht v. German Literary Assn., 99 Ind. 133 (1884); People, Fuller, v. Hilliard, 20 Ill. 413 (1862); Warner v. Myers, 4 Or. 72 (1870); Driscoll v. Jones, 1 S. D. 8 (1890); Lindsey v. Luckett, 20 Tex. 516 (1857).

It is the proper remedy to compel one, who has no color of title to an office, to surrender it to one who holds the prima facie title to it. State, Moore, v. Archibald (N. D.) 36 N. W. 234 (1896).

And in the absence of express statutory authority, it is the only practicable remedy to instate a claimant in office, and obtain the records and papers thereof. State, Butler, v. Callahan, 4 N. D. 481 (1895).

It is the proper remedy where one is lawfully entitled to the office. Metsker v. Neally, 41 Kan. 122 (1899).

Where the order directing mandamus to issue for the surrender of the books and papers belonging to an office is unqualified, it is a peremptory mandamus and is not the subject of an appeal because final in its character. Harwood v. Marshall, 9 Md. 83 (1856), Affirmed 10 Md. 451 (1857).

But it has been held that the writ should issue in the first instance in an alternative form, and that an order on petition directing a peremptory writ will be reversed upon appeal. Ibid.

It is well settled that mandamus will lie to compel the delivery of the books and papers belonging to the office upon refusal after demand therefor, where the relator holds an uncontested title to a public office, or his title has been adjudicated and finally established by a competent tribunal, and he is in possession of the office. State, Cannon, v.

Color of right may be by holding over after his term has expired.

If the office is full de facto mandamus will not remove the occupant, but quo warranto might be resorted to.

King v. Oxford, 6 Ad. & El. 349; Shortt, Mandamus, p. 122; People, Dolan, v. Lane, 55 N. Y. 217; People, Faile, v. Ferris, 76 N. Y. 326; Duane v. McDonald, 41 Conn. 517; Ang. & A. Corp. § 702; French v. Cowan, 79 Me. 426; High, Extr. Legal Rem. § 53; People, Hodgkinson, v. Stevens, 5 Hill. 625; Meredith v. Sacramento County Supers. 50 Cal. 434; People v. Olds, 3 Cal. 176, 58 Am. Dec. 898; Hull v. Shasta County Super. Ct. 63 Cal. 174; Re Torney and Re Stiner, 7 Misc. 260; People, Wren, v. Goetting, 133 N. Y. 569.

May, 106 Mo. 488, 509 (1891); Territory, Eisenmann, v. Shearer, 2 Dak. 332 (1881).

In American Railway-Frog Co. v. Haven, 101 Mass. 396, 403, 3 Am. Rep. 377 (1869), it was said to be well settled that mandamus would lie to compel a town clerk, or a clerk of a public corporation whose office had expired, to deliver over to his successor the common seal, books, papers, and records of the corporation which had belonged to his custody.

Where there is no other specific legal remedy, mandamus is the appropriate remedy in case of an ex officer, whether of a public or of a private corporation, county, church, or society, or the executor or widow of such officer, who refuses, upon demand made, to deliver to his successor in office the insignia, books, papers, etc., pertaining to such office. State, Cooper County, v. Trent, 58 Mo. 571 (1875).

And this is so for the reason that at the expiration of a term of office, it is the official duty of the officer to surrender the books of his office, and such duty does not become less an official one because neglected until the office has expired; and in such a case replevin is not a proper remedy. Keokuk v. Merriam, 44 Iowa, 432 (1876).

The writ also lies to compel an officer to pay to his successor money which is required by law to be applied to school purposes, where the prompt application of such money renders it necessary. Frisbie v. Fogg, 78 Ind. 269 (1881).

And where the object of the writ of mandamus is not only to restore to office one who has been illegally ousted, but also to cause the books, papers, and archives thereof to be delivered to his possession, the writ will operate as a more complete and effectual remedy than proceedings in the nature of quo warranto. Banton v. Wilson, 4 Tex. 400, 405 (1849).

By such writ the legal officer is put in the place of the intruder. Prince v. Skillin, 71 Me. 366, 36 Am. Rep. 825 (1890).

If one is entitled to the office of governor he may maintain it by mandamus. Goff v. Wilson, 32 W. Va. 393, 3 L. R. A. 58, 60 (1899).

Mandamus is the proper remedy to recover the books and papers appertaining to the office of town clerk wrongfully withheld by one claiming the title to such office as against one legally elected to fill such office, and such writ may be granted even on the application of the party so duly elected. Walter v. Belding, 24 Vt. 658 (1853).

In Taylor v. Henry, 2 Pick. 397, 402 (1824), the relator claimed the books and papers appertaining to the office of town clerk, to which office the record of the town's meeting showed that he was elected at an adjourned meeting, without showing from what meeting it was adjourned or the date thereof, and the court ordered the writ to issue.

The relator must show that a vacancy existed in the office, and that he was elected to fill it. Doane 81 L. R. A.

If defendant is in the office de facto in good faith, mandamus will not lie for the office, books, etc.

Spelling, Extraordinary Relief, §§ 1383, 1572; People, Willson, v. Mt. Vernon, 59 Hun, 204; Laurence v. Hanley, 84 Mich. 399.

Where there is an occupant of an office by color of right, the issue of a commission to the relator is not to be taken prima facie as an actual expulsion of the prior occupant.

People, Lockwood, v. Scrugham, 20 Barb. 302; Harwood v. Marshall, 10 Md. 451; People, Coleman, v. Dikeman, 7 How. Pr. 124; Frey v. Michie, 68 Mich. 323; Delgado v. Chavez (N. M.) 25 Pac. 948, 140 U. S. 586, 85 L. ed. 578.

Defendant is holding under color of right, because he was duly elected for the prior term.

v. Scannell, 7 Cal. 393, and 432 (1857); Taylor v. Henry supra.

It must be shown that the parties sought to be coerced were bound to act. People, Phillips, v. Lieb, 85 Ill. 484 (1877).

So, the petition must show upon its face that the relator has a clear right to the possession, and every material fact upon which the petitioner relies must be distinctly set forth. Lavalle v. Soucy, 96 Ill. 457 (1880).

In a case free from reasonable doubt in respect to the title to the office, it is the duty of the justice to proceed, and protect the party elected or appointed to office against the unlawful withholding by his predecessor of the books and papers of the office. People, Williamsou, v. Allen, 42 Barb. 208 (1864).

In New Jersey it has been held that members of a public body holding over until their successors are elected and qualified are not officers de facto in such a sense that a mandamus should not be allowed against them. State, Love, v. Freeholders of Hudson County, 36 N. J. L. 369 (1871); State, Clarke, v. Trenton Bd. of Health, 49 N. J. L. 349 (1887).

Where the appointment of the defendant to the office is clearly void, and the relator has a prima facie title to office, the mere fact that the former is an officer de facto will not of itself form an objection to proceedings against him to compel the delivery of the books and papers. Re Baker, 11 How. Pr. 418 (1855).

The remedy cannot be defeated nor can the officer be deprived of the possession of the books and papers of an office to which he has been regularly elected or appointed simply because another party claims to retain the same upon grounds which are frivolous or create no reasonable doubt in regard to such officer. Re North v. Cary, 4 Thomp. & C. 357 (1874).

If a claimant for office has given the bond, qualified, and received the commission of the office, he is entitled to mandamus to compel one holding from a previous term to surrender the custody of the books, files, office room, and other property of the office, but such remedy does not prejudice the question of the ultimate right to the office. State, Law, v. Saxon, 25 Fla. 792 (1899).

In Re Baker & Vandewarker, 44 Pa. 440 (1863), it was held that there was a regular and well-known remedy to compel public officers to do their whole duties, which remedy was by mandamus, and that therefore there was no need of inventing a new remedy which the court would not sanction.

In that case it was sought to compel a late justice of the peace to deliver over to his successor in office the docket upon a summary proceeding by way of petition and rule to show cause, which proceedings the court quashed and reversed.

In Burr v. Norton, 25 Conn. 103 (1856), the under-and under the Constitution is still entitled to hold until his successor is elected and qualified.

Const. art. 15, § 1; State, Everding, v. Simon, 20 Or. 377; Hamlin v. Kassafer, 15 Or. 460.

And the person elected to succeed one formerly elected and holding the office must be duly qualified to hold the office before he can oust the former incumbent.

State, Everding, v. Simon, 20 Or. 378; Taylor v. Sullivan, 45 Minn. 309, 11 L. R. A. 272; State, Snyder, v. Newman, 91 Mo. 445.

Therefore, if the person claiming to be elected as his successor dies before entering the office, or declines to take the office, or is ineligible to hold the office under the Constitution, then the defendant has title to the office and has a right to fill it until the next election.

State, Everding, v. Simon, supra; People v. Tilton, 37 Cal. 614.

keeper of the work-house and jail, who had been dismissed from the office, refused to deliver up to the sheriff the possession of the jail and the papers and documents relating thereto and to the work-house, and the court granted a mandamus to compel him to do so.

When an officer has been regularly suspended by the government, under § 15 of the executive article of the Constitution of Florida, for any cause recognized by that section, and the successor to the suspended officer has been regularly commissioned, the latter is entitled to the official property of the office, and mandamus is the proper remedy to compel the suspended officer to deliver it, and the newly appointed officer is not a necessary party to the proceedings, but the attorney general is a proper and sufficient relator. State, Atty. Gen., v. Johnson, 30 Fla. 433, 497, 18 L. R. A. 410 (1892).

In the case of People, Brewster, v. Kilduff, 15 Ill. 492, 60 Am. Dec. 769 (1854), the court granted mandamus to compel the mayor, who was in possession of the corporate seal and insignia of the office, to deliver them over to the relator who was the person entitled to the possession thereof, the court stating that mandamus was the proper remedy in such a case, the relator being the mayor elect, the question as to the title to the office being questionable only upon proceedings in quo warranto.

Where the officer, a county superintendent of schools, resigned his office, and his successor was appointed, and such superintendent qualified and entered upon the discharge of the duties of his office, it was held that mandamus was the proper remedy to compel him to deliver over the records appertaining to the office, and in such case an allegation of the eligibility of the successor is not necessary, the defendant admitting his resignation. McGee v. State, Artell, 103 Ind. 444 (1885).

In such a case it is not necessary to decide whether it is requisite to the validity of the appointment that the votes of the majority of the school trustees should have been received, or whether the votes of a plurality constituted a valid appointment. Ibid.

In Huffman v. Mills, 39 Kan. 577 (1888), the defense was that no proper canvass of the election returns relating to the office of sheriff had been made, and that the relator had never properly qualified for office. The facts showed that the election returns were made to the county clerk, that the board of county commissioners canvassed the returns, and that the county clerk issued the certificate of election under which the relator qualified, by taking the oath of office and executing the bond and filing the same with the county clerk, the bond being approved by the commissioners. The court held the relator had the right to obtain his office and granted a mandamus as prayed.

The rule that mandamus will compel the delivery of the books, etc., by the predecessor to the relator, has reference to instances where relator is exercising the office.

McGee v. State, Artell, 103 Ind. 444; Spelling, Extraordinary Relief, § 1510; State, Cannon, v. May, 106 Mo. 488.

The rule that mandamus is not the remedy to oust an incumbent in office is applicable only when the relator is clearly out and the incumbent is clearly in, the fullness of the office being the test.

State, Cannon, v. May, supra; Kelly v. Edwards, 69 Cal. 463.

Quo warranto, by our statute, is an adequate and specific remedy as it will exclude the defendant from the office and be enforced by "attachment of the body of the defendant."

Code, §§ 365, 368; Kelly v. Edwards, supra;

So, in State, Sternberg, v. Legarde, 21 La. Ann. 18 (1869), petitioner, who alleged himself to be the de jure and de facto sheriff of the parish, applied for mandamus to compel his predecessor in office to deliver to him the room, keys, papers, records, books, and documents and other things pertaining to the office of sheriff, and a peremptory writ of mandamus was issued from which the defendant appealed. The court held that the defendant had no right to appeal, as it did not appear from the records that the value of the articles exceeded $500, the court being without jurisdiction ratione materiae, the matter of dispute not being the title to the office but to the documents relating thereto; the order was therefore affirmed and the appeal dismissed.

Where mandamus was applied for to compel the surrender of the office of state librarian, the court stated the law to be, that whenever there was a right to execute an office, perform a service, or exercise a franchise, more especially if it was in the matter of a public concern, or attended with profit, and a person was kept out of possession or dispossessed of such right, and had no other specific remedy, the court ought to assist by mandamus upon reasons of justice as the writ expressed, and that upon reasons of public policy, to observe peace, order, and good government, it ought to be used on all occasions where the law had established no specific remedy, and where in justice and good government there ought to be one. Harwood v. Marshall, 9 Md. 33 (1856).

In Cecil County Comrs. v. Banks, 30 Md. 321 (1894), the county treasurer, appointed under the Maryland act of 1894, chap. 25, made demand of office upon the county commissioners, and to have the books and papers belonging to the office delivered to him and also all records and books of the county commissioners' office, which books and papers were then in the possession and custody of the county commissioners. The answer, which admitted the demand for admission to office and for the delivery of the books and papers, but claimed that the office was then filled by one who claimed to retain it, and the books and papers belonging thereto, was demurred to, and the court sustained the demurrer. Upon appeal the order was affirmed, the court stating that as the party in possession was not a mere trespasser but the servant of the commissioners, the latter were bound to comply with the demand, and that therefore both the commissioners and such person were amenable to the writ; and further, that the fact that such a writ had been ordered to be issued against such third person in no way deprived the circuit court of authority to order the writ against the county commissioners.

Again, in Conlin v. Aldrich, 98 Mass. 557 (1868), mandamus was issued against the members of a school committee and another, requiring the for-

High, Extr. Legal Rem. § 349; Lewis v. Whitte, 77 Va. 415.

When the facts are admitted, and the whole case is before the court, the court will deny the writ when it appears that the plaintiff has no right.

State, Mason, v. Paterson, 35 N. J. L. 190; Spelling, Extraordinary Relief, § 1572; Howard v. Gage, 6 Mass. 462; Elliott v. Oliver, 22 Or. 44.

A certificate of election is not a prima facie title to the office, where it discloses on its face that it is void, or the petition shows it to be void.

Conklin v. Cunningham (N. M.) 88 Pac. 170.

If it appears from the writ in this case that the plaintiff was ineligible, then the writ will not lie, and that question may be raised in this proceeding.

State, Snyder, v. Newman, 91 Mo. 445; People, Sherwood, v. State Canvassers, 129 N. Y. 360, 14 L. R. A. 646; People, Gibson, v. Sheffield, 47 Hun, 481; People, Henry, v. Nostrand, 46 N. Y. 375; People, Steinert, v. Anthony, 6 Hun, 142; Burditt v. Barry, Id. 657; State, McNeill, v. Somers, 96 N. C. 467; Worthy v. Barrett, 63 N. C. 199.

Mandamus will not put a person in possession of an office when it is disclosed by her petition that she would be a usurper, from which it would be the duty of the state to remove her.

People, Sherwood, v. State Canvassers, supra; mer to permit the relator to act as a member, and such other person to refrain from acting as such, or to show cause to the contrary, and the court allowed the writ.

So, in Sudbury v. Stearns, 21 Pick. 148, 151 (1839), where the action was in trover to recover the books of record of the parish, the court stated that while it had no doubt that either trover or replevin would lie in such a case, the property of the records being in the parish, and the clerk of the parish being the officer designed by law to hold and keep them, the parish might take such records from a stranger having possession of them by proper action, and recover damages for such detention, yet mandamus would be a more appropriate and effectual remedy to compel the delivery of the records to the legal officer.

And in Lawrence v. Hanley, 84 Mich. 399 (1901), mandamus was granted to compel the respondent to return to the relator, as chairman of the board of county auditors, the books belonging to the said board. The court stated that when a person in office de jure et de facto was interfered with by one whose lack of title was plain and governed by adjudicated cases, it was not only proper, but best, to settle the question by mandamus.

In State, State Savings, Bldg. & L. Assn., v. Davis, 64 Mo. App. 447, 450 (1893), the retiring secretary resisted the proceedings, upon the ground that he was the lawful secretary of the association and therefore entitled to possession, and also upon the ground that before he could be compelled to surrender his account as secretary must be properly audited and settled, and upon the further ground that the election of the new board was illegal and void; but the court held that, the defendant's office having expired, it was his absolute legal duty, whether his accounts as secretary had been adjusted or not, to deliver up on demand all property which had come into his possession by virtue of his office, an adjustment of his accounts being a matter which could be dealt with as well after as before delivery.

So, in State, Davis, v. Bacon, 6 Neb. 286, 295 (1877), it was said that an action by mandamus could lie to compel an officer to deliver up property of the state held by him without right or authority of law.

Again, in State, Dodson, v. Meeker, 19 Neb. 444 (1896), where mandamus was sought to compel the respondent to surrender to the relator possession of the office to the clerk of the district court, from which office the respondent had, upon complaint filed with the board charging him with violations of the law, been removed, and the relator had on the same day been appointed to fill the vacancy and duly qualified by taking oath and giving the bond, upon a demand and refusal of possession, the court held mandamus was the proper remedy, the removal of the respondent being valid in law, a 31 L. R. A.

vacancy being created which the county board had authority to fill, the judgment of removal not being superseded by any proceedings in error.

And where, by virtue of an act of the state legislature, certain records and suits should have been transferred from one county to another, it was held that mandamus would lie to compel the county clerk to transfer such records. State, Hooten, v. McKinney, 6 Nev. 194 (1869).

In Kimball v. Lamprey, 19 N. H. 215 (1848), a mandamus was held to be the proper remedy to compel the delivery of books and papers pertaining to the office of selectmen, by the defendants who claimed to hold and exercise the office.

So, in State, O'Donnel, v. Dusman, 39 N. J. L. 67 (1877), mandamus was allowed to compel the delivery of books and papers belonging to the office of the township treasurer of a certain county, the relator claiming the office by virtue of his appointment by the committee who claimed to have been elected.

And in State, Newark & N. Y. R. Co., v. Goll, 32 N. J. L. 285 (1867), mandamus was allowed against the retiring secretary of the company to compel him to deliver over the books and papers relating to the office of secretary, which he had refused to surrender after demand made, although such books were purchased by him out of his own money, the court holding that such books were the property of the company and therefore his possession was that of the company, and that in such a case he had no lien.

Where a party has been in possession of the books and papers of the office, and has in one instance performed some duty appertaining to the office, he is an officer de facto, and the title of the respective claimants will not be looked into de jure. The abstract right of the applicant is unimportant where possession is clearly shown, and it will not be inquired into, further than to see that, if in possession, he has color of title, and being in office under color of right he should have had the proceedings to get the books and papers. And, on the other hand, having the best possible right to an office one should not have possession of the books and papers by the proceeding under the New York Revised Statute, while it was apparent that he was not in occupancy of the office, and not in a situation to exercise the functions of it. Conover's Case, 5 Abb. Pr. 74, 79 (1867).

In State, Butler, v. Callahan, 4 N. D. 481 (1896), it was said that where a de facto officer is exercising official functions under color of right, the writ of mandamus will not issue to dispossess him, but where an incumbent is holding over after the expiration of his term and until a successor is elected and qualified, and has no other claim to the office, he is not such a de facto officer as against a candidate who holds the proper certificate of election and has qualified for the office in manner and form directed by law, such incumbent being a mere intruder as against such relator.

In State, Moore, v. Archibald (N. D.) 66 N. W. 234 (1896), the superintendent of the state hospital for the insane, which, by law, was under the general management and control of the board of trustees, who had power to appoint and remove, having been removed by the board and his successor appointed, it was held that he might be compelled by mandamus to turn over such office to his successor, the sovereignty of the state being involved in a direct and important sense; the right of the board of trustees to control and manage such institution being involved.

Where the specific and only object sought, and the specific and only subject covered by the alternative writ, were the immediate and present possession of the seal and other property appertaining to the clerk's office, the court held the relator was entitled to proceed by mandamus, unless he had another plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law. Cameron v. Parker (Okla.) 38 Pac. 14 (1894).

In Warner v. Myers, 4 Or. 72 (1870), mandamus was granted to compel the defendant to deliver to the plaintiff the county jail and its appurtenances and property belonging to the county. The court held that under the provisions of the Oregon Code of Civil Procedure, § 583, the office of the writ was precisely the same as it was at common law, and might be issued to any inferior court, corporation, board, officer, or person to compel the performance of an act which the law specifically enjoins as a duty resulting from the office of trust or station.

In Wadsworth v. Reel, 15 Pa. Co. Ct. 440 (1894), a peremptory writ of mandamus was allowed against the defendant authorizing him to deliver up to his successor in office all the records, documents, and papers appertaining to the office of alderman then in his possession.

Where the defendant contended that the proceedings should be by quo warranto, the court stated that although in such proceedings the judgment would be one of ouster against the defendant and in favor of the plaintiff, yet it would not put the plaintiff in possession of the records of the office to which such judgment would establish his title, and that therefore he might still be obliged to resort to mandamus to obtain the possession, and for that reason mandamus was the proper remedy. Driscoll v. Jones, 1 S. D. 8 (1890).

In the above case the specific and only object sought by the plaintiff and covered by the alternative writ was the immediate and present possession of the seal and other property pertaining to the office of clerk of the district court, which office was abolished by the Constitution upon the admission of South Dakota as a state, the office of the clerk of the circuit court being created in its stead by the Constitution, the latter office being 31 L. R. A.

filled by the board of county commissioners under § 37, art. 5, of the state Constitution.

In Cunningham v. O'Connor, 12 Lea, 397 (1888), mandamus was issued to compel the delivery of certain books alleged to belong to the land office of a certain district, of which plaintiff contended that he was elected register for a term of four years, and had qualified by taking oath and giving bond; and further alleged that the defendant's term of office had expired, and that he was pretending to hold said office without authority of law.

Where the plaintiff petitioned the district court for mandamus requiring the defendant to deliver to him the office of clerk of the court, and also the books and papers appertaining to such office, and the facts showed the plaintiff's election to and qualification for such office and his performance of the duties until a certain date, when the defendant, by virtue of a pretended election, claimed to be the lawful incumbent, and the plaintiff, according to the advice of the chief justice, handed over the books and papers of the office to the defendant, but denied that he thereby transferred the right and immunities of such office and asserted that he had retained and reserved the same to himself until the term for which he had been elected elapsed,—the court held that mandamus was the proper remedy in such a case, the plaintiff having been illegally ousted from office. Bradley v. McCrabb, Dall. Dec. (Tex.) 504 (1843).

In Stone v. Small, 54 Vt. 498 (1882), mandamus was granted to compel the old trustees of an incorporated village to deliver over to their successors in office the books, papers, and property belonging to the office, to which office the petitioners had been duly elected according to the provisions of the act incorporating the village.

So, in Lewis v. Whittle, 77 Va. 415 (1883), the relators, appointed by the governor as a board of visitors of the medical college, claimed mandamus to command the defendant, who previously constituted such board, to deliver to the petitioners the possession thereof, and the petition set forth the appointment of the petitioners and claimed the rights of the college by reason of the appointment, all of which the defendant denied and claimed to be the lawful visitors. The court stated that such writ would lie where there was a right to execute an office, perform a service, or exercise a franchise, more especially if it was a matter of public concern, and a person dispossessed of such right had no other specific adequate remedy, the writ being granted on reasons of public policy to preserve the peace, good order, and good government, the doctrine of that court being that mandamus was the true specific remedy for a wrongful deprivation of an office.

And where one has been duly elected and qualified to the office of county judge he is entitled to the writ, as against his predecessor in office, for the

In Bridges v. Shallcross, 6 W. Va. 532 (1873), the mandamus issued against the defendant, commanding him to admit the petitioner to the office of superintendent of the penitentiary, and to surrender to him the possession and charge thereof, and to turn over to him all the property pertaining to the office.

Where one was elected the mayor of a town, and the opposing candidate took possession of the office, and the circuit court rendered judgment by ouster against such party, and he sued out a writ of error which operated as a supersedeas to such judgment, and the party elected alleged that the court had no jurisdiction of the writ of error, and applied for a mandamus commanding the circuit court to issue process for the execution of the judgment.—It was held that under the 13th section of the judiciary act of 1789, the supreme court judge had power to issue writs of mandamus to any courts appointed or persons holding office under the United States. Re United States v. Addison, 63 U. S. 22 How. 174, 16 L. ed. 304 (1859).

In the case of People, Coleman, v. Dikeman, 7 How. Pr. 124, 129 (1852), the court stated that the case of People, Griffin, v. Steele, 2 Barb. 398 (1848), extended the remedy by mandamus much further than that court had gone, against corporations and ministerial officers, but that the authorities quoted by the judge who decided that case did not warrant the extension of the rule in such cases beyond its ancient and well-settled limits.

II. Necessity of a demand and refusal.

In order that a writ of mandamus may issue, there must have been a refusal to do that which was the object of the writ to enforce, either in direct terms or by circumstances distinctly showing an intention in the party not to do the act required. Colt v. Elliott, 28 Ark. 294, 296 (1873).

Where it was contended on the part of the defendant that no demand had been made, the court stated that it was settled that when it could be conclusively implied from the conduct of the person against whom the writ was sought that there would be a refusal to comply, a literal demand was not required, neither was it essential in cases affecting public offices or duties, for the reason that omission or neglect under such circumstances became a refusal. Conklin v. Cunningham (N. M.) 38 Pac. 170 (1894).

In McDiarmid v. Fitch, 27 Ark. 106 (1871), mandamus was allowed to compel the register, whose duties had expired, to deliver the original books to the clerk of the county after demand made for same.

(1881), an alternative writ of mandamus was applied for to compel the defendant to take and deliver to the relator all the papers and property pertaining to the office of register of deeds and ex officio county clerk. The writ which was granted returnable at chambers outside of the subdivision of the judicial district was demurred to upon the ground that there was no jurisdiction to make it so returnable, and for the reason that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and that it did not recite the want of adequate remedy at law; and for the further reason that the act of February 22, 1879, did not consolidate the two counties, nor abolish the defendant's office of register of deeds and ex officio county clerk of one of such counties. The court held that there was sufficient jurisdiction to warrant the issuance of the writ, the act of 1879 consolidating the two counties and abolishing such office in one county, and that therefore the relator was entitled to the writ, the parties sufficiently showing the want of adequate remedy at law although there was no formal allegation thereof, it being shown by abundant proof that the relator had demanded the delivery of the papers and property, and that there was a refusal on the defendant's part to comply with the demand.

There must be a demand and refusal before a mandamus will be absolutely issued. Leonard v. House, 15 Ga. 473 (1854).

In Com. v. Athearn, 3 Mass. 285, 286 (1807), it was stated that the proper remedy to be taken by a successor to an office was for such successor to take the oath of office, and to demand of the predecessor the records of the office, and if they were refused then to move for a mandamus to compel him to deliver over the records. In that case the court refused an information in the nature of a quo warranto against the town clerk who was elected for one year.

But in the case of Re Cobee, 8 How. Pr. 367 (1853), the defendant showed cause against the application made under N. Y. Rev. Stat. § 54, upon the ground that no notice had been given to him by any of the canal commissioners requiring him to surrender up the office, or the books and papers therein, to the relator or to any other person; that the only demand ever made was that of the relator himself which was not accompanied by any notice or request from the canal commissioners to deliver up the books. The court held that it was not necessary to prove notice served by the canal commissioners in proceedings under such statute.

Where a board of commissioners had been appointed by the comptroller it was held that by such appointment the former board no longer held office, and that their detention of the books and papers of the office was a personal detention of the same and not the detention of the board, and therefore a demand upon them as individuals was sufficient, and that such new board were enti-

Mandamus will not lie to try title to a public office, but it will lie to compel a predecessor in office to turn over to his successor the books, papers, and records belonging and appertaining to a public office, where the plaintiff shows in himself either an absolute or prima facie title thereto, and a certificate of election regular upon its face and qualifying as the law requires is sufficient prima facie title.

tion to the possession thereof. People, Williamson, v. Allen, 42 Barb. 203 (1844).

Where mandamus lies to compel the delivery of the records, muniments, and official belongings of a public office to a successor holding a prima facie or absolute title emanating from the authority constituted by law to convey it, after demand, the title to the office is not in controversy, nor can it be put in issue. Cameron v. Parker (Okla.) 38 Pac. 14 (1894).

Where it was shown that the duty to take and deliver the books and papers pertaining to his office without demand was imposed upon the defendant by statute, it was held that the action fell within § 695 of the Dakota Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that mandamus may issue to compel the performance of an act specially enjoined by law as a duty resulting from an office. Territory, Eisenmann, v. Shearer, 2 Dak. 332 (1881).

See also Thompson v. Holt, 52 Ala. 491, 497 (1875), and Ramsey, County Supers. v. Heenan, 2 Minn. 330 (1858) infra, V.; Fasnacht v. German Literary Assn. 99 Ind. 133 (1884), and State, Cannon, v. May, 106 Mo. 488, 509 (1891), supra, I.

III. Effect of such surrender.

A writ of mandamus does not settle or determine the right to office; its effect is to fill the office by putting the relator in the possession of it when vacant, so that the right may be tried on quo warranto. Com. v. Philadelphia County Comrs. 6 Whart. 476, 482 (1841).

So, a judgment for the relator in mandamus proceedings does not determine the final rights of possession, but simply determines that the relator has a right to immediate possession under his prima facie title. State, Jones, v. Oates, 88 Wis. 634 (1893).

The surrender of the books and papers of the office amounts to a mere recognition of the relator's prima facie title under the canvass and election certificate, and will not affect any right of the defendant to contest the election of the relator in a proper proceeding. Ibid.

As the court cannot go behind the certificate of election, they can only determine whether or not the relator has received the office on election, given the bond, and taken the oath required by law, and if he has performed such acts he is prima facie the successor elected and qualified, and as such entitled to the possession of the articles demanded, until, in a proper proceeding for that purpose, his title to the office has been tried and found defective. State, Atherton, v. Sherwood, 15 Minn. 221, 2 Am. Rep. 116 (1870).

And such prima facie title is conclusive until the right to the office is ultimately determined on a quo warranto or information in the nature thereof. Plowman v. Thornton, 52 Ala. 559 (1875).

IV. Sufficiency of title to support.

In order to entitle a party to maintain such a writ the petition must state facts which show, if true, that he has a clear right to the performance of the thing declared, and that it was plainly the duty of his predecessor in office to perform the duty required. Houston Tap & B. R. Co. v. Randolph, 24 Tex. 317 (1859).

A person elected to an office will be deemed in full possession of it on his taking the requisite oath, provided no other condition is prescribed, but it is otherwise as against one already in actual possession under color of right, though he be not an officer de jure. People, Hodgkinson, v. Stevens, 5 Hill, 616 (1843).

In a case where the respondents insisted that inasmuch as they were actually in possession of the office in question under a claim of right, exercising the functions annexed to it, the only mode of controverting their title was by a writ of quo warranto, the court stated that the fact that the offices were de facto filled and occupied by rival claimants was by no means decisive, nor perhaps material upon the point, and that the court had so decided in the case of conflicting claims to the office of county commissioners, and also in the case of members of the school committee. American Railway-Frog Co. v. Haven, 101 Mass. 398, 403, 3 Am. Rep. 377 (1869), the court following its prior decisions in Re Strong, 20 Pick. 434 (1833), and Conlin v. Aldrich, 98 Mass. 557 (1868).

Where an office is vacated, and one with claim and color of title assumes such office and enters upon the discharge of the duties thereof, he will be held an officer de facto entitled to possession, and the mere fact of his forcible removal from the premises where the business of the office is transacted will not affect his right to the office. Re Conover v. Devlin, 24 Barb. 587, 609 (1857).

In the above case the court further stated that it doubted whether a party not in possession of an office, and therefore not in a condition to exercise the functions, should in any case have the possession of the books and papers of it awarded to him in a summary manner, even though his title to the office was perfect, and inclined to the opinion that, on the other hand, a party in an office with color of title and performing the duties of the office should have been.

The above statement of the law was dissented from in the subsequent hearings of the above case in 5 Abb. Pr. 315, and 6 Abb. Pr. 236, 237, the court, on the former hearing, holding that the court had no jurisdiction to commit the defendants because the relator showed upon the face of his papers that his appointment was unauthorized, and conferred upon him no authority to take or hold the office, and because he sought, on the face of the complaint, to take such books and papers from one who claimed to hold the office by a better title than himself, and on the last hearing of the case, which was upon an application for certiorari, the court inclined to the same opinion.

These two opinions were further approved of by the court in the case of People, Williamson, v. Allen, 42 Barb. 203, 209 (1864), the court holding that the justice, before whom the proceedings were made, to obtain the delivery of the books and papers appertaining to an office, must examine the question of the title of the respective claimants to the office so far as to enable him to determine properly the question to be submitted, but that, if the right of the applicant was not free from any reasonable doubt, the summary relief provided for by the statute (1 N. Y. Rev. Stat. chap. 125) must be denied; and further, that if the title of the applicant was free from reasonable doubt he was absolutely entitled to the assistance which the statute contemplated.

In People, Sedgwick, v. Shear (Cal.) 15 Pac. 92 (1887), the defendant, who had been removed from his office as prison superintendent by the board of supervisors who appointed a successor, had refused to surrender the office, upon the ground that his removal was illegal no cause for his removal from office being originally assigned, and upon the ground that such removal was not made as provided for by the California act of March 31, 1876, which declared that such superintendent should only be removed for just and sufficient legal cause after a fair and impartial investigation of his case by said supervisors. A cause for removal being subsequently assigned, the court held that the defendant was properly removed from office, and sustained the order of the court below upon the authority of the cases of Smith v. Brown, 60 Cal. 672 (1881), and People v. Hill, 7 Cal. 97 (1857).

So, it has been held that it is incumbent upon the relator to show that he has a clear right to the office in question as the first requisite to entitle him to a mandamus. People, Coleman, v. Dikeman, 7 How. Pr. 124 (1852).

And it must also be shown that the party sought to be coerced was bound to act. People, Phillips, v. Lieb, 85 Ill. 484 (1877).

The claimant must show a prima facie title. Doane v. Scannell, 7 Cal. 393, and 432 (1857).

As a general rule in an action in mandamus where a relator shows a prima facie title to a public office he is entitled to the aid of mandamus to obtain possession of the books, records, insignia, paraphernalia, and official belongings of such office, and in granting the writ the court will not go behind such showing and try the title thereto. *Ewing v. the surrender of the books and papers belonging to the office of county superintendent of common schools of Union county. The facts are that at the election in June, 1894, the plaintiff received a plurality of all the votes cast, obtained a certificate of election to the office, and, having qualified as required by law, demanded the said books and papers of the defendant, and, upon his refusal to comply therewith, sued out an alternative writ of mandamus, requiring him to deliver them to her, or show cause why he had not done so. A demurrer to the writ having been overruled, the defendant, for a return thereto, after denying the material allegations contained therein, alleged that the plaintiff was a woman, and by reason thereof was ineligible to hold the office, that in June, 1892, he was elected superintend-

2 Okla. 94 (1894); Cameron v. Parker (Okla.) 38 Pac. 14 (1894).

And this is so for the reason that a prima facie title to a public office confers a right to exercise its functions, and a right to the possession of the insignia and property thereof, and upon such prima facie title the court will compel the delivery of the insignia and property, in order that the functions and duties of the office may be exercised. Thompson v. Holt, 52 Ala. 491, 497 (1875); State, Atherton, v. Sherwood, 15 Minn. 221, 2 Am. Rep. 116 (1870); State, Moore, v. Archibald (N. D.) 66 N. W. 234 (1894); State, O'Donnell, v. Dusanan, 30 N. J. L. 677 (1871).

If the relator had the right to be admitted to the office on a prima facie title, and hold it pending a contest, the right may be enforced by mandamus. State, Jones, v. Oates, 86 Wis. 634 (1893).

Justice and public interest will best be promoted by giving effect to the prima facie title to an office, whenever the facts proving it are not disputed, and the proceeding in which the question of title arises is one in which an inquiry into matters behind those facts are not allowable, a prima facie title being a good and sufficient title until overcome. Re Baker, 11 How. Pr. 418 (1855).

The decision of a board of canvassers upon the result of an election, no matter how erroneous in its conclusions from the facts, is sufficient to give color of right to one taking possession of an office under it. People, Hodgkinson, v. Stevens, 5 Bull. 616 (1843).

After a person has been declared elected by a competent tribunal, it may seem to be necessary upon mandamus to determine, as a preliminary or collateral question, whether it has been so declared, and his right to sue may depend upon it; therefore in such a case, admitting proof of the fact is not such a trial of the right to the office as would compel proceedings in the nature of a quo warranto. Warner v. Myers, 3 Or. 218, 221 (1870).

But the validity of the election and the right to take and hold office cannot be inquired into in a collateral action or proceeding. Satterlee v. San Francisco, 23 Cal. 314, 320 (1863).

Neither in the case of an officer appointed by an executive and confirmed by the board can an officer to whom the application is made go behind the appointment and confirmation to investigate fraud and corruption, even if they would vitiate the appointment or the evidence was sufficient to justify the charge. People, Kilbourn, v. Allen, 51 How. Pr. 97 (1857).

Pending a contest as to the election the relator's right to possession is perfect as against every one except a de facto officer holding under color of authority. State, Jones, v. Oates, 86 Wis. 634 (1893).

When the relator shows a certificate of election to an office regular upon its face, or any lawful evidence of title later and superior to any other ent, and qualified as such; and that he was holding over under color and claim of right, and was entitled to the insignia of the office. A demurrer to the return having been sustained, the court awarded a peremptory mandamus, from which judgment the defendant appeals, and contends that, he being in possession of the office under color and claim of right, mandamus will not lie to oust him therefrom, and that the plaintiff is ineligible to hold the office, while the plaintiff insists that having obtained the certificate of election, and qualified as required by law, she has a prima facie right to the books and papers, which mandamus will compel the defendant to deliver to her, and that the question of her eligibility cannot be tried in this proceeding.

To entitle the defendant to invoke the rule claimant, and that he has qualified as required by law, he may be deemed to have a prima facie title to the office sufficient to support mandamus. Ewing v. Turner, 2 Okla. 94 (1894).

The certificate of a board of canvassers of election returns is competent evidence of the election of the relator. Warner v. Myers, supra.

And if he holds the certificate of election it is sufficient. State, O'Donnell, v. Dumas, 39 N. J. L. 677 (1877).

No matter whether the certificate of election be rightfully or wrongfully given, it confers upon the person holding it the prima facie right of holding for the term, which right is subject to be defeated only by the voluntary surrender of the office, or by a judicial determination of the right. People, Benoit, v. Miller, 16 Mich. 56, 59 (1867).

If the office is an elective one, and the result has been declared in favor of the applicant, the officer cannot go back of the election as declared, to investigate the legality of the votes cast nor the bribery of voters. People, Kilbourn, v. Allen, supra.

And in such a case the form of notice of election or the ballots thereat will not be inquired into. State, Franci, v. Dodson, 21 Neb. 218, 222 (1887).

For the purposes of the proceeding by way of mandamus the certificate of election is conclusive evidence of the right of the relator to the possession of the office. Ibid.

A person producing a certificate of election from the proper election officers, with proof that he has taken the constitutional oath of office and filed the same and given the necessary undertaking, where one was required by law, is entitled to the delivery to him of the books and papers pertaining to such office. Re Foley, 8 Misc. 196 (1894).

The party holding the commission or certificate of election regular on its face, evidencing an absolute and prima facie title to the office, is entitled to the possession of the books, records, and official belongings thereto, notwithstanding the actual title may be in controversy at the time in the same or another tribunal. Cameron v. Parker (Okla.) 38 Pac. 14 (1894).

And this is so even though it may be true that the courts will sometimes inquire incidentally into the title to the office in determining who is entitled to the official belongings thereof, yet the court will not do so unless the relator at the same time proves, in himself, at least, a prima facie title thereto. Ewing v. Turner, 2 Okla. 94 (1894).

An election gives the right to the office, and the decision of the tribunals fixed by law to try the contest simply declares the title upon the evidence, but does not create or confer it, and having the title by virtue of election the qualification of the party so elected entitles him to exercise the duties of the office. Goff v. Wilson, 32 W. Va. 393, 3 L. R. A. 58, 60 (1899).

of law for which he contends, it must appear that he has a colorable title to the office, and was in possession of it, and discharging the duties thereof, under a claim of right. The return shows that in June, 1892, he was elected to the office in question, and, under the statute, was entitled to hold it for a term of two years, or until his successor was chosen and had qualified. Hill's Code, § 2386. An examination of the writ discloses that in June, 1894, the plaintiff was chosen as his successor, and qualified as required by law (Id. § 2587); hence the defendant's term of office had expired, unless he had a private interest in the ensuing term, by reason of the plaintiff's alleged ineligibility. The right of an officer to hold over after the expiration of his term exists only in cases where there is no legally

A certificate of election regular in form and signed by the proper authority constitutes prima facie evidence of title to the office which can only be set aside by such proceedings for contesting the election as the law provides. La Pointe Supers. v. O'Malley, 46 Wis. 85, 57 (1879); State, Atty. Gen., v. Vall, 53 Mo. 97 (1873).

In an elective office the law requires that the evidence or credentials of the persons declared duly elected shall be a certificate of election, or in an appointive one a commission from the governor, these being the highest evidence of title the law requires, and therefore, a private individual cannot assert the invalidity of the law authorizing it, the want of authority for its issuance or the illegal exercise of the power conferring it otherwise, being questions for the court to determine. Cameron v. Parker, supra.

If the refusal to deliver the possession of the office for a day or a week or for two weeks will constitute a predecessor an officer de facto so as to compel the party declared elected to proceed by way of quo warranto to oust him before any action could be taken to compel him to deliver the books, papers, and moneys belonging to such office, then the whole effect and force of a certificate of election would be avoided unless the person elected should commence proceedings immediately to recover such books, papers, or money. La Pointe Supers. v. O'Malley, supra.

In proceedings by way of mandamus the court cannot go behind the canvass evidenced by the certificate of election to office, and inquire as to the notice of election or the form of the ballots cast thereat, but will only inquire as to whether the office is one which could be lawfully filled at said election, and whether the relator, by virtue of the canvass thereof, has received a certificate of election thereat, and was duly qualified for such office by taking the prescribed oath and giving the bond required by law, and if such requirements have been filled mandamus will issue to compel the surrender of the office and the delivery of the books and papers relating thereto. State, Franci, v. Dodson, 21 Neb. 218, 222 (1887).

So, the appointment and commission by the governor are sufficient to give the applicant a prima facie title to the office. Wenner v. Smith, 4 Utah, 238 (1886).

A title founded on a commission from the governor issuing on a certificate of election or a certificate disclosing a vacancy in the office, made by the officer having authority to certify it, until vacated by a judicial determination in a proper proceeding, shows a prima facie title to the office free from all reasonable doubt, and this is so whether the certificate be true or false. Plowman v. Thornton, 52 Ala. 559 (1875).

In State, Atherton, v. Sherwood, 15 Minn. 221, 2:

elected and qualified successor, for when the rights of the successor vest, those of the incumbent terminate. State, Elliott, v. Bemenderfer, 96 Ind. 374. If the election of the plaintiff was not legally authorized, the defendant would continue to hold the office, by force of the express provisions of the statute. State, Ewerding, v. Simon, 20 Or. 365; State, Loring, v. Benedict, 15 Minn. 198 (Gil. 152); People v. Tilton, 37 Cal. 614. The defendant, being in office by virtue of a prior election, was not a mere usurper. Hamlin v. Kassaffer, 15 Or. 457. And the statute which provides that he should hold the office until his successor is elected and qualified gives him a colorable title; and, if it should be found, in a proper proceeding, that the plaintiff is ineligible, he would have a private interest in the term which would entitle him to hold over. Taylor v. Sullivan, 45 Minn. 309, 11 L. R. A. 272. When a certificate of election has been issued to another, who has qualified thereunder, it is the duty of an incumbent of a public office, at the expiration of his term, to surrender the office to his successor; and should he then desire to contest the eligibility, election, or qualification of the person so holding the certificate, he may do so by proceeding in the manner prescribed by law for determining contested claims to office. State, Atty. Gen. v. Johnson, 30 Fla. 433, 18 L. R. A. 410. It would seem to follow that when the official term of an incumbent has expired, and his successor has been elected and qualified, his term is either suspended or terminated; and while he may have a colorable title and private interest in the ensuing term,

Am. Rep. 116 (1870), the court stated that it was immaterial in proceedings by way of mandamus to compel the delivery of the books and papers appertaining to an office, whether or not the relator was eligible or was duly elected to the office, for the reason that to try every issue would be to try the title.

The truth of the matters contained in the certificate of election cannot be entertained in a proceeding which is merely collateral and not directly to determine the title to office. Where, however, the certificate discloses facts which by legal construction show that no vacancy existed in the office, this destroys the certificate, and will not support a commission based upon it, no prima facie right to the office being shown. Plowman v. Thornton, supra.

The court is only to determine whether or not the relator has received the certificate of election and given the bond and taken the oath required by law, and if he has done so he has a prima facie title and is the successor elected and qualified, and, as such, entitled to the possession of the office and documents relating thereto until, in a proper proceeding for that purpose, his title to the office shall be tried and found defective. State, Atherton, v. Sherwood, supra.

In order that a relator may obtain mandamus to compel the delivery of the books and papers relating to his office, he must show that he has a clear right to require the respondent to deliver possession to him, and if the validity of the election is contested upon appeal he has no such right to possession pending such appeal. Allen v. Robinson, 17 Minn. 113 (1871).

Where the evidence of the title of the claimant to the office was the commission signed by the governor under seal of the state, countersigned by the secretary, it was held that such commission, whether granted on a certificate of election or a certificate of vacancy, was the highest and best evidence of one who was the officer, until a quo warranto, or a proceeding in the nature thereof, annulled it by a judicial determination, as such commission imparted to the courts judicial notice, and in a proceeding by mandamus, or under the statute to compel the transfer of the property of the office, is a clear prima facie title to the office on which the courts will proceed without indulging in inquiries behind it, when such commission was founded on a certificate of election or a certificate disclosing a vacancy made by a proper authority; and on such prima facie title the court must rest and award the keeping of the property of the office without adjudicating whether the relator has or has not the actual title. Thompson v. Holt, 52 Ala. 491, 497 (1875).

Where the petitioner alleged that he was duly elected and qualified for sheriff and ex officio tax collector, and that the defendant was immediately and prior to a given date the under sheriff and deputy tax collector, which allegations were admitted, the court held that from them as facts the inference was fairly deducible that the petitioner was the complete incumbent. Hull v. Shasta County Super. Ct. 68 Cal. 174 (1893).

Where the petition, under §1015, 1016, of the California Political Code, alleged that the petitioner was duly elected and qualified as sheriff and tax collector of the county, and as such was entitled to the books and papers in the defendant's possession, it was held that under the sections of the statute he was entitled to recover the same on petition and to have the same enforced by an order for a warrant commanding the constable of the county to search for and deliver the same to him. Notice of the petition being given. Ibid.

A relator holding the certificate of election to the office of the clerk of a district court, having given bond and taken the oath as required by law is entitled upon mandamus to the possession of the seal, records, and papers of office as against a person holding such office until his successor is elected and qualified; and in such a case the court will not inquire into the certificate of election or consider the question as to whether or not the relator was entitled to the office. State, Atherton, v. Sherwood, 15 Minn. 221, 2 Am. Rep. 116 (1870).

In proceedings by way of mandamus to compel the surrender of an office and the books and papers relating thereto, the relator's cause of action consists solely in his having been canvassed and declared elected, awarded a certificate of election, taken the oath and given the bond required by law, and the respondent having refused or failed to deliver up to him the books, papers, and furniture of the office on demand; and in such a case it is quite unnecessary for him to allege any other facts in his relation, nor will the denial and disapproval of any other facts by the respondent defeat the action. So held in State, Meckling, v. Jaynes, 19 Neb. 161, 164 (1896), where the relator claimed under an election as justice of the peace.

And the fact that the defendant alleged that he received a greater number of votes at the election will not affect such proceedings. State, Jones, v. Oates, 86 Wis. 634 (1893); People, Salisbury, v. Holcomb, 5 Misc. 459 (1893), to the same effect.

In Luce v. Dukes County Bd. of Examiners, 153 Mass. 108 (1891), the court intimated that one elected as county commissioner might enforce his right to such office by means of the writ of mandamus, and so prevent a stranger from acting as such officer.

Where the defendant contended that mandamus would not lie to admit one to an office which was full, but that the claimant must resort to the proceedings in the nature of a quo warranto, the court in case the rights of his successor cannot vest, he cannot hold over under a claim of right until such right has been established in the manner prescribed by law.

The following provisions of the state Constitution are deemed applicable, in determining the eligibility of the plaintiff to hold the office of county superintendent of common schools: Art. 6, § 6. "There shall be elected in each county, by the qualified electors thereof, at the time of holding general elections, a county clerk, treasurer, sheriff, coroner, and surveyor, who shall severally hold their offices for a term of two years." Art. 6, § 7. "Such other county, township, precinct and city officers as may be necessary shall be elected or appointed in such manner as may be prescribed by law." Id. § 8. "No person shall be elected or appointed to a county office who shall not be an elector of the county." Art. 2, § 2. "In all elections not otherwise provided for by this Constitution every white male citizen of the United States, of the age of twenty-one years and upwards, who shall have resided in the state during the six months immediately preceding such election, and every white male of foreign birth of the age of twenty-one years and upwards, who shall have resided in this state during the six months immediately preceding such election, and shall have declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States one year preceding such election, conformably to the laws of the United States on the subject of naturalization, shall be entitled to vote at all elections authorized by law." It will be observed that article 6, § 6, in designating the officers to be elected in each county, does not enumerate that of county superin-stated that the reason for the rule was, that a mandamus to admit to office ran to others than the incumbent and they were required to oust him, and thus his rights were sought to be passed upon in the proceeding to which he was not a party, but that the rule was different where the respondent's title to hold till his successor was elected and qualified was not in question, the relator's title in the latter case being prima facie shown by his certificate of election and qualification thereunder. State, Atherton, v. Sherwood, 15 Minn. 221, 2 Am. Rep. 116 (1870).

Where the party claiming the delivery of the books and papers appeared from uncontested facts entitled to hold an elective office by the majority of the votes cast at the election, received his certificate of election, and took the oath of office required by law,—it was held that such facts were sufficient to entitle him to the books and papers appertaining to such office and for the granting of an order under the statute referred to. Re Foley, 8 Misc. 196 (1894).

Where the tribunal appointed by law to canvass the votes found that the relator received the largest number, declared him duly elected, and gave him a certificate of election, whereupon he took the oath of office, and made demand upon the defendant for the books and papers, and was refused possession upon the ground that the relator's election was illegal and that the defendant had received the legal votes and was entitled,—the court held that the decision of the canvassers afforded prima facie evidence of the relator's title, and granted a mandamus. People, Cummings, v. Head, 25 Ill. 325 (1861).

Where the election of a party to an office is shown by the canvass of the votes cast at the election, and is so declared by the canvassing officers, and the party duly qualifies for such office, he is entitled to hold the same against all who claim title thereto until such time as the election is set aside by the decision of a court of competent jurisdiction in a direct proceeding for such purpose, and all assuming the duties of such office, including the predecessor of the party elected whose term of office has expired, will be treated as usurpers of such office, and proceedings may be had against them to compel the delivery of the books and papers appertaining to the office, and also to recover the moneys and other property in their hands which their successor in office is entitled to, even though such predecessor in office was a candidate to such election and alleged error in the votes. La Pointe Supers. v. O'Malley, 46 Wis. 35, 57 (1879).

Where it appeared by the statements of the relation, and by the express or implied admissions in the return, that the relator was declared elected to the office of the circuit court of the county by 31 L. R. A.

the county board of canvassers; that he received the proper certificate of election and qualified for the office; and also that the defendant, the former incumbent, retained possession of the same after the expiration of his term without any certificate, commission of authority, or right, but under a claim that he in fact received a greater number of votes for the office,—the court held the relator entitled to the possession of the office and granted mandamus, although the defendant claimed the right to attack the title to such office, the court stating that such title could be successfully contested upon quo warranto. State, Jones, v. Oates, 86 Wis. 634 (1890).

In Crowell v. Lambert, 10 Minn. 369 (1865), the petitioner qualified as judge of probate and demanded the office of his predecessor, which was refused, and no issue being properly raised on the facts appearing from the petition, the court held the relator entitled to the writ, stating that the question was not, Who would be entitled to the office on an examination into the merits of the election? but Who was then entitled to the possession of the books and papers appertaining to the office? and further, that the person holding the certificate of election was prima facie the officer and therefore prima facie entitled to the insignia and records of the office, and that in such cases the writ of mandamus was a peculiarly particular, adequate, and speedy remedy.

Where the writ was objected to because it did not allege that there was any clerk of the district court to be chosen at a general election, or that the relator received a majority of the votes cast, or that he was eligible, and upon the ground that no title to relief was shown (Minn. Rev. Stat. chap. 80, title 1, § 4, requiring the writ to state concisely the facts showing the obligations of the defendant to perform the act), but the relator claimed to have the necessary certificate and to have taken the oath and given the bond, and demanded possession, the court held that although loosely drawn the rights sufficiently showed that the relator held the certificate of office, and that he was duly qualified, and that the respondent was his predecessor in office, whose term had expired, and was in possession of the articles demanded, and refused upon request to deliver them, and that the case was clearly brought within the scope of the decision in Crowell v. Lambert, supra, and therefore granted the writ and denied the defendant's motion to quash the same. State, Atherton, v. Sherwood, 15 Minn. 221, 2 Am. Rep. 116 (1870).

So, in Fitzhugh v. Custer, 2 Tex. 391, 51 Am. Dec. 728 (1849), where the defendant received a certificate of election as county sheriff, which election was contested and the record showed that on one day the court consisted of the chief justice and two tendent of common schools, but that office was created by an act of the territorial legislative assembly (Or. Gen. Laws 1855, p. 458), and was in force at the time the Constitution went into effect, and continued in force by virtue of its express provisions (art. 8, § 8). The term, "such other county officers as may be necessary," as used in art. 6, § 7, doubtless includes, among others, the county superintendent of common schools. The plaintiff's demurrer to the defendant's return to the alternative writ confesses that she is a woman, but since she was elected in pursuance of a statute which provides that "women over the age of twenty-one years, who are citizens of the United States and of this state, shall be eligible to all educational offices within the state (Sess. Laws 1893, p. 62), we cannot declare her ineligible without holding a statute unconstitutional, and therefore void,—a conclusion a court will rarely ever reach in a collateral proceeding.

That the title to an office cannot be tried in a mandamus proceeding is a rule of law so well settled that it needs no citation of authorities to support it. It is also well settled that in such proceeding against the incumbent of a public office, to compel him to deliver the books and papers thereof to one who claims to have been elected as his successor, the certificate of election issued to the claimant, and proof of his qualification thereunder, constitute prima facie evidence of title to the office, and a peremptory writ will be directed to compel the delivery of the insignia of the office, irrespective of the eligibility of the person to whom the certificate has been issued. In Crowell v. Lambert, 10 Minn. 389 (Gil. 295), commissioners, and it was ruled that the chief justice and one of the commissioners were disqualified, and that on the next day no quorum appeared, and that by agreement the controversy was submitted to arbitration, under which title was declared and the election set aside and a new one ordered, and the award was entered as a judgment after the election was ordered, at which election the plaintiff received a majority of the votes, was declared duly elected, and received the certificate, whereupon defendant applied for mandamus to compel him to deliver to him the office, claiming it by virtue of his certificate as a result of the first election,—the court below ordered the writ to be issued, and the court affirmed the decision, holding that the proceedings in the first election were a nullity.

Again, where the relator obtained the certificate of election to the office of district clerk, took the oath of office, filed his bond, and demanded of the former clerk, whose office had expired and who was then in possession, the property appertaining thereto, and the defendant resisted the claim upon the ground that the relator was not legally entitled or eligible to office by reason of his being a non-resident of the state, the court held that such title to office could not be called in question in the proceeding, the relator having a prima facie title, and granted the mandamus. State, Atherton, v. Sherwood, supra.

In State, Cannon, v. May, 106 Mo. 488, 509 (1891), the writ was issued upon a prima facie showing, and jurisdiction was thus obtained, and the court stated that while such a proceeding was not the proper remedy to determine the title to an office yet in such a case they would decide the case upon its merits having obtained jurisdiction, rather than place its decision upon the question of practice alone.

An appointment to an office of the executive is complete upon the delivery of the commission so as to entitle the relator to the possession of the office, for the refusal of which he may maintain mandamus, and in such a case the appointment of the governor will give a prima facie title to office, and such commission when issued may be taken as at least prima facie evidence that the person holding it was lawfully entitled to the office. Conklin v. Cunningham (N. M.) 38 Pac. 170 (1894).

In Conklin v. Cunningham, supra, the relator sought to compel the defendant to turn over to him the books, papers, property, and prisoners appertaining to the office of sheriff and ex officio collector of the county, alleging the defendant's removal by the governor of the territory, and the relator's appointment, the service of the order of removal, the relator's due qualification for the office, and the defendant's refusal to deliver to him the property in question. The defendant alleged that he was elected and qualified as sheriff on a given date for two years from a later date, and denied the removal from office, and the right of the governor to remove him and appoint the relator, and also the fact that the relator was sheriff. The court held that the fact that the governor acted within the limits of his authority was a conclusive presumption in that proceeding; that he was authorized by the statute to remove for causes specified in the section under which he acted, and to appoint to the vacancy, and issue his commission, were not less indisputable legal conclusions in that action; and that the fact that the defendant ceased to be sheriff by the one executive order, and the relator became, prima facie, such officer, by the other, was the law's operation, so pronounced that it could not be controverted, except in an action contesting the legal title to the office.

In the above case it was further stated that in the exercise of the powers confided to the discretion of the executive, and in the performance of the duties imposed upon him, he was independent of the judiciary; and presumptively his acts were within the limitations of his authority, and must be recognized by the judicial tribunals; and therefore, prima facie, the order of the removal of the defendant was a legal exercise of executive authority; and the appointment of the relator constituted a commission that was evidence, prima facie, that he was lawfully entitled to the office of sheriff, and imposed upon the contestant the burden of showing a better title by an action in the nature of a quo warranto. The court therefore affirmed the judgment of the lower court granting the peremptory writ of mandamus.

Where the petition stated that a statement of the result and the canvass at a town meeting for the office of supervisor was entered in the minutes by the clerk, and such minutes showed that the relator was elected and took the oath of office, which was certified by the town clerk and filed, whereupon he entered upon the duties of the office, it was held that the relator showed a prima facie title to the office, and that the irregularities of the election could not be shown by the defendant as against such minutes in a summary proceeding under the New York Revised Statutes to compel the delivery of the books and papers appertaining to the office. Re Baker, 11 How. Pr. 418 (1855).

Where one filling the office of town clerk had declared his intention of removing from the county, removed from the town, and the justices had appointed his successor, who had duly qualified and taken possession of some of the books and papers relating to the office, and sought the delivery up of the remainder,—the court held that such successor was to be taken as legally elected to office, and

Berry, J., in rendering the decision of the court in a mandamus proceeding, said: "On the whole it may be said that the question here is not Who will be entitled to the office on an examination into the merits of the election? but Who is now entitled to the possession of the books and papers appertaining to the office? The person holding the certificate is, under the circumstances of the case, prima facie the officer, and therefore prima facie entitled to the insignia and records of the office. In such cases the writ of mandamus is a peculiarly proper, adequate, and speedy remedy, and perhaps the only one by which to enforce the delivery of the books, etc." So, too, in State, Atherton, v. Sherwood, 15 Minn. 221 (Gil. 172), 2 Am. Rep. 116, the court, in discussing the eligibility of one who held a certificate of election, and sought by mandamus to procure a delivery of the books belonging to an office, says: "It would seem, then, to be immaterial in this proceeding whether or not the relator was eligible, or was duly elected to the office, for to try either issue would be to try the title." In Warner v. Myers, 4 Or. 72, it was held that the person holding the certificate of election was entitled to a peremptory writ of mandamus to compel the incumbent of the office to deliver the property appertaining thereto. In People, Cummings, v. Head, 25 Ill. 325, Caton, Ch. J., in speaking of the certificate of election which had been issued by a canvassing board, said: "The decision of the canvassers afforded prima facie evidence that the relator was legally elected, and entitled him to the office till that canvass should be set aside by a proceeding to be instituted by the defeated candidate in the courts of justice, and in the forms therefore entitled to an order, even though the predecessor had sworn that he was still a resident and intended to return, the proceedings of the justices being entered into bona fide under the belief that the office was vacant, the defendant not being an officer de facto, the applicant having possession and having commenced to discharge the duties of the office, prima facie evidence of title being sufficient. Re Bagley, 27 How. Pr. 151 (1863).

In People, Salisbury, v. Holcomb, 5 Misc. 450 (1893), the relator and respondent were candidates for the office of town clerk, the latter being the then incumbent of the office, and the result which showed that each party received the same number of votes was entered on the minutes of the proceedings kept by the respondent and subscribed by him, and by the officers presiding, and subsequently a majority of the town board made a written appointment of the relator as town clerk, as prescribed by statute, which appointment was filed and the oath of office taken by the relator, and all the forms of the statute requisite to a valid appointment were complied with, and the defendant alleged error in the counting, and contended that he had the majority. The court held the relator entitled to the benefit of the statutes to compel a delivery of the papers, as he had a prima facie title, while the defendant simply claimed a right to the office, the court stating that a prima facie title was sufficient to entitle the relator to the records of the office until the defendant in an action of quo warranto established his right to the office by proof that he received a majority of the votes.

V. Special provisions relating to.

In some of the states the statutes provide a statutory remedy which in a few is in the nature of a summary proceeding, and such proceedings will be found to be contained in the provisions of the Alabama, California, and New York Codes. Yet it has been held that such provisions have not in any way abrogated the doctrine of the common law relating to the issuing of such writs, and that such summary proceedings can only be had in cases where the title to the office is not in question, the proceedings by way of quo warranto being still the remedy in such cases.

Under the provisions of the Alabama Code in all cases in which it is not otherwise expressly provided, when any office is vacated, except by the death of the incumbent, all the books, papers, property, and money belonging or appertaining to such office must be delivered over upon demand to the qualified successor, a violation of the duty being a misdemeanor, and on a refusal, after demand, complaint may be made to the probate judge of the county, or to the judge of the circuit court by such successor in office, and if the judge is satisfied by the oath of the complainant that such property is withheld, he must make an order requiring the person withholding to show cause why he should not deliver it up, and the person so charged may, upon making affidavit that he has made such delivery, discharge himself. But if he does not make such affidavit the judge must proceed to inquire into the circumstances, and if it appears that such property is withheld, he must make an order committing the accused to jail until he makes the delivery, or is otherwise discharged by due course of law, and a search warrant must then issue, commanding a search of a designated place for the property, which when found must be brought before the judge. The above provisions are contained in the Revised Code of Alabama, §§ 193-197. Thompson v. Holt, 52 Ala. 491, 497, 498 (1875).

Where the relator had been duly commissioned by the governor and had qualified as judge of probate he was held entitled to the custody of the books and papers, money and property, of the office, and the refusal by the respondent to deliver them over on demand subjected him to an order of commitment. Ibid.

Yet the proceedings under art. 6, pt. 1, title 5, chap. 1, Ala. Rev. Code, to compel the delivery of the books and papers, etc., appertaining to an office, cannot be supported, unless the relator exhibits a prima facie title to the office free from all reasonable doubt. Ibid.; Plowman v. Thornton, 52 Ala. 559 (1875).

So, if the object is to test the title to the office, and such title is the real question in issue, and the relator does not show a clear prima facie title, the rule of the common law that a party must proceed by way of quo warranto instead of mandamus applies to such summary proceedings under the above statute. Thompson v. Holt, supra.

The purposes of the Alabama Code were to provide a more summary and adequate remedy than that which mandamus would afford, and the remedy thus provided is cumulative, not exclusive, and is of like nature with mandamus. Ibid.

And the above statutory proceedings will lie whenever a mandamus could be obtained at common law. Ibid.

Where the petition was filed by one who had been declared entitled to the office after the contest to the term of office expired, at the period when the petition could be brought to hearing and the party withholding had been elected for the succeeding term, relief was denied. Beebe v. Robinson, 64 Ala. 171 (1879).

A party claiming the remedy provided by art. 6, chap. 1, title 5, pt. 1, of the Alabama Code, being § 206 of the Code of 1876, must show that he is the qualified successor to the office. Ibid.

of law." To allow an incumbent to hold over and retain possession of an office after the close of his term, when a certificate of election has been issued to another, who has duly qualified, because, perchance, the incumbent may think his successor is ineligible, or has not been duly elected, would thwart the popular will, as expressed by the majority at the election, and tend to make the incumbent the judge of his own rights, as well as of the eligibility, election, and qualification of his successor. State, Jones, v. Oates, 86 Wis. 634. The electors having expressed their preference at the polls, it is better that the person chosen by their votes, having obtained the certificate of election, and qualified, should be inducted into office, and the burden of proving the ineligibility and want of election and qualification cast on the prior incumbent, than that his successor should be deprived of his office until he could show himself eligible thereto. It is true that in State, Snyder, v. Newman, 91 Mo. 445, to which our attention has been called, the court denied a peremptory writ of mandamus to compel the incumbent to deliver the books and papers of an office to one shown by the record to be ineligible; but, in view of the statute authorizing the plaintiff's election, we decline to pass upon the plaintiff's eligibility until the question is before us in a direct proceeding. Having received the certificate of her election, in pursuance of a statute authorizing it, and having qualified, the plaintiff made a prima facie case, and showed a prima facie right to the possession of the books and papers which she is entitled to use until the question of her right to do so can be tried in a proper proceeding.

It follows that the judgment of the court below must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

He must show a legal title and a subsisting right to the custody at the time. Ibid.

Under the provisions of the California Code of Civil Procedure, § 805, judgment may be rendered upon the right of a party claiming to be entitled to the office. Kelly v. Edwards, 60 Cal. 460 (1896).

The remedy afforded by Ill. Rev. Stat. chap. 20, § 32, has been held to be of such a doubtful nature as to entitle the party to proceed by way of mandamus. People, Cummings, v. Head, 25 Ill. 325 (1861).

The Louisiana Code of Practice, art. 833, permits a mandamus to issue through a public officer to compel him to deliver to his successor the papers and other effects belonging to his office. State, Jumel, v. Johnson, 29 La. Ann. 399 (1877).

So, the statutes of Maine of 1890, chap. 198, accomplish by one and the same process the objects contemplated by both the proceedings by way of quo warranto and by mandamus, and oust the unlawful incumbent and give the lawful claimant the right to the office which he is entitled to, and afford a speedy and effectual remedy in lieu of the proceedings of the common law. Prince v. Skillin, 71 Me. 306, 36 Am. Rep. 325 (1880).

In Ramsey County Supers. v. Heenan, 2 Minn. 380 (1858), a peremptory writ of mandamus was applied for to compel the register of deeds in the county to deliver to the board of supervisors certain books and papers relating to the county taxes, the application being made under § 9 of the Minnesota act of August 13, 1858 (Laws of 1858, p. 206), and the court held that a proper demand having been made by the board for the books and papers, the writ of mandamus should issue.

The Minnesota statutes (Rev. Stat. chap. 79, § 3), have not changed the law with respect to the issue of a mandamus to compel the surrender of an office and the books and papers appertaining thereto, where the officer has a prima facie title to the office, and to the denial of such writ to try and finally determine the title to the office, except in cases where the law has provided no other means of so doing, the statutes containing nothing from which an intention to enlarge or change the issue to be tried can be inferred, and this, even though the writ of quo warranto, which was the adequate and speedy remedy to try title, should have been held to have been abolished, other and adequate provisions being made for the full and speedy trial and determination of questions as to title to office. State, Atherton, v. Sherwood, 15 Minn. 221, 2 Am. Rep. 118 (1870).

Under the statutes of Nevada, the remedy by way of mandamus is not confined to cases where a person is deprived of the enjoyment of his office, but the writ will be issued "to compel the admission of a party to the use and enjoyment of a right or office to which he is entitled, and from which he is unlawfully precluded by such inferior tribunal, corporation, board, or person," the remedy by the writ being more extensive than at common law, embracing within its provisions cases wherein the relator claims to have delivered over to him the books and papers belonging to the office of superintendent of a mining company, and to admit him to the enjoyment of the rights thereof. State, Curtis, v. McCullough, 3 Nev. 202 (1867).

Mandamus is inappropriate, and should not be issued, where there is a real and substantial dispute as to the title to an office; and where the right of the applicant is clear and unquestionable, and the possession of the books and papers is all that is necessary to enable him to perform the duties of the office. Resort should be had to a direct proceeding to obtain such books under the New York statute (1 Rev. Stat. chap. 124, §§ 50, 51), and where the title of the applicant to an office is beyond substantial dispute so that the objection to it is wholly frivolous, and the possession of the books and papers would not give control of the office, a writ of mandamus would be proper and should be awarded. People, Brady, v. Stephens, 2 Abb. Pr. N. S. 348, 353 (1866). To the same effect, People, Coleman, v. Dikeman, 7 How. Pr. 124 (1852).

The object of N. Y. Stat. 124, §§ 50, 51, is to compel the delivery of the books and papers by a summary proceeding, to which any person, duly appointed to an office, is absolutely entitled without any qualification or reservation, the only questions for the judge being whether the predecessor was legally removed, and whether the claimant has been legally appointed; but such proceeding does not supersede the more regular and formal redress by action by the party against whom the application is made, the remedies being concurrent, the one summary and preliminary and partial in its operation, the other final and complete, comprehending all the profits and benefits of the office. Re Bartlett, 9 How. Pr. 414 (1854).

When a party has been elected or appointed to an office, and his predecessor in such office refuses to deliver up the books and papers belonging to such office, an application may be made, under the New York Revised Statutes, to a justice of the supreme court, who is authorized, in case the party complained against refuses without satisfactory reason to deliver to such successor such books and papers, to direct such delivery and to commit such party to the jail of the county, there to remain until he complies with such order or is discharged according to law. Re North v. Cary, 4 Thomp. & C. 357 (1874).

The statute was intended for the actual incum-

*1. In an alternative writ of mandamus, upon the part of the state, to compel the surrender by a prior incumbent of a public office of the office room and the records, books, and papers of the same, it is not absolutely necessary to allege in specific words that the term of office of such prior incumbent has expired. While the writ would bent, the actual successor to such office, rather than the person entitled to succeed to it, and therefore was not intended for the party entitled merely because he was so entitled, the only proper remedy for such person entitled, but not in possession, to assert his title, being by way of quo warranto, in which action he could judicially establish his title and possession, and then avail himself of the proceedings under the statute to obtain possession. Re Conover v. Devlin, 24 Barb. 587, 609 (1867).

The object of the proceeding under the New York Revised Statutes was to put the books and papers into the possession of the actual incumbent for actual use for the time being, and not to decide who, in the abstract, was entitled to them, because he was entitled to the office to which they pertained; and that the title to such books and papers must ultimately depend upon the title to the office; and therefore the right to present possession should depend on the fact of present possession of the office to which such documents were appurtenant. Ibid.

The authority conferred by the New York Revised Statutes to compel the delivery over of the books and papers appertaining to the office should only be exercised in a clear case or in one free from reasonable doubt, as the aim of the revisers of such statute was to give the remedy "only" when the case was so clear that the conduct of the party in refusing to deliver could be called wilful or obstinate. Bridgeman v. Hall, 16 Abb. N. C. 272 (1885); People, Williamson, v. Allen, 42 Barb. 203 (1864).

When the case is free from reasonable doubt, the application under the New York Revised Statutes for the delivery of the books and papers appertaining to an office should be granted. People, Kilbourn v. Allen, 51 How. Pr. 97, 100 (1875).

And a judge has no right to enforce such delivery unless the applicant shows a title, clear and free from reasonable doubt. People, Hodgkinson, v. Stevens, 5 Hill, 616 (1843).

In order to entitle a party elected to office to the benefit of the proceedings given by 1 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 125, §51, to compel the delivery of the papers appertaining to the office as against his predecessor whose term of office has expired, it is only necessary for the party claiming to be entitled to the office to show that he has been duly elected, and that he has duly qualified himself for the office, and questions relating to the validity of such election cannot be entered into in any such proceedings. Re Bradley, 141 N. Y. 527 (1894).

In proceedings under the New York Revised Statutes the defendant may show that the facts adduced by the relator showing his election and title to the office are not truly stated, and so create a doubt as to the title to the office, although he cannot by merely alleging irregularities in the election avoid the proceedings. Re Baker, 11 How. Pr. 418 (1855).

be more exact and definite if the specific words were used, their use is not essential, and words fully equivalent, from which the expiration of the term follows as a necessary consequence, are sufficient.

2. Allegations contained in such an alternative writ of mandamus as is mentioned in preceding headnote, to the effect that at a general election held in accordance with the provisions of law in this state, in the county of Duval, one J. F. G. was a candidate for the office of tax collector of said county, was voted for at said election for said office; that the returns of said election were duly canvassed by the proper canvassing board of said county, and that he was shown by such canvass to have received the

The true rule under the New York statute is that one having a prima facie title evidenced by an election or appointment valid on its face must prevail over one claiming the right to the office. People, Salisbury, v. Holcomb, 5 Misc. 459 (1893).

In the above case the court stated that Re Davis, 19 How. Pr. 323 (1860), which would seem to hold otherwise, was a practical nullification of the statute which was designed to afford a summary remedy to one having a clear prima facie title, and that the judge in that case overlooked Re Baker, 11 How. Pr. 418 (1855), which latter case was approved of in People, Williamson, v. Allen, 42 Barb. 203 (1864).

An application under the New York Revised Statutes for books and papers is designed to be a summary proceeding, and the officer to whom it is made has no power to declare the action of the appointing and confirming power void for official corruption, especially when there is not clear proof of the fact. People, Kilbourn, v. Allen, 51 How. Pr. 97 (1875).

Under the proceedings given by the New York Revised Statutes it is the province and duty of the judge to examine the facts and claims of the respective parties so far as to ascertain whether the person claiming the office and the delivery of the books and papers shows a clear right to such office and to the possession of such books and papers, and whether or not the party refusing such delivery establishes a reasonable doubt in regard to the right of the applicant to the possession of such book and papers. Re North v. Cary, 4 Thomp. & C. 357 (1874).

In such a proceeding the judge must look into the title to the office so far as necessary to ascertain whether the applicant's right is free from reasonable doubt, and such examination of the title is not the trial of the title to office, for the reason that the question is not involved, and the title remains wholly unaffected by his decision. People, Williamson, v. Allen, supra.

The application for the delivery of books and papers under the New York Revised Statutes will not be denied for the reason that it involves the validity of the appointment, as resort may be had to action to try the title. Re Bagley, 27 How. Pr. 151 (1863).

But the summary remedy given by the New York Revised Statutes does not lie where the party in possession of the office, and the books and papers appertaining thereto, holds under a bona fide belief that he is entitled to the office, but only in cases where there is a wilful and obstinate refusal of delivery. Bridgman v. Hall, 16 Abb. N. C. 272 (1885).

So, the proceedings given by such statutes were not adapted, nor were they intended, to try the title to an office when there were adverse claim-highest number of votes cast for any person for such office, and was declared elected to the same; that the supervisor of registration of such county gave him a certificate of his election, certifying that according to said returns and canvass he was at said election elected tax collector of said county for the term prescribed by law, beginning on the 1st Tuesday after the 1st Monday in January, A. D. 1895 (which precedes the date of said writ); that he had duly given his bond and qualified for said office in all respects; and that the governor of the state, under his hand and the great seal of the state, did commission him to be such tax collector, according to the Constitution and laws of this state, for the term of two years from the 1st Tuesday after the 1st Monday in January, A. D. 1895, and until his successor is qualified; that the incumbent of said office prior to the term for which said J. F. G. was commissioned as aforesaid was J. E. J., the defendant,—make a sufficient prima facie showing that the term of said J. E. J. as tax collector has expired.

3. The allegations of the alternative writ of mandamus set out in the preceding headnote are sufficient prima facie allegations of an election in fact of J. F. G. as tax collector of Duval county.

4. Section 2 of article 6 of the Constitution of this state gives the legislature power to provide for the returns of elections, and with it, as a necessary incident to that power, the authority to appoint and designate some officer, or board of officers, to aggregate the returns and ascertain and declare the result of such elections.

ants, and in such a case quo warranto is the proper remedy. Re North v. Cary, supra.

In People, Dolan, v. Lane, 55 N. Y. 217 (1873), it was said to be doubtful whether the title to an office ought ever to be tried collaterally on proceedings by mandamus instituted on behalf of a party out of possession of the office.

Where one claiming to be clerk of the common council of a city applied for a mandamus to compel his predecessor in office to deliver up the books and papers, the court held that the application should be denied inasmuch as the relator, if he was in truth clerk, had another specific legal remedy under 1 Rev. Stat. 124. People, Hodgkinson, v. Stevens, 5 Hill, 616 (1843). From this decision, however, Chief Justice Nelson dissented.

In People, Hodgkinson, v. Stevens, supra, it was urged on the part of the defendant that the New York statutes (1 Rev. Stat. 124, §§ 50-55), had superseded the remedy by way of mandamus, but Chief Justice Nelson was of the contrary opinion, and held that nothing in the provisions of the statute indicated that such was the intention of the legislature, the statute being obviously designed to furnish a prompt and summary remedy for cases of emergency, in addition to the one already existing by way of mandamus, the remedy by way of mandamus being one of a proceeding according to the principles of the common law where questions of fact might be determined by a jury, and those of law by the court subject to review on error, while in the proceeding under the statute the remedy was by an informal application to a judge at chambers who was to proceed summarily and whose determination upon the matter was final.

In a note to the above case of People, Hodgkinson, v. Stevens, 5 Hill, 616, 630 (1843), Chief Justice Kent observed that the legislature never intended that the judge could exercise his powers to enforce the delivery of books and papers against an officer de facto when the title of the applicant for the office was questionable, and that the title of the applicant must be prima facie and free from reasonable doubt.

In Re Whiting, 2 Barb. 513 (1848), the court stated that although the proceeding under such statutes was not a substitute for a quo warranto because it did not establish the title to the office, yet it was kindred, and in addition to the remedy by way of mandamus, which has always been an appropriate mode of settling the possession.

In the above case a health officer of the poor, who resigned his office, communicated the fact to the board of health, and required them to fill the vacancy under the statute authorizing them so to, in case of temporary inability or otherwise, which provided that "the person so appointed should hold office only until such inability was removed, or the sense of the governor, or of the governor or Senate, should be declared." The board appointed a successor, who qualified and entered upon the duties of the office, but at that time the third party had been nominated by the governor for the office, and later such nomination was confirmed by the Senate, and such third party took the oath of office and attempted to enter upon its duties, but was obstructed by the appointee of the board, who claimed to be lawfully appointed and refused to surrender the books and papers. The court held that in such a case proceedings under the statutes were a proper remedy, the applicant's title being clear, and the defendant was not in possession under color of lawful right to hold.

In Re Conover v. Devlin, 24 Barb. 587, 600 (1857), the court stated that in proceedings under the New York Revised Statutes to obtain possession of the books and papers appertaining to an office, the question of title to the office should not be allowed to be tried in it at all, and that the abstract right of an applicant was unimportant where the possession was clearly shown; and further, that it should not be inquired into at all further than to see that if in possession he had color of title, that being in the office under color of right he should have such proceeding to get the books and papers, and, on the other hand, that having the best possible right to an office, one should not have the possession of the books and papers by proceedings under such statute while it was apparent that he was not in occupancy of the office and not in a situation to exercise the functions of it, the court thus going further than the rule established in the prior cases of People, Hodgkinson, v. Stevens, 5 Hill, 616 (1843), and in the opinion of Judge Kent in the same case, p. 631, and that of Justice Edmonds in Re Whiting, 2 Barb. 513 (1848).

Where a statute gave the canal commissioners power to remove superintendents of repairs and collectors of tolls, when they judged such removal proper, the court held, the board alone having the right to decide upon the propriety of such removal, and its action being final and conclusive, the case was one in which the relator's title to the office was clear and free from reasonable doubt, and was therefore a proper case for enforcing the delivery of the documents in a question under the provisions of the New York statute. Re Cobee, 8 How. Pr. 367 (1853).

In the above case of Re Cobee the relator had qualified himself by taking oath and filing the official bond required by law, and the court held that such proceedings would lie, the statutes referring to and including collectors of tolls on canals as well as other officers.

Yet it has been held that the remedy given by the New York Revised Statutes, even though it involves the question of the legality of the removal of one out of the office and the appointment of the other, does not prevent either party from resorting to a more formal method of redress by action. Re Bartlett, 9 How. Pr. 414 (1854).

Where an office is already filled by a person who has been admitted and sworn and is in by color of

5. Where the result of an election held under the provisions of law has been ascertained and declared by the proper canvassing board, their official announcement is of binding force and efficacy as to the fact of an actual election, until reversed or set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction.

6. Upon an application for mandamus the court will not go behind the certificate of election and try the actual title to the office.

7. It is not necessary, in a mandamus on behalf of the state, to allege the eligibility of the person stated therein to have been elected to the office, for the reason that to try such an issue would be to determine the title to the office upon proceedings in mandamus, which the court will never do.

8. A prima facie title to public office confers a right to exercise its functions, and a right to the possession of the insignia and property thereof, and on such title the courts will compel a delivery of such insignia and property for the time being, without adjudicating the actual title.

9. The commission of the governor of this state is the highest and best evidence of who is the officer, until on a quo warranto or proceedings in the nature of a quo warranto it is annulled by a judicial determination.

10. Where one person has the certificate of election and the commission to hold an office he is prima facie the officer de jure, and a mandamus to put him into possession right, a mandamus is never issued to compel a surrender. The proper remedy in such a case was formerly by quo warranto but now by the substituted action. People, Lockwood, v. Scrugham, 20 Barb. 302 (1855).

In Re Baker, 11 How. Pr. 418 (1855), the point in issue was, that the defendant was in, and held, the office of supervisor, by color of right, and was supervisor de facto; that the question of right to the office upon the respective claims of the relator and the defendant could only be tried by a direct proceeding in the nature of a quo warranto; and that upon the defendant's answer the county judge had no jurisdiction of the proceedings had before him under 1 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 358, § 5. The court held that, the relator's title to the office being clear, such proceedings to compel the delivery of the books and papers to the relator could be had under the provision of such statute as against officers de facto, but that if the title to such office was not clear quo warranto was the proper remedy.

Where the right to the books and papers has been determined by proceedings instituted under 1 Rev. Stat. 125, § 61, after a further hearing of the case the decision in such proceedings is res judicata and conclusive between the parties, and cannot be called in question in a collateral suit. Conover v. New York, 25 Barb. 518 (1857).

In Devlin v. Platt, 20 How. Pr. 167 (1861), the facts disclosed circumstances which showed that the defendant had been legally removed from the office of chamberlain, and the relator had been duly appointed his successor, and an order was therefore made in favor of the relator for the delivery over to him of the books and papers appertaining to the office under the New York Revised Statutes.

In that case the defendant had been removed from office by proceedings under the New York laws of 1857, p. 874, by the president of the board of city aldermen with the consent of the aldermen, and the relator appointed in his place.

And in such a case the applicant was held entitled to a warrant to commit the defendant to jail until he complied with the order or was otherwise discharged by law. Devlin v. Platt, 11 Abb. Pr. 398, 406 (1861).

So, in People, Conliss, v. North, 72 N. Y. 124 (1878), the facts showed that the defendant had been appointed chamberlain of the city for two years, and that at the expiration of such term he held over, no successor being appointed, but later, after the annual election at a meeting of the common council at which the late board of aldermen was recognized as members, and before any announcement was made that new aldermen had been elected who claimed recognition as such, or had taken the oath of office, and without objection, a resolution reappointing the defendant as chamberlain was passed, upon which he took the oath of office and filed the bond which was approved; but subsequently the council as a board of canvassers received the inspector's statements, and declared a certificate and election of new officers, and at a subsequent meeting the relator's appointment as chamberlain was passed, and it was held that he was entitled under the provisions of the statute to the office and the books and papers appertaining thereto.

Where the defendant made affidavit before a notary public, and not before the officer granting the order, stating that he had truly delivered to the plaintiff each and every book and paper in his possession or under his control as supervisor within his knowledge, and that he had not then, nor had he at any time since then, any such book as that described in the papers, the court below refused to dismiss the proceedings but made the order to take proof, and the court held that the order was properly made, the section of the Revised Statutes under which the proceedings were taken plainly requiring the affidavit to be made before the officer, namely a justice of the peace, the affidavit being evasive in other respects as it did not deny the delivery of the particular book in question, nor identify the books which were delivered. McGrory v. Henderson, 43 Hun, 438 (1887).

In Re North v. Cary, 4 Thomp. & C. 357 (1874), the plaintiff's application for the delivery of the books and papers was denied upon the ground that the applicant had omitted to present the bond for approval of the mayor, as until such approval of the sureties he was not entitled to the possession of the books and papers of the office, the laws of the city providing that the bond of the chamberlain, to which office the applicant claimed to have been elected, "shall be approved by the mayor and common council."

S. C. Code, § 434, subdvs. 2-4, provide that if any person shall refuse or neglect to deliver over to his successor any books or papers as required in the preceding section on demand, such successor may make complaint thereof to any judge of the circuit court or justice of the supreme court where the person so refusing shall reside, and if such officer be satisfied by the oath of the complainant, and such other testimony as shall be offered, that any such books or papers are withheld, he shall grant an order directing the person so refusing to show cause before him within some short reasonable time why he should not be compelled to deliver the same, and at the time appointed upon proof of service of the order, if the person charged with withholding such documents shall make affidavit before such officer that he has truly delivered such books and papers to his successor, all further proceedings shall cease, but if the person so complained against shall not make such oath, and it appears that such books are withheld, the officer before whom such proceedings shall be had shall by warrant commit the person so withholding to jail until the same be delivered.

APPPLICATION for a writ of mandamus to compel defendant to turn over the office of Tax Collector for Duval County, including the records, etc., to John F. Geiger, who was alleged to be the duly qualified incumbent. On motion to quash the writ and demurrer to the return. Motion denied. Demurrer sustained, and writ awarded.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. A. W. Cockrell & Son, for defendant in support of motion to quash:

The writ must contain averments of all such facts as are necessary to show that it is the defendant's duty to execute the command of the writ.

Tax collectors are constitutional officers, whose tenure of office is prescribed by the Constitution.

In Ex parte Whipper, 32 S. C. 5 (1890), the proceedings were had under a writ of habeas corpus to discharge the applicant from confinement under an order made against him under the above section of the Code for the delivery of books and papers to his successor in office. It was not denied that the proceedings were in conformity with the above provisions of the Code, but it was contended that they were not applicable until after formal judgment in an action to test the title to office. The court held that, although the provisions of the Code abolished the writ of quo warranto and substituted a civil action in its place, yet it was not expressly declared that they were only applicable after demand in such action, yet the above provisions of the Code as to getting possession of the official records were to be construed in connection with the acts creating machinery for declaring elections in the general statutes which, in authorizing the election to be declared and commission to be issued, conferred a prima facie title to the office which was sufficient to authorize an application for possession of the records appertaining to the office, and that therefore the petitioner should have surrendered the books and papers of the office and resorted to his civil action in the nature of a quo warranto to test the title to the office.

The proceedings under §§ 977, 983, Wis. Rev. Stat. to compel the delivery of books and papers, do not afford adequate remedy in a case where the relator claims the delivery of the seal of office and the moneys appertaining thereto, and therefore such proceedings would be inadequate and mandamus would be the proper remedy. State, Jones, v. Oates, 86 Wis. 634 (1893).

VI. In the case of a private corporation.

A writ of mandamus lies to a former town clerk or clerk of a county to deliver to his successors the common seal, books, papers, and records of the corporation, which belong to his customers, and it lies to any person who happens to have the books of a corporation in his possession and refuses to deliver them up. Proprietors of St. Luke's Church v. Slack, 7 Cush. 226, 239 (1851).

In that case the writ was issued to compel the treasurer or clerk of the religious society to deliver over the books and papers belonging to the office on the petition of the society, and the court stated that such writ was an appropriate remedy in such a case, the preservation of the rights in securing the peace and quiet and order of the parish, a religious society, being a matter of great public interest and importance.

In the case of American Railway-Frog Co. v. Haven, 101 Mass. 398, 3 Am. Rep. 377 (1869), the court granted mandamus upon the petition of a private manufacturing corporation to compel the surrender of books and papers held by persons actually, but unlawfully, exercising the functions of the office under a claim of right, such persons having taken possession of them under a choice of a minority of the stockholders by the use of illegal votes, the court stating that the use of the writ was by no means confined to cases of a public nature, or to public corporations.

The petition in the case in question was that of the corporation, and not a process of a private stockholder against a corporation, to protect itself in the enjoyment of its charter rights, and to secure to itself the benefit of a due and proper observance of the laws in relation to its organization.

It has been held that mandamus is the proper remedy to compel the admission of a person to a private right or office from the enjoyment of which he has been excluded, where there is no other person claiming it under color of right. State, Curtis, v. McCullough, 3 Nev. 202 (1867).

So, it is said to be well established that mandamus will lie upon the petition of a private corporation to compel the surrender of its records, books, and papers which are unlawfully withheld by one of its former officers, especially when it is made to appear that the property has been concealed and cannot be reached by ordinary legal process. State, State Savings, Bldg. & L. Asso., v. Davis, 54 Mo. App. 447, 450 (1898).

In the case of State, Cooper County, v. Trent, 53 Mo. 571 (1875), the court stated that the statement made in Proprietors of St. Luke's Church v. Slack, supra, to the effect that a writ would lie to "any person" who happens to have the books of a corporation in his possession, and refuses to deliver them up, was entirely dehors the record, and was a mere dictum without support.

In Tobey v. Hakes, 54 Conn. 275 (1886), the application was for a mandamus to compel the secretary of a private corporation to allow the plaintiff to transfer the stock and the books of the company to a purchaser. The court held that the suit being against a private corporation and its only object the enforcement of a mere private right, it was not the proceeding to enforce the performance of a public duty, and that therefore mandamus was not the proper remedy.

In Bridgman v. Hall, 16 Abb. N. C. 272 (1865), relator claimed title to, and possession of, the office of chamberlain, and the surrender by the defendant of the books and papers appertaining thereto, and the question was whether the provisions of art. 5, title 6, chap. 5, pt. 1, N. Y. Rev. Stat. applied to the office of chamberlain or treasurer of a municipal corporation created by special charter where each of the parties claimed to be entitled to the office. The court held that the statutes did not apply to such an officer but only to public officers of the state.

"election by the qualified voters in each county"; and also defines, for itself, what proportion of such "votes" shall constitute "an election of officers."

Const. art. 6, § 6, art. 16, § 6.

It has not been alleged traversably and issuably that Johnson's term had in fact expired; nor is it alleged that Geiger in fact received a plurality of the votes by ballot of the qualified voters of Duval County, Florida.

State v. Black River Phosphate Co. 27 Fla. 326.

Johnson's right, prima facie as well as absolute, to his continuance in office as tax collector for the period elapsing after the expiration of the two years for which he was chosen by the qualified electors of Duval county, and the election and qualification of his successor, is just as much under the protection of the Constitution as was his incumbency for the two years for which he was so chosen.

People, Baird, v. Tilton, 87 Cal. 614.

It cannot be claimed that, under the allegations of the writ, the title of the incumbent or his right to the continuance therein, is clearly void, or clearly colorable.

State, Hero, v. Pitot, 21 La. Ann. 388; State, Carson, v. Harrison, 118 Ind. 434.

The expiration of Johnson's tenure is an essential fact required to make up a cause of action.

VII. When writ refused.

The rule upon the subject of mandamus to compel the surrender of an office and the books and papers relating thereto as laid down in High on Extraordinary Legal Remedies, § 77, is as follows: If it be apparent to the court that instead of a proceeding whose object is only to get possession of the books and insignia of the office, the writ is invoked in reality to test the title to the office, and that the question of title is the real point in issue, it will refuse to lend its aid by mandamus. In all such cases the parties will be left to a determination of the disputed question of title by proceedings upon information in the nature of a quo warranto, since this is the first remedy by which judgment of ouster can be had against an actual incumbent, and the person rightfully entitled can be put into rightful possession of the office. The court will not, upon an application for a mandamus to procure possession of official records, inquire into the right of a de facto incumbent of the office, and if it is apparent that the relator's right cannot be determined without such an investigation into respondent's title, mandamus will not lie. The above rule was applied by the court in State, Addison, v. Williams, 25 Minn. 340, 343 (1879), where mandamus was denied.

a. Insufficiency of facts.

The writ must show facts sufficient to authorize the granting of it or it will not be sustained. McLeod v. Scott, 21 Or. 94 (1891); Elliott v. Oliver, 22 Or. 44 (1892).

In Elliott v. Oliver, supra, mandamus was brought by the plaintiff as recorder of conveyances against defendant as county clerk, to recover possession of certain records which he claimed title to by virtue of his office. The writ was demurred to upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and the court below sustained the demurrer for the reason that the act of the legislature of 1889, creating the office of recorder of conveyances, was unconstitutional and void, and upon appeal the court held that in order to sustain such writ it must show facts sufficient to authorize the granting of it, and that the writ could not be aided by reference to the petition, following the decision in McLeod v. Scott, supra, and affirming the decision of the court below.

So, the relator must prove that the defendant's office is at an end or the writ will be denied. State, Addison, v. Williams, 25 Minn. 340 (1879).

Again, it has been held that under the New York statute the relator's title must be clear, and free from reasonable doubt. People, Hodgkinson, v. Stevens, 5 Hill, 616 (1843); Re Davis, 19 How. Pr. 323 (1860).

In Howard v. Gage, 6 Mass. 462 (1810), it was stated that the remedy by way of mandamus was inadequate when the officer was annually elected, from the nature of the proceedings on writs of mandamus in that court, which was according to the course of the common law; none of the English statutes regulating such proceedings having been adopted in that state.

b. In case of a private party.

Where a private person acts in an unofficial capacity, mandamus is not the proper remedy to compel him to deliver over documents which have come to his hands. So held in State, Cooper County, v. Trent, 58 Mo. 571 (1875), where the party against whom the writ was sought to be enforced had been employed by the county court to make a survey of the public roads of the county, and to plat them in a suitable book, and who, after receiving the contracting price for his services, regained possession of the same and refused to deliver them.

In Bates v. Overseers of Poor, 14 Gray, 163 (1859), where a committee chosen by the town for the purpose of auditing the accounts of the overseers of the poor for the year who were authorized by a vote of the town to demand and receive from the overseers of the poor the books of account belonging to the town which were held by the latter in their official capacity, petitioned the court for mandamus to compel the delivery of the books the court refused the writ, holding that the books were not those of the petitioners, the vote of the town not having made them such; the petitioners not being public officers entitled by virtue of their office to the custody of the same, or charged with any public official duty respecting them.

In Husey v. Hamilton, 5 Kan. 462 (1870), it was shown that at the general election of county probate judge the defendant received the majority of votes and was duly declared elected, a certificate of election being issued, upon which he gave his bond, took the oath, and entered upon his official duties. The plaintiff, his immediate predecessor, turned over to him the county seal and part of the other property of the office, but subsequently entered the office and removed part of the same in a clandestine manner, under pretext that the defendant's bond was illegal. The court below granted a peremptory writ of mandamus placing the defendant in possession, but upon appeal the same was refused, the court holding that as the defendant was not charged as holding a public office or as being in a position from which the law required a special duty, proceedings by way of mandamus were not an appropriate remedy, the defendant being considered as a private individual, being nowhere represented as in any other capacity, and for the further reason that there was a plain and adequate remedy at law, the affidavit also being defective as not representing that the defendant held or pre-

The right of the person to be surrendered to cannot be determined without an investigation and determination that respondent's right has expired.

State, Addison, v. Williams, 25 Minn. 340.

Had the Constitution fixed Johnson's prior term at two years, the action of the returning board, and the commission issued thereon, might have invested Geiger with a prima facie or colorable right to be put into the office by mandamus.

Crowell v. Lambert, 10 Minn. 369; State, Atherton, v. Sherwood, 15 Minn. 221, 2 Am. Rep. 116.

A tax collector holds subject to the law of the land, as to its termination, modification, and as to suspension or removal therefrom.

State, Atty. Gen., v. Johnson, 30 Fla. 487, 18 L. R. A. 410.

The writ of mandamus is not effective to create a title in the person to whom the writ directs the incumbent to surrender; it only consummates such title as he may already have.

King v. Clarke, 2 East, 75; King v. Bishop of Oxford, 7 East, 345; State, Carson, v. Harrison, supra; 2 Spelling, Extraordinary Relief, § 1572; Soucy v. People, McCracken, 113 Ill. 109.

To require Johnson to surrender the office in which he was continued by force of the Contended to hold any office, trust, or station from which any duty resulted.

In the above case the court referred to and distinguished the cases of People, Brewster, v. Kilduff, 15 Ill. 500, 60 Am. Dec. 769 (1854), and People, Cummings, v. Head, 25 Ill. 325 (1861), on the ground that they differed from the case then under consideration upon the very point on which that case was decided, the pleadings in the former of the two cases admitting that the defendant was in the exercise of an official position, from which, if he was wrongfully in such position, resulted the special duty of delivering to his successor the seal, books, and papers of the office, the plaintiff occupying a station from which a special duty sprang, which the court enforced by the writ. The same conditions as to the parties were found to exist in the second case above referred to, while in the case then under consideration neither the affidavit nor answer represented the plaintiff as acting or pretending to act in any such capacity as created any special duty or from which such special duty resulted. Hussey v. Hamilton, 5 Kan. 462 (1870).

In Carr v. McCampbell, 61 Ind. 97 (1878), action was brought against the successors of certain trustees appointed under 2 Va. Rev. Stat. 1876, to compel the surrender of books and papers connected with their office, and also the proceeds of the sales of certain lots laid out as a town. It was held that the action could not be maintained by a private citizen, but must be brought by the board of trustees of the town, after a demand and refusal, under the provisions of the act.

c. When there is another remedy.

Mandamus may be granted to admit as well as to restore to office, where it is one that concerns the public or the administration of justice, but generally it will not be done where there is clearly another remedy, and particularly when such remedy is of a much more efficient character. Com. v. Philadelphia County Comrs. 6 Whart. 476, 482 (1841).

It will not be granted where the applicant has another adequate specific legal remedy. American Railway-Frog Co. v. Haven, 101 Mass. 398, 403, 3 Am. Rep. 377 (1869).

But the remedy in order to be a bar to the issuing of the writ must not only be adequate, but also specific, and damages recoverable for the violation of the right are not such specific remedy. Ibid.

In People v. Olds, 3 Cal. 167, 58 Am. Dec. 398 (1853), an alternative mandamus to compel the delivery of the books and papers belonging to the office of clerk of the superior court, to the relator, was demurred to on the ground that the relator's remedy was by information in the nature of a quo warranto, and the general answer also denied the fact of the election. The court refused the application, holding that the California statute furnished not only a specific but an adequate and speedy remedy, and 31 L. R. A.

therefore mandamus was not the proper or appropriate form of relief, such a writ only issuing to prevent the failure of justice.

In refusing the relator's application in the above case, the court pointed out that the defendant was then actually in possession of the office, was duly sworn and admitted, and exercised the duties as officer de facto, and was therefore prima facie entitled to it, and for that reason, while he was in the exercise of such office under color of right, his title to the office could not be tried by that writ, and that the California statute gave an adequate remedy at law by the practice act, against any person usurping, intruding into, or unlawfully holding or exercising any public office, civil or military, or any franchise within the state.

See also Cameron v. Parker (Okla.) 38 Pac. 14 (1894), and State, Atty. Gen., v. Johnson, 30 Fla. 483, 497, 18 L. R. A. 410 (1892), supra, I.

d. In the absence of ouster.

And it has been held that proceedings under the New York Revised Statutes will be denied in the absence of a judgment of ouster regularly entered against the person executing the duties of the office. Re Welch v. Cook, 7 How. Pr. 173, 14 Barb. 395 (1852).

In the above case of Re Welch v. Cook, an application was made under §§ 50-53, 1 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 124, to compel the delivery of books and papers appertaining to the office of state treasurer, and the court denied the application upon the ground that a regular judgment of ouster in the relator's favor was not shown to have been obtained, the court stating that no proceedings to obtain the books and papers appertaining to an office could be instituted until a judgment of ouster had been regularly entered against the person executing the duties of the office. In that case the judgment upon which the relator relied showed great irregularities.

e. Prima facie title.

In the absence of a prima facie title to the office, the writ will not issue. People v. Olds, 3 Cal. 167, 58 Am. Dec. 398 (1853); Lavalle v. Soucy, 36 Ill. 467 (1869); Hussey v. Hamilton, 5 Kan. 462 (1870); State, Addison, v. Williams, 25 Minn. 340 (1879); Case v. Campbell, 16 Abb. N. C. 239 (1883); Ewing v. Turner, 2 Okla. 94 (1894).

Where the petition alleged that the defendant, at the time of the election of the petitioner, had possession and control of all the books and papers belonging to the office, but there was no direct allegation that there were any books, papers, or money belonging to the office, and it did not appear from any statute that the supervisors were entitled to the custody of the books, papers, and money belonging to the commons of the village, and there was no statute requiring a supervisor to deliver to his successor such documents, it was held that it devolved upon the relator to show that there were stitution until his successor is chosen by a plurality of the votes by ballot, merely because of the acts of the canvassing board, and the supervisor of registration, and the issuance of a commission based thereon, irrespective of the election in fact of his successor by a plurality of the votes by ballot of the qualified electors of the county, is to abridge Johnson's term by withholding from him the right of continuing therein secured to him by the Constitution.

State v. Lusk, 18 Mo. 333; State, Smith, v. Anderson, 26 Fla. 240; State, Lamar, v. Dillon, 32 Fla. 579, 23 L. R. A. 124; Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. p. 762.

such books in existence, and in the custody of the defendant, and that he, as such relator, was entitled by law to the same, and the court therefore denied the relief. Lavalle v. Soucy, supra.

The relator is not entitled to the aid of mandamus to obtain possession of funds in the hands of the territorial treasurer, when it appears that such relator has been removed by the governor and a subsequent commission has been lawfully issued for the same office to another, for the reason that, in seeking to avoid the later commission, the relator necessarily puts in issue the title to the office, which cannot be tried by mandamus; and in the face of the later commission, the relator being unable to show a prima facie title to such office, the writ must be denied. Ewing v. Turner, supra.

Where the office has not become vacant and has been illegally filled, the right to office by virtue of such election must fail, and therefore proceeding by way of mandamus to compel the surrender of such office and the delivery of the books and papers appertaining thereto will be denied. Lindsey v. Luckett, 20 Tex. 516 (1857).

In Re Carpenter & Snow, 7 Barb. 30 (1849), the petitioners, upon an application at chambers under 1 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 124, § 50, alleged that they, as freeholders of the county, were appointed by the governor, with the consent of the Senate, commissioners of loans of the county in the place of the late commissioners, whose term of office had expired; and further, that the permission signed by the governor was forwarded to and received by the clerk of the county, and that the petitioners within the time specified after the receipt of notice performed all acts necessary to entitle them to office, and entered upon their duties. The defendants did not deny that their official term had expired before the petitioners were nominated, but they insisted that under the state Constitution the governor and Senate had no right to make the appointment, and that they were entitled to hold office under 1 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 117, § 9, until a successor should be duly qualified, by the legislature determining the manner in which officers should be elected or appointed; and they further insisted that the petitioner had not taken the necessary steps to qualify for office. The court denied the motion upon the ground that the office of commissioner of loans was a county one within art. 10, § 2, of the Constitution, and that the mode of appointment was not provided for in the Constitution except by the section which declared that such county officers should be elected by the electors of the counties or appointed by the board of supervisors or other county authorities as directed by the legislature, and further that the power of appointment by the governor and Senate which existed with respect to county officers under the late Constitution was by implication removed, and that therefore the petitioners had no prima facie title to the office.

1. Possession by an officer de facto.

The writ will be denied where the office is already filled by one who has been appointed and sworn, and is in by color of right, and is in possession as an officer de facto. People v. Luckett, 20 Tex. 516 (1857); State, Butler, v. Callahan, 4 N. D. 481 (1895).

Mandamus is not the appropriate remedy to try the title to an office as against one actually in possession under color of law. So held in French v. Cowan, 79 Me. 426 (1887), where the petitioner attempted to oust an actual incumbent and to place himself in an office, the title to which was in controversy, the court stating that quo warranto was the proper remedy.

So, where the respondent holds the certificate of election no writ will be allowed by one claiming a better title. State, O'Donnel, v. Dusman, 39 N. J. L. 677 (1877).

In People v. New York, 3 Johns. Cas. 79 (1802), mandamus was applied for, inter alia, against certain parties commanding them to desist from executing their offices, and the court denied the writ holding that where the office was already filled by a person who had been appointed and sworn and was in by color of right, mandamus was never issued to admit another person, for the reason that the corporation being a third person might admit or not at pleasure, and the right of the party in office might be injured without his having an opportunity to make a defense, and therefore the remedy in the first instance was by quo warranto.

In the absence of proof of a prima facie right in the person claiming the possession of the office and the books and papers appertaining thereto, his predecessor in office holding over is a de facto officer and cannot be compelled by such proceedings to deliver over the books and papers. Justice Orton in dissenting opinion in La Pointe Supers. v. O'Malley, 46 Wis. 35, 57 (1879).

In State v. Dunn, Minor (Ala.) 46, 12 Am. Dec. 25 (1821), a person claiming office as county court judge prayed for the issue of a writ of mandamus to compel the party then holding the commission and exercising the duties of such judge to admit the petitioner to office. It was held that the writ would not lie, there being a recorder de facto, the applicant having another remedy by quo warranto.

The court will not as a general rule turn out one officer and admit another upon proceedings by way of mandamus. People, Akin, v. Matteson, 17 Ill. 167 (1855).

No matter whether such title be directly or indirectly in question in such proceeding. State, Cannon, v. May, supra.

And this is so as, while the writ does not conclude, yet it forestalls, the opinion of the court upon the subsequent proceeding by quo warranto, which in itself is strong ground for the refusal of the writ. State, O'Donnel, v. Dusman, supra.

For the reason that the title of an officer de facto cannot be assailed collaterally, there must be a direct proceeding against him. People, Hodgkinson, v. Stevens, supra.

But the rule that mandamus will not be awarded when its object is to test the title to an office claimed by two or more parties, amounts to a rule of discretion. State, O'Donnel, v. Dusman, supra.

In proceedings by way of mandamus it may be necessary to determine as a question of fact whether or not a particular person is in actual possession of the office, or, in other words, whether he is exercising its functions; but such a matter is entirely different from determining whether such person is entitled to the office, and so it may be necessary to determine whether or not a particular person is an officer de facto, and the trying of that question is not the trial of the right to office in any sense that makes it necessary to resort to quo warranto. Warner v. Meyers, supra.

Where the issuing of the writ of mandamus would have the effect of admitting a second person to an office already filled by another, both claiming to be duly elected, resort must be had to other proceedings to contest the disputed title. Duane v. McDonald, supra.

Where the books and papers appertaining to the office of assessor had been delivered by the county clerk to the party appointed to fill such office, it was held that such county clerk could not be compelled by mandamus to deliver the papers over to another party who claimed the same office by election, the only question upon mandamus being the fact of the appointment of the party to fill the office, and not the legality or illegality of the holding. People, Phillips, v. Lieb, supra.

In State, Jumel, v. Johnson, supra, the auditor of public accounts of the state alleging that the defendant refused to deliver to him the keys and papers, etc., belonging to that office, obtained an alternative mandamus to compel their delivery. Before filing answer the defendant presented a petition for removal of the cause from the district court to the circuit court and tendered a bond, and further specifically denied that the relator was the legal and rightful auditor, and prayed that the writ of mandamus be refused and the suit dismissed. The court held that such defense presented distinctly the issue of the rightful title to an office which could not be tried by mandamus.

In State, Hero, v. Pitot, 21 La. Ann. 336 (1869), the relator based his claim on the ground that the defendant had ceased to be an officer, and that it was the former's duty under the Louisiana act of March 28, 1867, to vacate the custody of the records of the office. The court held that as it could not determine the rights of the relator without deciding upon the rights of the defendant to the office of notary public, proceedings by way of mandamus were not the appropriate remedy.

In State, Addison, v. Williams, 25 Minn. 340 (1879), the facts showed that the respondent, elected county treasurer at a general election, qualified and entered upon the duties of the office, and continued to discharge them, and remained in possession of the records and other property appertaining thereto; that at a general election, while so county treasurer, he was duly elected a member of the House of Representatives, accepted such membership and entered upon its duties; that the relators, the county commissioners, declared a vacancy in the office of county treasurer by reason of the election to the office of representatives, appointed the relator to fill it and delivered a certificate of such appointment to the relator, who accepted and qualified as provided by statute, notified the respondent's deputy of such appointment, and demanded possession of the records and property, possession whereof was withheld, the respondent contending that the controversy related to the title to the office, and that therefore quo warranto was the proper remedy. The court held that such was the case, unless the respondent's election, ac-

Liddon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The state of Florida, by the attorney general, filed in this court a petition for a mandamus against the defendant. Said petition alleged, in substance, that at the general election under the laws of said state held in and for the county of Duval on the 2d day of October, A. D. 1894, John F. Geiger was a candidate for the office of tax collector of said county, and was voted for at said election for said office; that the returns of said election were afterwards, to wit on the 4th day of October, A. D. 1894, canvassed by the county judge, the supervisor of registration, and the chairman of the board of county commissioners of said county, sitting as a county canvassing board of elections, in pursuance of law; and the said John F. Geiger was by said canvass shown to have received the highest number of votes cast for any person for said office of tax collector, and was declared elected to said office; that the supervisor of registration for said county, afterwards, to wit on the 6th day of October, A. D. 1894, did make, sign, and deliver to the said John F. Geiger a certificate of election, certifying that on the 4th day of October, 1894, W. H. Baker, county judge of Duval county, Florida, E. J. E. McLaurin, supervisor of registration of said county, and Charles Marvin, chairman of the board of county commissioners of said county, did publicly canvass the returns of the election districts of said county, filed with the said county judge and said supervisor of registration, as required by law, showing the votes cast for tax collector of said county at an election held therefor, on the 2d day of October, 1894, and did declare the result thereof, and ceptance, and entry upon the duties of representative operated to deprive him of the office of treasurer, and that the question of the relator's right to office depended altogether upon whether the respondent had any title to the same, and that relator could not move without first proving the respondent's title at an end.

In State, Tracy, v. Taaffe, 25 Mo. App. 567 (1887), an appeal was taken from a judgment awarding a writ of peremptory mandamus against the defendant commanding him to deliver all the books, papers, etc., appertaining to the office of justice of the peace, in his possession, to the relator the register of the city of St. Louis, and the court held that the Missouri statute, which provided for the delivery of the papers, had no application to the case as the justice in that case claimed title by re-election.

Where the relator's title is dependent upon the cessation of the term of office of a person actually exercising the duties of the office, and claiming that his office has not become vacant, the court will not award mandamus. State, O'Donnel, v. Dushman, 39 N. J. L. 877 (1877), citing State, Hero, v. Pitot, 21 La. Ann. 336 (1869).

In the case of State, O'Donnel, v. Dushman, supra, the writ was refused upon the ground that the evidence proved that there were less than a certain number of legal votes in the township, which fact raised a great question as to the relator's title to office.

Where the title of the applicant was not free from reasonable doubt for the reason that his title was opposed by a clerk de facto holding and exercising office on a claim and color of title, the application was denied. People, Hodgkinson, v. Stevens, 5 Hill, 616 (1843).

And the same judge refused the application upon the further ground that the judges of the supreme court had differed in their views in regard to the matter, and the ultimate establishment involved the examination of questions which were not free from legal doubt. Ibid.

In the case of People, Coleman, v. Dikeman, 7 How. Pr. 124 (1852), the facts showed that village trustees were, by an act of the legislature, authorized to appoint a cells keeper of the prison, and that by a later act the electors of the village were authorized to elect such a keeper, who was to hold office for one year and until a successor should be elected and duly qualified; that the defendant was duly elected under such last-mentioned act at a village election, and continued to discharge his duties, but later the village was, by act of the legislature, incorporated as a city, and under such act the term of all officers elected or appointed under the village charter was to expire upon a certain date; that the act incorporating the village repealed the village act and all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the charter, that the city succeeded under the act to all the rights and liabilities of the corporation of the trustees of the village, which gave the common council certain powers, but made no express provision as to the election or appointment of cells keeper, but later the common council of the city balloted for the office of cells keeper, and on such ballot the relator was elected, and the defendant refused to surrender the office, whereupon the relator obtained an order to show cause why an alternative writ of mandamus should not issue. The court denied the motion holding that there was a real and substantial dispute as to the title to the office.

Where the applicant was appointed supervisor by the justices of the town to fill a vacancy occasioned by the party previously elected omitting to take the oath of office within a certain number of days, and to compel him to deliver the books and papers of the office held and claimed by the former supervisor who held possession, the court denied the relief upon the ground that the New York statute was only applicable where the title to the office was clear and a party against whom the proceeding was taken was in possession under the color of a legal right to hold office. Re Davis, 19 How. Pr. 323 (1860).

In Re Davis, supra, application was made, under the New York Revised Statutes, to compel the delivery to the applicant of books and papers belonging to the office of town supervisors, and the question was, Who was in actual possession of the office, retaining the muniments and exercising the functions appertaining thereto? and the court stated that the statute was never intended to apply to a case where there was a real question of title to the office, and no possession to any practical purpose had been obtained, and that in such a case proceedings in the nature of quo warranto to try title to the office was the proper remedy.

A party in possession of an office with claim or color of title should have the custody of the books and papers, and a party out of possession and not in a condition to exercise its functions, and who makes no attempt to perform its duties, should not have the incidents and appurtenances to the office until there has been a trial of the title in the mode provided by law, and his right has been well established, the New York statute only being applicable where the title is clear and where the party against whom such proceeding is taken is not in possession under color of a legal right to hold the office. Re Davis, supra.

In People, Bradley, v. Stephens, 2 Abb. Pr. N. S. 348 (1866), the court refused the writ upon the ground that the title to the office depended upon an act which was a constitutional one, the relator claiming office as president of a board of aqueduct according to said returns and canvass John F. Geiger received the highest number of votes cast for any person for said office of tax collector; and that according to said election returns and canvass, and the result declared as aforesaid, the said John F. Geiger was at said election elected tax collector of said county for the term prescribed by law, and beginning the 1st Tuesday after the 1st Monday in January, A. D. 1895; that said Geiger had duly filed his bond as such tax collector, which had been duly approved by the proper authorities, and that a commission under the great seal of the state, in due form of law, had been issued by the governor to said Geiger for the term of two years from the 1st Tuesday after the 1st Monday in January, 1895, and until his successor is qualified; that the incumbent of said office, prior to the commencement of the term for which the said Geiger was commissioned as aforesaid, was one James E. Johnson, who upon the demand of the said Geiger refused, and still refuses, to surrender to him the possession of the office in the court-house of said county of Duval set apart for the use of the tax collector; and refused, and still refuses, to deliver to the said Geiger the assessment rolls, books, records, papers, and files of the said office of tax collector, although demand has been made on him for their delivery; that the action of said Johnson, as stated, is delaying and hindering the collection of the state's revenues in said county, and is likely to produce embarrassment and confusion in the collection of the same; and that there was no other remedy to compel the delivery of said assessment rolls, etc., except by the extraordinary writ of mandamus. The petition prayed

In Brown v. Turner, 70 N. C. 98 (1874), mandamus was applied for by the plaintiff as public printer against the defendant directing him to deliver the public laws to the plaintiff and restraining him from delivering them to the other defendant. The defendant demurred to the complaint upon the ground of defect of parties, and also upon the ground that the governor had no right to appoint a public printer, and that mandamus was not the proper remedy, the demurrer being overruled in the court below. Upon appeal the judgment was reversed and the demurrer allowed, there being a question of right or title to the office, which question could alone be tried by quo warranto.

In Welshans v. Shirk, 98 Pa. 17 (1881), the petition for mandamus urged that the respondent was elected treasurer and receiver of taxes for one year from a given date, subject to the right of suspension or removal as provided by law, but subsequently by joint resolution of the city council he was suspended from office, and two days following the suspension was, by another resolution, continued until further action, and on the same day the petitioner was appointed to the same office, qualified therefor and demanded of the respondent the books and papers, and certain moneys belonging to the city, which the respondent refused to deliver. The petition was demurred to upon the ground that the respondent was wrongfully removed and that the petitioner was not legally appointed, and the court denied the writ, no just cause for his suspension being shown.

In State, Addison, v. Williams, 25 Minn. 340 (1879), the court distinguished the case from that of Crowell v. Lambert, 10 Minn. 369 (1865), and State, Atherton, v. Sherwood, 15 Minn. 221, 2 Am. Rep. 118 (1870), upon the ground that in the latter class of cases the question was, Who was prima facie entitled to the possession of the records and other property of a given office? the certificate of the auditor, which was conclusive until it was affirmatively overthrown, being properly held prima facie evidence that the person named in it had been elected, and was therefore, if he had duly qualified, entitled to the possession of the records and other property of the office; and that in that class of cases the title to the office was not finally adjudicated, but the question of prima facie right was particularly regarded as settled by the auditor's certificate, while in the case at bar the question of title must be examined and determined against the incumbent de facto of the office before the relator's certificate of appointment could possess any value whatever, the case being one in which the title to the office was directly and unavoidably in controversy although the action was not one for the determination of the title but for the recovery of possession of the records, etc.

b. Question of election.

So, where the question of election is inquired into the writ will be denied, the court having no power to entertain that question in such proceedings. Case v. Campbell, 16 Abb. N. C. 269 (1823); Duane v. McDonald, 41 Conn. 517, 521 (1874).

In Grand Rapids Guard v. Bulkley, 97 Mich. 610 (1893), the relator was an unincorporated organization formed for social purposes governed by a Constitution and by-laws. The Constitution provided for the election of a board of directors to hold office for a year from a given date or until their successors were elected, and it was the duty of the board to elect, among other officers, a treasurer, whom the board of directors assumed to elect to succeed the respondent, but notice of the election was not given to all the members of the board. Upon refusal of the respondent to turn over the books, papers, and money to the party claiming under the election, mandamus was issued. The court held that such proceedings would not lie, as the relator was not duly elected, no full notice of the meeting having been given, and for the further reason that the term of office of the directors had not commenced at the time of the election.

In a case where the parties were rival candidates for the office of register of deeds, and the relator was declared duly elected by the canvassing board, whereupon a certificate was issued to him as provided by statute, but such election was subsequently contested by the defendant and was declared void, which judgment was appealed from by the relator, it was held that the respondent, until the final determination of the appeal, was entitled to the possession of the books and papers as against the prior incumbent, and, further, that the petitioner, although the former incumbent had handed over the office to him, was not entitled to the writ although he was forced to give way to the respondent by reason of force irregularly issued against him. Allen v. Robinson, 17 Minn. 113 (1871).

In State, Curtis, v. McCullough, 3 Nev. 202 (1871), the relator claimed to have delivered to him the books and papers belonging to the office of superintendent of a mining company, and to be admitted to the enjoyment of the office, but the supplemental answer of the defendant showed that the defendant, after filing his first answer, had been legally and duly appointed to the possession claimed by the relator, and the writ was therefore refused.

In Bergen v. Powell, 80 Hun. 438 (1893), an appeal was made from an order of the special term denying a motion by way of mandamus to compel the delivery of books and papers appertaining to the

for a writ of mandamus commanding the defendant forthwith to surrender to the said Geiger the office in the court-house of Duval county, set apart for the use of the tax collector, and to deliver to said Geiger the assessment rolls, books, records, papers, and files belonging or appertaining to said office, which are now in his possession. Attached to the petition was a copy of the certificate of the supervisor of registration of Duval county, and of the commission of Geiger as tax collector, referred to in the same. Upon this petition an alternative writ of mandamus, conforming to the petition and in the usual form, issued.

Upon the return of the alternative writ the defendant moved the court to quash the same upon the following grounds, to wit: 1. It does not appear, from the allegations of said writ, with legal or other sufficiency or certainty that this movent's incumbency, therein set up, of the said office, has expired. 2. That the allegations of said writ sufficiently show that this movent is the incumbent of said office, exercising the function thereof, under and by virtue of his election, qualification, and entry thereon, for a term not yet expired. 3. The allegations of said writ do not set up, issuable or traversably, the facts upon which, as matter of law, may be predicated the expiration of the incumbency of this movent, or the tenure by which this movent holds said office. 4. The said writ does not show that J. F. Geiger, to whom, by the command of said writ, this movent is required to surrender said office, was in fact elected tax collector of Duval county at the election therein alleged to have been held, by a plurality of the votes by ballot of the qualified electors of Duval county; nor office of treasurer of the board of police commissioners. The facts showed that under N. Y. Laws 1878, chap. 306, which created a certain police district and vested the powers and duties connected with the police government in a board of commissioners appointed by the supervisors of the town, the defendant with two others were appointed police commissioners. Subsequently the supervisor and the justice of the peace of the town removed the defendant and another from the office without notice, except one served on the president of the excise commission of the town to meet and act with them, which was served outside of the town, and after such removal the supervisor alone appointed the plaintiff and another to succeed to the office, which the defendant refused to vacate and deliver up the papers. The court affirmed the opinion of the court below denying mandamus, holding that the officers required by the act to appoint had not power, after making such appointment, to remove any officer from office; and further, that article 10, § 3, of the Constitution had no application to the case.

In Case v. Campbell, 16 Abb. N. C. 299 (1883), the county judge made an order for the delivery over of the books and papers appertaining to the office of town supervisor, and an appeal was taken from the order, and a stay of proceedings granted and a motion made to vacate such stay. The facts showed that both the relator and defendant were candidates for the office of town supervisor, and that at the canvass of the votes two ballots closely folded together were not opened or counted; subsequently the ballots were opened and found to be for the relator, but the board did not decide whether the two ballots in question should be counted or not; that at the trial the judge proceeded by inquiry into the election to ascertain and determine its result. The court held that such finding was beyond the power of the judge upon the summary application, and that in the absence of prima facie evidence of the relator's election there was no power vested in the judge to ascertain and declare the result, the only remedy being by action to determine the result.

Where neither the speaker of the House of Delegates nor the joint assembly of both Houses of the Legislature convened under § 3, art. 7, W. Va. Const. for the purpose of opening and publishing the returns of the election to the office of governor, did in fact open and publish the returns in respect to said office, or declare any person elected to that office, it was held that the court could not by mandamus adjudge the person who appeared from the return certificate to the speaker of the House to have received the largest number of votes for that office to be the governor, and compel the person who was the governor during the preceding term to deliver the office and the insignia to him. Goff v. Wilson, 32 W. Va. 333, 3 L. R. A. 58 (1889).

In Banton v. Wilson, 4 Tex. 400, 405 (1849), the plaintiff applied for mandamus to compel the delivery of the office of clerk of the district court together with the records appertaining thereto, and the facts showed the death of the clerk of the circuit court, and the appointment of the plaintiff by the district judge, until a regular election to fill the office was issued and published, at which election the defendant received the highest number of votes, was commissioned, and entered upon the discharge of the duties, but plaintiff claimed the office by virtue of his previous appointment and brought suit for restoration. The court refused the writ upon the ground that the defendant had been duly elected and was entitled to hold.

1. Other relief sought.

The remedy by way of mandamus has also been denied where the relator has sought protection in equity.

In Hardcastle v. Maryland & D. R. Co., 32 Md. 32 (1870), the case came before the court upon appeal from an order of the circuit court directing a mandamus commanding the delivery to the president of the company, or to its authorized agent, of certain subscription books or lists and original copies of letters relating to the business of the company. The writ charged that such papers came into the possession of the appellant when he was president, and were held by him in his official capacity, and should have been surrendered on the termination of his office as president, and the election and qualification of his successor, but the court denied the relief, upon the ground that the claimant had elected to proceed in equity where full and complete relief could be afforded, and held that the court below erred in ordering the writ.

See also King v. Wheeler, Cas. t. Hardw. 99 (1735), infra, VIII.

3. Relator's own act.

So the writ has been refused where the relator's own action was the cause of the dispute.

In Pariseau v. Escanaba Bd. of Edu., 96 Mich. 302 (1893), the relator claimed to be duly elected and to have qualified and acted as a member of the board of education until prevented by action of the board which seated another person in his place. The facts showed that the relator had tendered his resignation as a member of the board and had knowledge of the nomination of his successor, and also of the election to be held to fill the vacancy, but he claimed to have withdrawn the same. The court refused the writ upon the ground that the relator's own action brought about the state of affairs, and for the reason that there was nothing that showed that the board had not acted bona fide, and also upon the ground that the party whom he sought to oust was not made a party to the proceedings, and stated that in such a case that he was in fact declared or certificated as elected by any tribunal or person invested by law with authority to determine that he was so elected. 5. Said writ does not show that the said Geiger was in fact eligible to said office. 6. Said writ does not set up any facts upon which, because of the refusal of this movent to surrender said office, or the books and papers appertaining thereto, embarrassment, hindrance, or delay in collecting the state and county taxes in said county may be predicated.

The said defendant also at the same time, mandamus was not a proper proceeding to oust him.

VIII. English cases.

In Town Clerk of Nottingham's Case, Sid. 31, mandamus was granted to compel the delivery of the records relating to the office, which was one of public justices.

In King v. Owen, 5 Mod. 314, mandamus was allowed to a mayor to deliver the ensigns of his office to his successor, even though the words "or signify to us cause to the contrary, etc." were omitted from the writ.

In Rex v. Wildman, 2 Strange, 879, mandamus was granted requiring the defendant to deliver to the company of blacksmiths all books and papers which he had in custody by virtue of being clerk to the company from which office he had been removed, but the court held that the mandamus must be made out according to the rule.

But in an Anonymous Case reported in 1 Barnard. K. B. 402 (1730), mandamus was moved against the late clerk of the blacksmith's company in London to deliver over to the present officer all public books of the company, and the court stated that in the case of menial officers of a corporation such writ would be denied, but in that case it was granted the company being public.

In King v. Holford, 2 Barnard. K. B. 350 (1733), mandamus issued to compel the defendant to deliver over to the register of the bishop the books belonging to his office, but the rule was discharged, there being a consent to try the case by information in the nature of a quo warranto, and to deliver up the books and papers if the court found the relator entitled to the office.

In Rex v. Clapham, 1 Wils. 306 (1751), mandamus was granted to oblige the old overseer of the poor to deliver over the books of the poor's rates to the new overseer, for the reason that they were public books and ought to be delivered over by one overseer to another in order that all the parishioners might have access to them, and for the reason that the overseer and churchwarden for the time being ought to have the custody thereof.

In Rex v. Owen, Comb. 399, a rule was made for the defendant, who was served with mandamus and an alias, to return the writ which required him to deliver the mace and insignia of office appertaining to the office of mayor.

Where there is a legal right to the office which gives no right or title to the books for the reason that the defendant has an equitable right to them which bars the legal title, the case shows no right in the relator to the books and papers, and therefore mandamus will be denied. King v. Wheeler, Cas. t. Hardw. 99 (1735).

Where the right to exercise the office is that of a private office which is already the subject of a suit in equity between the parties, the court will not interfere by mandamus to compel the delivery of the books and papers. Ibid.

In King v. Buller, 8 East, 389 (1807), the late mayor and deputy mayor of a borough were called upon by a rule to show cause why mandamus should not issue commanding them to deliver to the present mayor the mace, common seal, books, and records 31 L. R. A.

but without waiving his motion to quash, made a return to the alternative writ. The substance of that portion of this return which it is thought necessary to set out here was as follows: That he has not surrendered to said John F. Geiger the office in the court-house of Duval county, Florida, set apart for the use of the tax collector, and he has not delivered to the said John F. Geiger the assessment rolls, books, records, papers, and files belonging or appertaining to the said office of tax collector of Duval county, which were in his possession, or any of them, of the office pertaining to mayor of the borough, but, it appearing that the presiding officer, who, by the Constitution of the borough, owned an integral part of an elective assembly, departed from it after the meeting had been regularly formed and the election entered upon, but before it was completed; the election made after his departure being void, the court refused the writ.

In King v. Round, 4 Ad. & El. 139 (1835), the mandamus stated that the defendant was surveyor of the highways for an expired term, and that divers books of accounts relating to the highways were in his possession and ought to be delivered to the churchwardens, and that he had been requested, but had refused, to deliver them. The defendant returned that he had not on the day of the test of the writ, nor since, nor now, nor when he was required on behalf of the churchwardens, any books in his possession, not stating whether he had delivered those in his possession between the times of the request or test of the writ, nor what he had done with them. The court held his return was good but denied him costs.

In Queen v. Hopkins, 1 Q. B. 161 (1841), a mandamus issued commanding a party who was alleged to have the custody of certain books and papers and proceedings relating to a court of requests under a local act (47 Geo. III., § 2, chap. 1), or to the office of the clerk thereof, to deliver them up to a party who claimed to hold them as having been elected clerk of the court. It was held that the mandamus was bad as not showing that the detainer was other than a private individual, even though the defendant in his return alleged that he and not the prosecutor was duly elected clerk, and that as such clerk, he was entitled to hold the books, raising on the face of the returns a question upon the construction of the local act, and of the statute 5 & 6 Wm. IV., chap. 76, the court stating that if on the face of a mandamus there was no ground for the writ the defect could not be supplied by matter appearing in the return.

In Ex parte Holloway, 30 Eng. L. & Eq. 240 (1855), mandamus was moved for on behalf of one of the churchwardens to show cause why mandamus should not issue commanding the defendant to restore to the proper custody the register books of the parish. The facts showed that a certain hospital, which was partly a charitable institution and partly an ecclesiastical benefice, was united with the parish, the church of which was pulled down, and subsequently persons were inducted to the mastership of the hospital with the rectory of the parish, but since a later date the rectory had become vacant and there was no regular officiating minister. Afterwards the appointment was made under the decree of the court of chancery to the office of receiver of hospital charities, the appointee took possession of the joint registers, which were formerly kept in the church connected with the hospital but were then out of the parish. Upon an application by the churchwardens of the parish for mandamus to compel the delivery of the register books to the churchwardens, it was held that the writ would not lie, as the possession of the books was wrongful from the first. E. W.

and for cause why he has not done so shows as follows: 1. That the respondent is the duly qualified, elected, commissioned, and acting tax collector of Duval county, Florida, elected to said office at the general election held under the laws of Florida in and for Duval county in October, 1892, duly qualified, commissioned, and inducted into office for the term of two years from the 1st Tuesday after the 1st Monday in January, 1893, and until his successor is duly qualified, and he now holds the said office in the court-house, books and papers, together with the right and title to the office of tax collector of Duval county. 2. That the said pretended election claimed to have been had and held on the 2d day of October, 1894, was not in fact an election of said Geiger by a plurality of the votes of the qualified electors of Duval county.

The remainder of the return set out at considerable length and detail the reasons upon which the defendant predicated the allegation that the election held on the 2d day of October, 1894, was not in fact an election of said Geiger. These consisted in various charges of fraud and conspiracy on the part of the county commissioners and election officers to prevent a fair, honest, and legal election, and to falsely, fraudulently, and illegally procure the counting in of said John F. Geiger to the said office of tax collector, and that such conspiracy prevented the election of a tax collector by a plurality of the votes by ballot by the qualified electors of Duval county. Various other allegations in regard to the fraudulent conduct of the election are also made. In view of our conclusion that the validity of the election, or the title of the defendant, cannot be determined in this proceeding, it is not necessary to further state the allegations of the return.

The relator demurred to this return upon the grounds (1) that it was not responsive to the writ; (2) that the facts therein set up are irrelevant and immaterial in this proceeding; and (3) that it attempts to bring into issue and to try in this cause the title to the office of tax collector of Duval county, which is not permissible in a proceeding of this character. The cause came on for hearing upon both of the pending matters; the motion to quash the alternative writ, and the demurrer to the defendant's return, being submitted together.

The first three grounds of the motion to quash the alternative writ may be considered together. The gist of all of them is, that it does not sufficiently appear from the writ that the term of office of the defendant has expired. It is true that the writ does not allege in specific words that the term of the defendant has expired, but we think it does sufficiently state facts fully equivalent to an allegation of the expiration of the term of the defendant. It would have perhaps been more exact and definite to use the specific words, but their use is not absolutely essential, and words fully equivalent and from which the expiration of the term follows as a necessary consequence are sufficient.

Examining the writ we learn that a general election under the laws of this state was held in the county of Duval on the 2d day of October, A. D. 1894, and that John F. Geiger was a candidate for the office of tax collector of said county and was voted for at said election for said office; that the returns of said election were duly canvassed by the proper canvassing board of said county, and he was shown by such canvass to have received the highest number of votes cast for any person for said office, and was declared elected to the same; that the supervisor of registration gave him a certificate of his election, certifying that according to said returns and canvass the said Geiger was, at said election, elected tax collector of said county for the term prescribed by law, and beginning on the 1st Tuesday after the 1st Monday in January, A. D. 1895; that said Geiger had duly given his bond and qualified for said office in all other respects, and that the governor of the state under his hand and the great seal of the state did commission him to be such tax collector, according to the Constitution and laws of this state, for the term of two years from the 1st Tuesday after the 1st Monday in January, A. D. 1895, and until his successor is qualified; to have, hold, and exercise said office, etc.; that the incumbent of said office prior to the term for which said Geiger was commissioned as aforesaid was James E. Johnson, the defendant. We think these allegations in connection with the provisions of our Constitution and statutes, as to the election and length of term of tax collectors, make a sufficient prima facie showing for the purposes of this case that the term of the defendant has expired, it being borne in mind, as will be further stated in this opinion, that this is not an action in which the ultimate and actual and legal title to the office can be determined. The objection, however, is made that the election of Geiger is not alleged in the alternative writ as an actual fact, or that he actually received a majority of the qualified votes cast at the said election for said office, but that his title to the office is based wholly upon the fact of his being a candidate, the determination of the county canvassing board, the certificate of the supervisor of registration, and the governor's commission. The point contended for is that the provision of the Constitution of 1895 (art. 16, § 14) providing that county officers "shall continue in office after the expiration of their official terms until their successors are duly qualified," construed together with section 6 of article 9 of the same Constitution, providing that "the legislature shall provide for the election by the qualified electors in each county" of county officers, gives to such officers so elected whose official terms have expired a further tenure of office until their successors are elected as a matter of fact by the qualified electors of the county and have duly qualified. It is claimed by the defendant that the writ substituted an allegation of the declaration of the results of an election as ascertained by a canvassing board and certification and commission, for the necessary allegation of an actual election. Thus it is contended that it does not appear that the term of office of the defendant has expired because by the imperative mandate of the Constitution he continues to hold until an election in fact of his successor. We presume there can be no doubt that the Constitution where it speaks of an election means an election in fact. Section 2 of article 6 of the same Constitution gives the legislature power to provide for the returns of elections, and with it, as a necessary incident to said power, the authority to appoint and designate some officer or board of officers to aggregate the returns, ascertain and declare the result, of such elections. The outcome of an election must not be left to uncertainty, to individual opinion, to hearsay, or to rumor, but must be settled by those appointed by the law for that purpose. When the result of an election held under the provisions of law has been ascertained and declared by the proper canvassing board, their official announcement is of binding force and efficacy as to the fact of an actual election, until reversed or set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction. Warner v. Myers, 4 Or. 72; State, Atty. Gen. v. Johnson, 80 Fla. 438, text 495, 18 L. R. A. 410. So in this proceeding, whatever may be said of other proceedings where the actual and ultimate title to the office is involved, the allegations of the alternative writ hereinbefore stated are sufficient prima facie allegations of an election in fact. A similar question was presented in the case of State, Meckling, v. Jaynes, 19 Neb. 161, which was an application for a mandamus to turn over the books and papers of a public office. There, upon a contention that the relator was not duly elected, the court said: "The relator's cause of action consists solely in his having been canvassed in, declared elected, awarded a certificate of election, taken the oath, and given the bond required by law, and the respondent having refused or failed to deliver up to him the books, papers, and furniture of the office on demand. It was quite unnecessary for him to have alleged any other facts than these in his relation, nor would the denial and disproving of any other facts by the respondent defeat the action. It is stated as the law, in a standard work on this branch of the law, as follows: 'Upon the application for mandamus the court will not go behind the certificate of election and try the relator's actual title. It is therefore wholly immaterial whether the relator was eligible to the office in question, or whether he was duly elected thereto, since to try such issues would be to determine the title upon proceedings in mandamus, which the courts will never do' (High, Extr. Legal Rem. pp. 74, 75); and this is the law of the courts generally."

What has been said in reference to the first three grounds and the authorities cited applies to the 4th and 5th grounds, the 4th ground being that the writ contained no allegation of Geiger's actual election; and the 5th being that the writ contained no allegation that Geiger was in fact eligible to said office. That the eligibility of the relator will not be determined in a proceeding by mandamus, see State, Ather-ton, v. Sherwood, 15 Minn. 221, 2 Am. Rep. 116, cited with approval in State, Atty. Gen., v. Johnson, supra. See also State, Bisbee, v. Board of State Canvassers, 17 Fla. 29, text 32.

The 6th ground was, that the writ does not set up any facts upon which, because of the refusal of the defendant to surrender said office, or the books and papers pertaining thereto, embarrassment, hindrance, or delay in collecting the state and county taxes in said county may be predicated. Conceding, but not deciding, that it is necessary that the alternative writ should make such a showing, we think it is sufficiently made in the writ. The writ contains special allegations to that effect. Even if there were no special allegations, we do not see how embarrassment, hindrance, and delay could fail to result from the general effect of the allegations of the writ—that the offices, books, and papers of the tax collector's office are in the hands of one man, who refuses to surrender them, while another clearly appears prima facie entitled to them. Both persons claiming to be the rightful tax collector, the taxpayer will be doubtful as to whom he should pay his taxes, and would probably hesitate until coerced by proceedings to sell his property before he would pay to either.

We next consider the return. Two principal points of contention are argued in connection with the return, (1) that the defendant is in office claiming to hold over until his successor is elected as a matter of fact and duly qualified, i. e., is an officer de facto; and (2) that the said pretended election claimed to have been had and held on the 2d day of October, 1894, was not in fact an election of said Geiger by a plurality of the votes of the qualified electors of Duval county. Reversing the order in which the respective contentions are presented, we will consider the last one first. It has already been said in this state, borrowing the language of a decision from a sister state, that "a prima facie title to a public office confers a right to exercise its functions, and a right to the possession of the insignia and property thereof. On this prima facie title the court will compel a delivery of the insignia and property, that the functions and duties of the office may be exercised. . . . The commission of the governor, whether granted on the certificate of election, or a certificate of vacancy, is the highest and best evidence of who is the officer, until on a quo warranto, or a proceeding in the nature of quo warranto, it is annulled by a judicial determination. It is this commission which imparts to the courts judicial notice and which informs the community who are clothed with official authority and bound to official duty. In a proceeding, whether by mandamus or under the statute, to compel the transfer of property attached to a public office, this commission is a clear prima facie title to the office, on which the courts will proceed without indulging any inquiries behind it, when it is founded on a certificate of election or a certificate disclosing vacancy made by proper authority. Inquiries behind it would generate a controversy as to title to the office, which, as we have already said, cannot be entertained either on an application for a mandamus or in the statutory proceeding. The court must rest on the prima facie title, and award the keeping of the property of the office to this title, for the time being, without adjudicating whether the relator has or has not the actual title." State, Atty. Gen., v. Johnson, 80 Fla. 438, text 492-494, 18 L. R. A. 410; State, Law, v. Saxon, 25 Fla. 792.

In view of the great public importance of this case, we have reviewed the decisions of many other states of this union upon the same subject. While there may have been some difficulty in the application of the rule, the principles announced in the extract from State, Atty. Gen., v. Johnson, supra, almost universally prevail.

We will now recur to the first contention made under the defendant's return, that the writ does not lie against him because of his claim that his successor has not been actually elected and duly qualified, he is entitled to hold over until such election and qualification, and that his right to continue in office can only be inquired into by quo warranto, or proceedings in the nature of a quo warranto. We think this point was practically involved in the case of State, Atty. Gen., v. Johnson, supra. In that case the 6th ground of the motion to quash the alternative writ of mandamus was as follows: "That the relief prayed in and by said writ of mandamus can be legally had only upon quo warranto, or upon an information in the nature of quo warranto, whereby the claim of E. W. Gillen, created by the commission therein set up, to be tax collector of Duval county, Florida, can be determined as against the de facto incumbent 'clothed with the ostensible attributes and semblance of office.'" Other similar grounds were included in the same motion. The decision of the court that it could not inquire behind the governor's commission (where it appeared that he acted within his constitutional authority), which was a prima facie title to the office in favor of the person holding it, seems a practical disposition of the defense that a mandamus to surrender the property of the office cannot issue against one claiming to be a de facto officer in possession. Yet as the precise point was not expressly determined by the court, we have very carefully examined the question in the light of authority derived from a great number of decisions. There can be no doubt that some text-books state a doctrine that seems to give some support to the contention of the defendant. Thus, in a recent work (2 Spelling. Extraordinary Relief, § 1572) we find the following: ". . . The cases in which the writ of mandamus lies, in admitting or restoring to office, are where the return to the writ will involve merely a question of law, so that, admitting the facts to be true, a peremptory mandamus ought to be awarded. The true principle underlying the jurisdiction in mandamus in these cases is that the proceeding can confer no title not already existing, though it may effect the consummation of the relator's title if he have any; but it creates no new title. . . . In all cases where the validity of an election or appointment is the main point in dispute, mandamus will not be granted until the controversy has been tried at law and an adjudication had in favor of relator. In other words the writ will not lie to try the title, but will only issue after a judgment of ouster shall have been rendered against the incumbent." To same effect is Merrill, Mandamus, § 143; also State, Jones, v. Oates, 86 Wis. 634. We have carefully examined the cases cited in the text to support the proposition laid down. None of them were cases like the present, but in all of them the writ was invoked by the party out of possession, but who claimed to be elected, while the incumbent had the commission and all the muniments of title to the office. It is only necessary to give a few illustrations from the many cases cited in such text-books upon the subject, because there is a great similarity in all of them. In the case of State, Mead, v. Dunn, Minor (Ala.) 46, 12 Am. Dec. 25, we quote only the headnote, which shows sufficiently the facts in the case. The headnote reads as follows: "Mandamus will not lie, on behalf of one claiming the office of judge of a county court, directing another who holds the commission and is in the exercise of its duties." In the later case of Thompson v. Holt, 52 Ala. 491, it is emphatically settled that mandamus will lie when the conditions are reversed, and the relator holds the state's commission, instead of the incumbent. In the case of Bonner v. State, Pitts, 7 Ga. 478, the incumbent held the commission, while the relator claimed to be elected, but had no commission. The court says (text, 479), citing a number of cases: "Was the proceeding by mandamus the proper remedy to vacate the commission of Bonner, who was elected by the new justices, and commissioned by the governor? From the record in this case, it appears that the respondent, Bonner, was the acting clerk of the court of ordinary of the county of Jones, under a commission from the governor of this state. He was in possession of the books and papers appertaining to the office, and exercising the duties thereof under a prima facie title; he was the officer, de facto, and one of the objects of the mandamus was to inquire into the validity of the respondent's title to the office, and to vacate the same. In our judgment, the relator had another specific, and much more appropriate, remedy,—to try the validity of the respondent's title to the office which he was exercising, by an information in the nature of a quo warranto." The court then quotes extracts showing that the same principle has been held in the following cases: King v. Colchester, 2 T. R. 259; State v. Delieasseline, 1 McCord, L. 43; State, Mead, v. Dunn, supra; People v. New York, 3 Johns. Cas. 79.

By protracting the length of this opinion many more similar cases could be added. On the other hand, the law is well settled that where the relator has the certificate of election and the commission, he is prima facie the officer de jure, and entitled to the property of the office, and that a mandamus to put him into possession of the same cannot be defeated by any claim of the incumbent that the election was illegal and that relator's title is not valid, and that he, the incumbent, is entitled to hold as an officer de facto until a proper election and qualification of his successor. Merrill, Mandamus, §§ 154 et seq. In the present proceeding we cannot determine the ultimate title to the office, but only the present apparent right. Prima facie the successor of the defendant has been duly elected and has qualified, and as such is entitled to the possession of the office and its books and records until, in a proper proceeding for that purpose, his title has been found defective or invalid. State, Atherton, v. Sherwood, 15 Minn. 221, 2 Am. Rep. 116; Crowell v. Lambert, 10 Minn. 389; Stone v. Small, 54 Vt. 498; Huffman v. Mills, 39 Kan. 577; People, Cummings, v. Head, 25 Ill. 325.

We see no foundation in reason for the claim of the defendant that the writ does not lie against him because he is an officer de facto. We do not think he can take an advantage of a tenure of office which is prima facie wrongful, and stand upon the bare fact of such tenure when he is called upon to surrender the property of the office to the officer de jure.

The motion to quash the alternative writ is denied. The demurrer to the return is sustained, judgment rendered for the relator upon demurrer, and a peremptory writ of mandamus is awarded, returnable on Tuesday, the 5th day of March, A. D. 1895.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

Hannah C. JOHNSON, Admrx., etc., of A. W. Johnson, Deceased.

(.....Ala.....)

1. The intoxication and misbehavior of a passenger which will authorize his expulsion from a train will not justify his expulsion without exercising due care for his safety having reference to time, place, and surroundings.
2. The ejection from a train at night of a passenger known to be drunk and irresponsible, at a place from which he can escape only by following the roughly ballasted railroad track, and crossing cattle guards on one side and a bridge over a creek on the other, renders the railroad company liable when he is killed by another train soon after.
3. The extent of the intoxication of a passenger, the conductor's knowledge of his condition, and the safety of the place at which he was ejected, are questions for the jury.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Cullman County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for alleged negligent killing by defendant of plaintiff's intestate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Thomas G. Jones for appellant.
Messrs. Cofer & Brown and L. C. Dickey for appellee.

Haralson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is the third appeal in this case. On the former,—(92 Ala. 204, and 16 So. 75) and especially in the latter,—the law as applicable to the facts of the case was fully settled. In that decision, the following propositions were announced: (1) That mere drunkenness which does not take away consciousness and the power to consider and understand the danger to which one is exposed, nor deprives him of physical capacity to take care of himself and to avoid danger, does not relieve him from the responsibility of exercising due care to escape the danger, and if killed in consequence of such neglect of duty on his part, there can be no recovery on account of the injury. (2) That a conductor on a railroad, under proper circumstances, such, as it may be admitted, existed in this case, has the right to eject a passenger from a car, but it requires that in exercising this right, it shall not be done at a time and place, and under such conditions and circumstances, as would unnecessarily expose the person ejected to great peril of life or bodily harm, whether the attendant danger arose from natural infirmity of the person or was self-imposed. (3) That if a conductor so ejecting a party from his car did not know or was not informed of the infirmity of the person and the peril attending his ejection, there would be no liability arising from the exercise of the right. (4) That if a passenger on a train is intoxicated to a degree to render him unconscious of danger,—unable to take in his position, surroundings, and perils, and his duty to avoid them,—or he does not possess the power of locomotion, and is put off the train by a conductor on account of his misconduct, and the place where he is put off and left is dangerous to one in his condition, and these facts are known to the conductor, he would be guilty of reckless and wanton negligence, rendering the company in whose employment he is liable for damages resulting from his negligence, although the person ejected and injured might have been legally ejected in a proper manner and at a proper place. Tanner v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 60 Ala. 621; Isbell v. New York & N. H. R. Co. 27 Conn. 393, 71 Am. Dec. 78; Kerwhacker v. Cleveland, C. & C. R. Co. 3 Ohio St. 172, 62 Am. Dec. 246; Louisville, C. & L. R. Co. v. Sullivan, 81 Ky. 624, 50 Am. Rep. 186; Johnson v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 58 Iowa, 348; Kline v. Central P. R. Co. 37 Cal. 400, 99 Am. Dec. 282; 3 Wood, Railway Law, §§ 363, 364; Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 493; 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 748.

The counsel for appellant in a lengthy and elaborate review of the main question at issue,—the drunkenness of deceased and the consequences following,—invites a reconsideration of some of our conclusions as announced on the last appeal. His contention is that, to make the defendant liable, deceased must have been drunk to a degree to render him unconscious of attending perils, at the time and place he was ejected; that the conductor must have known of his condition; that, as a matter of law, under the evidence, the court below should have held that deceased's intoxication was self-imposed, was not to a degree to render him unconscious; that whatever its degree may have been, the conductor was ignorant of his true condition and acted, in ejecting him, in the discharge of a right and duty; that there was nothing in the time, place, and circumstances of the ejection to show wanton or reckless negligence on his part, and that deceased was guilty of culpable negligence, which contributed proximately to his own death, for which defendant was not liable. But we remain satisfied with the principles of law as before declared, and find no reason for departing from them. It is opposed to authority and reason and the common instincts of humanity to allow, because a passenger is intoxicated, whether to a greater or less degree, and misbehaves in a manner authorizing the conductor to expel him from the train, that such expulsion may be made without the exercise of due care for the safety of the passenger, having reference to time, place, and surroundings. If expelled without the exercise of such reasonable care for his life and limb, and he is injured in consequence, the company will be liable notwithstanding the fact, if the passenger had not been drunk, he would not have misbehaved, and if he had not misbehaved, he would not have been expelled and injured. The right to make reparation rests upon the moral obligation, resting upon every one, so to exercise his own rights as not to injure another. As was well expressed in Isbell v. New York & N. H. R. Co. supra: "A remote fault in one party does not of course dispense with care in the other. It may even make it more necessary and important, if thereby a calamitous injury can be avoided, or an unavoidable calamity essentially mitigated. Common justice and common humanity, to say nothing of law, demand this; and it is no answer for the neglect of it to say that the complainant was first in the wrong, since inattention and accidents are, to a greater or less extent, incidental to human affairs. Preventive remedies must therefore always be proportioned to the case in its peculiar circumstances,—to the imminency of the danger, the evil to be avoided, and the means at hand for avoiding it." If, therefore, the case, as decided in 92 Ala. 204, contains expressions or lays down principles, as is contended by appellant, contrary to our later utterances on the subject (16 So. 75), to which we adhere, it must be modified conformably to what we here hold; and if decisions may be found to the contrary we decline to follow them. The evidence clearly shows, that the deceased was very drunk when he boarded the train and when ejected from it. It admits of much doubt if he had any intelligent understanding or comprehension of his situation, perils, and duties, whether he knew where he was, or whither he wandered. It was in the night-time, and very dark and rainy. The place was at Speagler's Cut, which was a reverse curve in the road, in the shape, as described by a witness, of the letter S. The evidence tends to show that deceased was put off about midway of the cut, and on the eastern side of it; that the wall was high and precipitous, and on the western side it was rough, rocky, and sloping down to a creek, which was swollen from the recent and falling rain; that deceased's only escape was down or up the track; and at the point where he was killed his only escape was to walk the track; on the south end of the cut, there were cattle guards, and on the north, a bridge over a creek, about 25 feet wide; and over the one or the other of these, whichever way the deceased took, he was compelled to go, to get out. It further tended to show that the track where the body was found was ballasted with limestone and sandstone mixed, and was rough; that through the cut there was space on the sides of the track wide enough for a person to walk, and that deceased lived not very far distant, and was well acquainted with the cut. It must be admitted that it was a terrible place to put a passenger off, in the night-time, whether drunk or sober. To the deceased, in the drunken condition he was, if he had any consciousness, it must have appeared a very hell. The conductor testified that the deceased acted like he had been drinking, but he did not know the fact. He refused, in a very nonsensical way, to pay his fare, and used rude, obscene language to the conductor,—at which the latter says he did not become offended,—such, as no one but a crazy or drunken man would employ. Such language and conduct evidenced a want of rationality. All this tends to show that the conductor knew deceased's condition; and that he knew when and where he put him off, and the horrors and perils of the situation, cannot be disputed. The fact, too, that deceased was run over and killed by an approaching train in a very short time after his ejection from the train tends to show how drunk and irresponsible he was. Whether the place was a proper one at which to eject him, having reasonable regard to the safety of his life and limb; how drunk he really was; and whether the conductor knew of his condition,—we held before, were questions to be ascertained by the jury, and as to the correctness of this ruling, there can be no question.

We notice only these errors assigned, which have been insisted on in argument. There was no error in allowing plaintiff's witness, Smith, to answer the questions as to how the track was ballasted at the point where deceased was killed, and its character as to roughness; and if the field, near by, was overflowed with water, and how deep, the morning after the accident. These questions related to the character and condition of the place where deceased was killed. The state of the weather, as well as the kind of night and place he was put off, were facts relevant and proper to be considered by the jury, in determining the question of the negligence of the conductor and its character. The appellant requested eleven written charges, each of which was refused by the court. Some of them, it may be, assert correct, abstract principles of law; but, as applicable to the facts of this case, the charges are either incorrect in principle, are abstract, or ignore important facts in evidence, or are calculated to mislead the jury, and were properly refused. Some of them improperly require the court to pass upon the facts of the case, and to withdraw them from the consideration of the jury. From what we have said, the vice of each, without taking the time and labor to discuss them separately, will be apparent.

STANDARD OIL COMPANY.

(.....Ala.....)

1. The words "fire-proof oil" cannot be claimed as a trademark for an illuminating oil, since the words are descriptive of oil which is not inflammable, although it is not literally proof against fire.
2. An injunction against a wrongful or fraudulent imitation of a distinctive label used by a manufacturer or trader can be granted although the label is not a trademark and contains no word, sign, or symbol which can be protected as such.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the City Court of Decatur in favor of complainant in a suit brought to enjoin defendants from using certain words alleged to be the property of complainant in connection with illuminating oils, and to recover damages for their alleged wrongful use. Reversed.

The bill alleged that complainant after experimenting and developing produced from petroleum an illuminating oil of fine quality giving a bright light when burned in lamps, emitting but a minimum of offensive odors, and charring the wick or smoking a lamp chimney less than any other brand. It was called fire-proof oil. Complainant built up a large trade in it. The words "fire-proof oil" were original with it and were intended to indicate its origin. There was no other article known to commerce as fire-proof oil, and there could be no such thing as fire-proof oil in the literal acceptance of the term. The term deceived no one but was merely arbitrary and fanciful to indicate the origin and ownership of the oil so manufactured. Defendant Scott had been in the habit of buying oil in car-load lots and selling it at various points to consumers under various names including the name fire-proof oil, all brands being taken from the same tank. By doing so he interfered with complainant's established trade and injured the reputation of its oil. In so doing Scott held himself out as the representative of the Southern Oil Company. In his dealings he had infringed a label brand, or device which complainant claimed to own but which it alleged that he had simulated for use in the sale of his oil. That he had even bought up old barrels which had contained complainant's oil and filled them with oil from his, defendant's, for resale. By so doing he had realized large profits. It is further averred on information and belief that defendants, the Southern Oil Company and W. D. Scott, are one and the same, Scott operating under the name of the Southern Oil Company, and that both were insolvent. The bill prayed an injunction against the use of the label, the use of barrels bearing complainant's name or trademark, and the use of the words "fire proof oil," and prayed an account of profits and a personal decree against defendants. A decree was rendered granting the relief prayed and defendants appealed.

Mr. John M. Chilton, for appellants:

The decree pro confesso against the Southern Oil Company was irregular in that it was not proved that W. D. Scott, upon whom service was made as its president, actually occupied that relation to the corporation, or any other relation that would authorize service upon him for the corporation.

The words "fire proof" are certainly descriptive of quality. If they are so extravagant as to be untrue, this, so far from entitling the complainant to relief, "furnishes an additional reason why he should be denied the assistance of a court of equity."

There is a class of words or terms which are called "suggestive" of quality, and which are yet held not to be descriptive of quality. But this class is limited to those where the "descriptive character that might attach to a word is so very remote as to be but secondary, so that the word will be understood by the public, not as a descriptive, but as a fanciful term; it may thus constitute a valid trademark," as "The Rising Sun."

If the nomenclature is not apt, or not "merely deceptive," then its selection as a trademark will be protected by the judiciary.

If the designation is accurate and spontaneous, it is generally fatal to the trademark; but if it is remote, far-fetched, fanciful or figurative, rather than literal, it will be protected, though it will be suggested by the nature of the article itself.

There are cheaper grades of oil known as "prime white" and "water white." These are much inferior to the "fire proof" brand. Defendant, however, in his operations, invariably procured a tank car of ordinary and inferior oil. From this tank he filled barrels for those customers desiring fire-proof oil, and sold them under that name. From the same tank he filled barrels for those customers willing to pay only the lower prices for the inferior goods.

Injury is done to appellee. Demand for its product is destroyed or will be destroyed, and the court will interfere, independent of any trademark.

Windham v. National Fertilizer Co. 99 Ala. 578.

McClellan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There was a decree pro confesso against W. D. Scott and the Southern Oil Company, the sole defendants to this bill; a submission for final decree on bill and decree pro confesso; a decree declaring the complainant entitled to relief, and referring the case to the register to ascertain and report the profits for which the defendants should account or the damages to which the complainant was entitled; a report upon said reference, to which no exceptions were filed; and a final decree enjoining the defendants as prayed in the bill, confirming the report of the register as to profits which defendants had made through the infringement of complainant's alleged trademark, fraudulent imitation of complainant's label, and fraudulent use of packages or barrels labeled by complainant, and previously used by it in the sale of oil, but which the defendants procured, after they had been emptied of their contents, and refilled and sold, and adjudging the defendants liable to the complainant for the amount of said profits. From that decree both defendants prosecute this appeal though they did not appear at all or for any purpose in the city court, nor before the register on reference. It is conceded that the defendants, notwithstanding their being in contempt below, may on this appeal question and have passed upon the equity of complainant's bill.

A prominent question in the case, going to the equity of the bill in part, is whether certain words stamped upon or affixed to packages of goods sold by the complainant constituted a trademark. Of course, it is well settled that a mere word, or several words in a certain sequence, may constitute a trademark, the exclusive use of which courts will protect. To entitle words to this protection, however, they must indicate the source or origin, and the ownership, of the article to which they are attached. By this is not meant that such indication shall result from their intrinsic significance, but it may well be the consequence of such continued and uniform use of them by a manufacturer or dealer as to create in the mind of the public an association between the words and the commodity to which they are attached, on the one hand, and the manufacturer or dealer, or the place of manufacture, on the other; so that mere words which, upon their face, import no reference to or connection with the dealer in, or owner or manufacturer of, goods to which they are constantly affixed, nor any index to their origin, may, because of their customary use upon the goods of a certain person, come to indicate very clearly that a particular package bearing the mark of them was produced by or belongs to that person. But a word which is the name of the thing to which it is affixed cannot become a trademark in respect to that thing, nor words which describe the thing to which they are attached, and indicate its characteristics, its virtues, the quantity contained in the package, etc. For, if the thing is not patented, all men have the right to make and vend it, to the use of its name, and to every word in the language to aptly describe it; and the exclusive use by one of words which are thus necessary to all, and equally belong to all, will not be protected.

It not infrequently happens—very generally, indeed—that words used for the purposes of a trademark, and which, either in themselves as originally used, denote only origin or ownership, or by user come, in the public mind, to indicate origin or ownership, though intrinsically importing nothing of the kind, come finally to a sort of adjective or descriptive significance in respect of the wares upon which they appear, and to be in the nature of an assurance that the commodity possesses certain virtues and qualities. But this is not because the words themselves are descriptive of the thing, but because they point to an origin or ownership known by experience to be the source, or the manufacturer or vendor, of goods of certain qualities. The words do not describe the thing, but they indicate who made it. This knowledge of the maker involves an assurance of quality, through the reputation which articles manufactured by him, and put on the market under his mark, have acquired. This reflex descriptive quality in words which, dissociated from their use in connection with the article, are not descriptive of it at all, constitutes, indeed, the chief value of trademarks composed of them, both to the manufacturer or dealer and the public. Such words are not descriptive, in the sense of the proposition stated next above; and that they come in this indirect way to show quality is no objection to their employment in trademarks, since their exclusive use by one would not deprive another of the full vocabulary of primarily descriptive words to which the public are entitled, and to which these do not belong. On the other hand, it is often the case that words used as, and intended to constitute, trademarks, and which are primarily and intrinsically descriptive merely, come, by their continued use by one person, to mark goods manufactured or sold by him, to clearly indicate the origin and ownership of such goods. But they do not thereby lose their primary meaning, or become the exclusive property of the person who thus uses them. They continue to belong to the common vocabulary of adjective words, and, as such, the public has a right to use them in the description of its wares, which cannot be interfered with by the courts on the theory of preventing infringement of trademarks. Such words, however clearly they may finally come to perform the legitimate offices of a trademark, by indicating origin or ownership, still have their primary significance, and they cannot be wrenched out of their places as descriptive words for the common use of all, merely because one of the public has assumed, for a time, to use them for a purpose the law does not warrant. 26 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 289, 300, 302-305; Browne, Trademarks, chaps. 3, 4; Amoskeag Mfg. Co. v. Trainer, 101 U. S. 55, 25 L. ed. 994.

In the case at bar the complainant claims as its trademark, in respect of a certain brand or grade of coal oil manufactured and sold by it, the words "fire-proof oil." These words, it is alleged,—and proved for all the purposes of this case,—were first used by the complainant, as a part of the brand or label for barrels of oil of a certain excellent quality many years ago, and have been ever since so used by it; that they had not been so used by others for this purpose before their adoption by complainant, and have not since then been so used except by the defendants. It appears, also, that by this uniform and long-continued use upon barrels of oil of a certain grade by the complainant alone, these words upon such packages have come by association with the name of the complainant in the public mind, to denote, in and of themselves, the origin and ownership of the commodity to which they are attached, though originally, of course, they did not afford any indication of origin or ownership. And, by further association of ideas, as it also appears in the case, the words, wholly apart from any intrinsic significance they may have, have come, also, to indicate a certain excellence of quality in the oil to which they are affixed, through the reputation which oil of this brand manufactured by the complainant has acquired. On the principles stated above, neither the fact that the words did not originally indicate the source or ownership of the commodity, nor that they now indirectly give assurance of its quality, can hinder the complainant in its effort to have its exclusive use of them as a trademark protected; and, on the other hand, if the words, disconnected from their long association with complainant's products, are descriptive thereof, the fact that their use in this connection had also made of them a symbol or index of origin or ownership would not justify their attempted appropriation to the purposes of a trademark. So that the real and only inquiry on this branch of the case is as to whether these words, in the collocation of their use, are descriptive of the article to which they are attached, and, in and of themselves, as thus arranged, indicate the grade, quality, characteristics, etc., of such article, and did so indicate quality, etc., when they were first used by complainant in this way.

The question is not without difficulty, even upon principle; and the difficulty is rather enhanced than relieved by adjudications of courts and departments. The trouble does not, of course, arise upon the literal and abstract meaning of the words "fire-proof" (that is clear enough,—proof against fire; incombustible); but upon their meaning, as used here, in collocation with, and having manifest reference to, an illuminating oil. We know that, in a general sense, this oil is not proof against fire, not incombustible, not "fire-proof;" and hence it is that these words, in that sense, do not, and cannot, accurately indicate a grade or quality of the thing to which they are attached. But we know, also, that oils of the class involved here contain inflammable vapors, which are evolved or thrown out at a greater or less temperature, as the oil in a given instance is of a greater or less degree of density and refinement. The evolution of these vapors gives an explosive character to the oil. The baser grades will evolve these vapors, it may be, under normal temperature; but the higher grades will not throw off explosive vapors except when subjected to a temperature so high as practically never to exist under normal conditions,—say 110 to 120 degrees. So that, under ordinary circumstances, the oil is not explosive, and a lighted match may be plunged into it without ignition. The grade or quality of oil in this respect is ascertained or proved by means of an apparatus "for proving light hydrocarbon oils by heat, to find the temperature at which they evolve explosive vapors." Century Dict. p. 6250. This apparatus, or its application, is called an "oil test," or a fire test of oil; and oils which are shown to be explosive at a low temperature are said to be of a low fire test and those from which explosive vapors are evolved only at a high degree of heat are said to be of a high fire test. And when it appears that the fire test is so high as that, under normal conditions, the temperature is never high enough to evolve these inflammable vapors, producing explosion in contact with fire, that oil is practically nonexplosive,—i. e. it is unflammable: it will not explode from contact with fire; it is proof against explosion by fire; it is, in the sense of inflammability, "fire-proof oil." And in this sense, the words claimed by complainant to constitute its trademark must, in our opinion, be taken and understood. As first used by the complainant, they clearly gave no indication of origin or ownership of the commodity; and, as they were never used by the complainant except upon a label which contained, aside from them, the most unmistakable reference to the source and ownership of the article, being no other than the full name of the complainant and of its place of business, it is not readily conceivable that they have ever been intended to indicate origin or ownership. It would be absurd to say that complainant intended by their use to indicate that the illuminating oil to which they were attached was incombustible, would not burn, could not be used for the purpose of illumination. Yet they stand in an adjective relation to "oil," and are adjective in character. Bearing, as they do, no relation to origin or ownership, and obviously not intended to denote incombustibility, the purpose of their use must have been to affirm that the oil was nonexplosive from fire contact,—that it was of that high degree of purity which is fire-proof against explosion. And this purpose of the complainant is a fact to be considered in determining whether the words themselves are descriptive of the article to which they are attached. Amoskeag Mfg. Co. v. Trainer, 101 U. S. 51, 25 L. ed. 993.

Moreover, the public, knowing that the words "fire-proof" as applied to illuminating oil could not imply incombustibility, and knowing, also, that such oil, of a certain high degree of purity and excellence, was, as to inflammability, and consequent explosiveness, proof against fire, would and does readily and naturally understand these words, in this connection, to refer to and carry assurance of that valuable quality of unflammability in oil of this kind; so that it may well be said that they are not only of a general descriptive character, but also that they aptly and unmistakably, to common apprehension, point out a very desirable quality or grade of the thing to which they are applied. Fully capable of this meaning, and in point of fact conveying it as here used, there is no room to say that this use of them is arbitrary or fanciful. They clearly differ, we think, in this respect from the terms "sunlight," "daylight," "gaslight," and "insurance," as applied to illuminating oils, which have been protected as trademarks, and also even from the term "snowflake," as applied to breads and starch, which has been denied protection because descriptive. All these terms, upon the face of them, it seems to us, are clearly fanciful in the connection in which they are thus used, and are arbitrarily applied,—not to indicate that the oil is sunlight of gaslight or daylight, nor that the light it makes is as bright as sunlight or daylight, or as soft and bright as gaslight, nor any positive quality of the oil, but as a mere fanciful name or designation for the particular commodity. And so with "insurance oil," and perhaps, also, "snowflake" bread or starch (which latter, however, have been held descriptive, and not appropriable as trademarks). It cannot be said that "insurance" indicates any quality in the oil to which it refers, or is a generic name for oil; and, at the most "snowflake" is a mere fanciful suggestion of whiteness. But the words "fire-proof," in the sense they were used by the complainant and understood by the public, are descriptive, and assertive of a positive, inherent quality, and a consequent high degree of excellence in the product to which they are attached. They do not present a mere similitude between the oil and other very different things having pretty and catchy names, but they refer alone to the oil, and directly characterize and describe it. They are in the category of words which have been rejected for trademark purposes, and which embrace such terms as "Beeswax Oil," "Paraffin Oil," "Macassar Oil," "Invisible" with reference to face powder, "Crack-Proof" rubber goods, "Razor Steel," "Tasteless" for drugs, because either descriptive or deceptive, "Straight Cut" tobacco, "Cable Twist" tobacco, etc., and, like these terms, are not appropriable to this use, because they are descriptive. It is of no consequence that the complainant first produced oil of this quality, and first applied to such, or other, oil the appellation of "Fire-Proof." If, as we think, these words are descriptive, every other person who subsequently produced or dealt in oil of this quality had an equal right with complainant to the use of them in describing his product or wares. Of course, the complainant might have coined a word to identify its oil, and been protected in its exclusive use; but this is a very different matter from the use of words (or a single word, rather; for that used is really but one compound word) which already existed as a part of the language, and hence was publici juris.

We therefore conclude that the bill presents no case of infringement of a trademark, and that, so far as it seeks an injunction of the use of the words "fire-proof oil" by the defendants, and an account of profits accruing to them through the use of said words, dissociated from complainant's label, it is without equity. This conclusion will operate a reversal and remandment of the cause. The question whether the defendants have imitated complainant's label can better be determined in the chancery court—and in this court, should there be another appeal—upon answer and proof than on the present appeal; and, since the bill on another ground clearly has equity, we will not now undertake to decide whether defendants have fraudulently or wrongfully imitated the label of the complainant, but will content ourselves with saying (what is not questioned in this case, we believe) that a manufacturer or trader is entitled to an injunction against a wrongful or fraudulent imitation of his distinctive label, though the label is not a trademark, and contains no word, sign, or symbol filling the definition of a trademark or to be protected as such. The bill presents a clear case for injunction, and an accounting for profits in respect of the use by the defendants of barrels bearing complainant's label, which, after being sold by complainant, containing oil, and emptied of their contents, are bought up by the defendants, refilled with their oil, and sold. This is a flagrantly fraudulent appropriation of the complainant's label, and the good will attaching to it, to the manifest injury of the complainant and the public. Browne, Trademarks, §§ 443 et seq. Unless the Southern Oil Company answers the bill, or some further showing is made that it is a partnership or a myth, service upon some agent of it should be proved before the register before decree pro confesso passes.

Reversed and remanded.

VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

COMMONWEALTH of Virginia, Appt.,
v.

John MYERS.

(.....Va.....)

An exemption of manufacturers who have paid taxes on capital employed, from the provisions of a statute imposing a license tax upon peddlers, renders the statute unconstitutional as a regulation of commerce when applied to a nonresident acting as an agent or employed in the sale of goods owned and manufactured by a nonresident corporation.

A PPEAL by the Commonwealth from a judgment of the Hustings Court of Richmond in favor of defendant in a prosecution against him for peddling without a license. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. R. Taylor Scott, Attorney General, for appellant:

The merchandise called "soapine," the manufactured product of the Kendall Company, a corporation domiciled in the state of Rhode Island, when sold in the city of Richmond, had become incorporated into the bulk of said city's property, therefore was subject to the state and city property tax, and its sale to such license tax as was imposed thereon by the revenue laws of this commonwealth.

In Emert v. Missouri, supra, Missouri's statute which imposed a license upon peddlers was adjudged valid and constitutional.

Mr. Edmund Waddill, Jr., for appellee:

The Congress of the United States has the power to regulate the peddling of articles within the several states, except as to such matters as come within the police power of the states.

The states may, however, prescribe the manner and method of peddling articles of foreign production, after they become a part of the mass of the property of the state, provided such law affects foreign and home products alike.

An act which makes any discrimination between peddlers as to their residence, and the place where the articles peddled are manufactured, is void.

Keith, P., delivered the opinion of the court:

At the April term, 1895, of the hustings court for the city of Richmond, the attorney for the commonwealth proceeded against John Myers by information, setting forth that he was not a manufacturer, nor a manufacturer assessed with the tax imposed upon his capital employed under Schedule C of an act (Acts 1889-90, p. 200) to provide for the assessment of taxes on persons, and on licenses to transact business, and for the support of the government, but is one who has no regular place of business in this city, open at all times in regular business hours; and that on the 4th day of April, 1895, within the jurisdiction of the hustings court of the said city, he was engaged in going from house to house and street to street, with a wagon and horse, offering for sale an article known as "soapine," and did sell and offer for sale the said merchandise in the said city to one Mrs. James Woolridge, without first having obtained the license required by law. To this information John Myers appeared, and filed a general demurrer, which was overruled, and thereupon he pleaded "Not guilty;" and a jury was impaneled for his trial, which resulted in his acquittal. Upon the petition of the commonwealth, through its attorney general, a writ of error was awarded by this court.

The record contains several bills of exceptions, in the first of which the evidence is set out, from which it appears that every fact set out in the information was sufficiently proved. It also appears from the evidence of the accused, who was examined as a witness on his own behalf, that he is an employee of the Kendall Manufacturing Company, whose domicile is in the state of Rhode Island; that he did not own or have any interest in the merchandise which he offered for sale, nor in the proceeds of such sale; that soapine was manufactured by the Kendall Company in the state of Rhode Island, and that he was paid regular wages for his services as the agent and salesman of the said company, and that the soapine so offered by him for sale was the property of the Kendall Manufacturing Company; that it was shipped by the said company to him as their agent in Richmond, and by him offered for sale, and sold for the company; that he made daily reports of sales, and received weekly wages; that all the officers of the company are nonresidents of the state of Virginia, and that he was also a nonresident of the state of Virginia, being a citizen of the state of Maryland; that the merchandise offered for sale was the product and manufacture of the Kendall Company; that it was not injurious to health, nor damaging to morals, but to be used in cleansing and purifying, and had been for a long time used for these purposes; and that the said company and the said Myers have no place of business in Richmond. Thereupon the commonwealth asked the court to instruct the jury as follows: "If the jury believe from the evidence that John Myers did, as charged in the information, go from street to street in the city of Richmond, with a wagon and horse, and that in the wagon said Myers carried merchandise called 'soapine,' and further believe that said Myers, without the license required by law, sold, or offered for sale, said merchandise, viz., soapine, then they must find him guilty, and assess him with a fine, so that the same shall be not less than $100 nor more than $500 for each offense,"—which was refused. And Myers, the defendant, asked the following instructions, which were given: "The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the defendant, at the time he offered to sell, and sold, the commodity in the information mentioned, known as 'soapine,' was the employee or representative of the Kendall Manufacturing Company; and that the said defendant had no other interest in said goods; and that the said goods were the product and manufacture of said Kendall Manufacturing Company; and that the company, as such manufacturers, at the time of the sale, were engaged, through their representative, the said defendant, in selling and vending their products,—then they should find the defendant not guilty." "The court further instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the defendant, at the time he offered to sell, and sold, the commodity in the information mentioned known as 'soapine,' was in the employ of the Kendall Manufacturing Company, of the state of Rhode Island; that such goods were the product and manufacture of the Kendall Manufacturing Company; and that the alleged offense, mentioned in the information, consisted of said nonresident corporation, through its employee, the defendant, also a nonresident, offering its said commodity, duly manufactured by it, for sale in the city of Richmond, Va.; and that such article was not injurious in its character, either to public health or morals, but was useful as a cleansing commodity, to be used for general household purposes, and, as such, had been long in general use,—then they must find the defendant not guilty, although they may believe he had taken out no license to sell such commodity." And to the refusal of the court to give the instruction asked by it, and to the giving of the instructions asked by the defendant, the commonwealth excepted.

The statute under which this prosecution took place is to be found in sections 32 and 33 of the Acts of Assembly 1889-90 (p. 217). Section 32 provides: "That any person who shall carry from place to place any goods, wares, or merchandise, and offer to sell or barter the same, or actually sell or barter the same, in transitu or otherwise, shall be deemed to be a peddler, and any person licensed as a peddler may sell any personal property a merchant may sell, or he may exchange the same for other articles. . . . Any peddler who shall peddle for sale, or sell or barter, without a license, shall pay a fine of not less than one hundred nor more than $500 for each offense. . . . This section shall be construed to include persons engaged in peddling lighting rods; provided, however, that any manufacturer who has been assessed and paid up on the capital employed by him, under Schedule C of this act, shall not be required to take out the license named in this section for the privilege of selling articles actually manufactured by him: provided, also, that all persons who do not keep a regular place of business (whether it be in a house, or vacant lot, or elsewhere), open at all times in regular business hours and at the same place, who shall offer for sale goods, wares, and merchandise, shall be deemed peddlers under the provisions of this act." Section 33 prescribes the license tax to be paid for the privilege of peddling or bartering in any county or corporation, with a proviso annexed to it, which we do not deem it necessary to discuss.

The question presented in the record is as to the constitutionality of section 32 of the Acts of 1889-90, just quoted. On the part of the defendant in error it is contended that this statute is repugnant to article 4, § 2, cl. 1, and to article, 1, § 8, cl. 3, of the Constitution of the United States, and is therefore null and void. Upon the part of the commonwealth it is contended that it was merely an ordinary tax upon the business or occupation of a peddler, equal and uniform in its operation, upon all engaged in that business, and is not an attempt to regulate commerce between the states, and can have no such tendency. It is not my purpose to attempt any general discussion of the very numerous decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States upon this and kindred subjects. It is indeed, happily for us, unnecessary to do so, as it has been done in a recent and able opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Gray in the case of Emert v. Missouri, reported in 156 U. S. 296, 39 L. ed. 430, 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 68. That a state may impose a tax upon the occupation of itinerant peddlers, and require them to obtain a license to practice their trade, is fully sustained by that case; nor can it be denied that the Virginia statute correctly describes those who shall be deemed to be peddlers. "Any person who shall carry from place to place goods, wares, or merchandise, and offer to sell or barter the same, shall be deemed to be a peddler;" for "the leading primary idea of a peddler," says Chief Justice Shaw in Com. v. Ober, 12 Cush. 493, "is that of an itinerant or traveling trader, who carries goods about, in order to sell them, and who actually sells them to purchasers, in contradistinction to a trader who has goods for sale and sells them in a fixed place of business." In Emert v. Missouri the statute under consideration provided "that whoever shall deal in the selling of any goods, wares, or merchandise (except books, charts, maps, and stationery) by going from place to sell the same," is declared to be a peddler, and is prohibited from dealing as a peddler without a license. The facts agreed were that on a certain day the Singer Manufacturing Company was a corporation of New Jersey, and that the defendant was, on and prior to that day, in the employment of that company, and on that day, in pursuance of that employment, and having no peddler's license, was engaged in going from place to place in Montgomery county, with a horse and wagon, soliciting orders for the sale of the company's sewing machines, and having with him in the wagon one of those machines, the property of the company, and manufactured by it in New Jersey. In deciding this case, Mr. Justice Gray says: "The statute in question is not part of a revenue law. It makes no discrimination between residents or products of Missouri and those of other states, and manifests no intention to interfere, in any way, with interstate commerce. Its object in requiring peddlers to take out and pay for licenses, and to exhibit their licenses, on demand, to any peace officer, . . . appears to have been to protect the citizens of the state against cheats and frauds, or even thefts, which, as the experience of ages has shown, are likely to attend itinerant and irresponsible peddling from place to place and from door to door." In Howe Mach. Co. v. Gage, 100 U. S. 676, 25 L. ed. 754, the Supreme Court of the United States held that the statute of the state of Tennessee, as construed by the supreme court of Tennessee, made no discrimination in the tax which it imposed on account of the place of growth or produce of material or of manufacture, but that it applied alike to the sale of sewing machines manufactured in the state of Tennessee and out of it, and that, inasmuch as all sewing machines were placed upon the same footing with respect to the tax complained of, its action was not unusual or unreasonable, and the state had an unquestionable right to impose the burden. In Woodruff v. Parham, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 123, 19 L. ed. 382, it was held by Mr. Justice Miller that "a simple tax on sales of merchandise imposed alike on all sales made in Mobile, whether the sales be made by a citizen of Alabama or of another state, and whether the goods sold are the produce of that state or some other, was valid and constitutional, there being no attempt to discriminate injuriously against the products of other states or the rights of other citizens. It was therefore not an attempt to fetter commerce among the states, or to deprive the citizens of other states of any privilege or immunity possessed by citizens of Alabama. But," said the court, "a law having such operation would be an infringement of the provisions of the Constitution which relate to those subjects, and therefore void." In Ward v. Maryland, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 418, 20 L. ed. 449, a statute of Maryland which required all traders residing within the state to take out licenses at certain rates, and subjecting to indictment and penalty persons not residents of the state, who, without taking out a license at a higher rate, should sell or offer for sale, by card, sample, or trade list, within the limits of the city of Baltimore, any goods, wares, or merchandise whatever, other than agricultural products and articles manufactured in the state, was held to be unconstitutional, because it imposed a discriminating tax upon the residents of other states. In Webber v. Virginia, 108 U. S. 344, 26 L. ed. 565, the statute there called in question was held to be unconstitutional because it made "a clear discrimination in favor of home manufacturers and against the manufacturers of other states."

Enough has been said, and sufficient authorities have been cited, to show the line of distinction which runs between those statutes which have been held constitutional and those which have been declared void for repugnancy to the Constitution. The right of the state to impose a license tax upon peddlers, where it operates uniformly upon all citizens, and does not discriminate in favor of citizens of Virginia as against citizens of other states, or where the tax imposed is in the exercise of the police power, and is not a regulation of commerce under cover of that power, although incidentally it may have that effect, has been uniformly maintained; but where any injurious discrimination is discovered in favor of the resident as against the nonresident, or with respect to the sales of articles manufactured in this state over similar articles manufactured abroad, the state laws are declared to be void, as repugnant to the Constitution of the United States.

In this case the defendant in error was engaged in selling an article owned and manufactured by the Kendall Manufacturing Company, of Rhode Island. It is not pretended that it was hurtful or injurious in any way, and the same article, if manufactured within the limits of the state of Virginia, could have been sold under exactly the conditions set out in the information in this case, and made the basis of prosecution against the defendant in error, without incurring any penalty whatever. A citizen of Virginia who had manufactured the identical article could have hawked or peddled it from place to place within the limits of the commonwealth without incurring the penalties denounced by § 32. If that be so, then the statute under consideration does injuriously discriminate against the products of other states and the rights of other citizens, and is an attempt to fetter commerce among the states, and does deprive the citizen of another state of the privileges and immunities possessed by citizens of this state, and is an infringement of the provisions of the Constitution, and therefore void.

It follows that the judgment of the Hastings Court of the City of Richmond must be affirmed.

City Council of ALEXANDRIA.

(.....Va.....)

1. Failure to provide for a notice to the person whose property may be affected by a local assessment, and give opportunity to appear and contest the legality, justice, and correctness of the assessment at some stage in the proceedings before it becomes final, renders the statute authorizing such assessments void for want of due process of law.
2. An assessment upon abutting property for street improvements levied according to benefits is not a violation of Const. art. 10, § 1, requiring taxation to be equal and uniform upon all property according to value.
3. An ordinance for a local assessment by the front foot is not authorized by a statute providing for assessments according to benefits.

(February 13, 1886.)

NOTE.—The validity of frontage assessments is the subject of a note to Raleigh v. Peace (N. C.) 17 R. A. 380.

Cardwell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The 33d section of the charter of the city of Alexandria, as amended by an act of the legislature approved March 1, 1888, provides that, "whenever any street shall be laid out or extended or any existing street graded, paved, or repaved, or culvert or sewer built, or curbing put down, two thirds of the expense thereof shall be paid by the owners of the real estate benefited thereby. Whenever any sidewalk shall be laid, the whole expense thereof shall be paid by the owners of the real estate benefited thereby." The city council of Alexandria, by an ordinance approved May 12, 1886, provided that, "whenever paving, graveling, or other improvements of the street shall be ordered to be done by the city council, whether of the sidewalk or carriage-way, that it shall be the duty of the superintendent of police immediately upon the completion of the same to return to the clerk of the common council a statement of the total expense thereof with a list of the proprietors of the ground in front of which said paving, graveling, or other improvements shall have been done or being put down, showing the extent of the front ground of every such proprietor, and including the half of any joint alley running into the street paved, gravelled, or otherwise improved, or upon which curbs have been put down, which statement shall be filed and preserved by the said clerk, who shall also forthwith make out and deliver to the proper collector of taxes for collection according to law bills against every such proprietor for two thirds of an amount which shall bear the same ratio to the cost of all the work done on that half of the street on which his lot fronts as the front of the proprietor's ground bears to the front of all the lots on the same side of and binding on that portion of the said street so paved, gravelled, or otherwise improved. And the like proceedings and privileges shall be had by said collector in regard to such bills as in regard to bills for other taxes, assessments, or charges."

By virtue of the aforesaid 33d section of the charter, the city council of Alexandria passed the following ordinance:

"Be it ordained by the city council of Alexandria, Va., that the committee on streets are hereby authorized and directed to have the curbing set, gutters paved, and a 6-foot brick sidewalk put down on both sides of Alfred street, from the south line of Duke street to the north line of Wilkes street, and the said committee on streets shall advertise for ten days in some newspaper published in the city of Alexandria, for proposals to do said work, and shall enter into contract with the lowest responsible bidder for said work, and require of the person or persons contracting to do said work or furnishing the material therefor, to give bonds in the penalty of $1,000 with surety or sureties to be approved by said committee, conditioned for the faithful performance of said contract,

"Be it further ordained, that an assessment shall be levied upon the property binding on said street as described in this ordinance, to wit: Two thirds of the cost of such guttering and curbing to be paid by the owners of the real estate fronting on said street, and the whole of the cost of putting down said brick sidewalk to be paid by the owners of the real estate on said street. The committee on streets are authorized to employ a competent engineer to superintend said work at a cost not to exceed $5 a day."

Pursuant to this ordinance the curbing was set, gutters paved, and a 6-foot brick sidewalk put down on both sides of Alfred street, from the south line of Duke street to the north line of Wilkes street, as provided for in the ordinance. The total cost of this work amounted to $1,989.36, and this was apportioned according to frontage among the owners of the lands abutting on Alfred street, as to two thirds of the costs of curbing and paving the gutters, and as to the whole of the costs of the sidewalks; the city of Alexandria paying one third of the cost of curbing and paving gutters. Of this frontage the heirs of Robert G. Violet, who are the appellants here, owned 353 feet 3 inches, extending back with that width 123 feet 3 inches, and were assessed with the sum of $396.03, as the proportion of the total costs of the improvements to Alfred street to be borne by their property abutting on that street; this sum including two thirds of the costs of curbing and paving the gutters, and the entire cost of the sidewalk, and apportioned according to frontage. On the 29th of March, 1895, the city council of Alexandria filed its bill in the corporation court of the city of Alexandria, against appellants, to enforce the lien claimed by the complainant on appellant's property on Alfred street, for the amount assessed against the property, as stated. The defendants demurred to and answered this bill. The answer admitted that the work was done as set out in the bill, but denied that the lot or ground on which complainant claimed a lien had been benefited by the improvements to Alfred street, and denied that complainant had a lien on the lot or ground as claimed. Upon the hearing of the cause, on the bill and exhibits therewith, and the demurrer and answer thereto, the corporation court of Alexandria overruled the demurrer, and decreed a sale of the property, to be made by commissioners appointed, unless the defendants paid to the complainant, the city council of Alexandria, within thirty days, the amount claimed in the bill and the costs of this suit. From this decree, an appeal and supersedeas was awarded by a judge of this court.

The facts in the case are few, and need not be considered, as they are, in the main, not controverted; but the grounds upon which appellants deny the validity of the claim asserted by appellee are as follows:

(1) The ordinance under which the claim arises is contrary to the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which declares that no state shall "deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." (2) The charter and ordinances of the city of Alexandria are in conflict with § 1, art. 10, of the Constitution of Virginia, in which it is provided: "Sec. 1. Taxation, except as hereinafter provided, whether imposed by the state, county, or corporate bodies, shall be equal and uniform, and all property, both real and personal, shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained as prescribed by law. No one species of property from which a tax may be collected shall be taxed higher than any other species of property of equal value." (3) The city council of Alexandria did not have the authority, under the provision of the 33d section of the charter, to pass the ordinances set forth in the bill of complaint; and said ordinances are in conflict with the charter, and null and void.

The first question to be considered may be stated in this form: Can an assessment for local improvement be exacted by a municipal corporation until the person of whom it is exacted shall have had opportunity to appear and contest the legality, justice, and correctness of the proposed assessment? It will be observed that the section of the charter of Alexandria, and the ordinance under which the controversy arises, quoted in full above, do not provide for any notice to the owners of the lots abutting on Alfred street which gave them the opportunity to be heard before their property was assessed to meet the costs of the proposed improvements to the street. The earnest contention of counsel for appellee is that the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States does not apply to local assessments for improvements, but relates principally to the exercise of the right of eminent domain; while, on the other hand, it has been argued in the courts of some of the other states of the Union that it does not apply to the exercise of the eminent domain power. This question, however, is reviewed by Lewis, in his work on Eminent Domain (§ 865), where he shows, upon reason and authority, that the provision cannot be restricted either to the exercise of the right of eminent domain or to other proceedings affecting liberty or the rights of property. He says that the provision that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation is simply an additional guaranty to the provision that a citizen shall not be deprived of his liberty or property without due process of law; that "the one provision is not exclusive of the other. . . . The one prevents the property of the citizen being taken under that power [of eminent domain], for any purpose except a public use, and then only upon making just compensation; while the other prevents his property being taken for public use without due process of law." And he then adds: "Without attempting to answer this question [What is due process of law?] by a general definition, it is sufficient for the present inquiry to say that all the authorities agree that due process of law requires that a person shall have reasonable notice and a reasonable opportunity to be heard before an impartial tribunal before any binding decree can be passed affecting his right to liberty or property." We need not extend the discussion as to what is due process of law; for it is not pretended that there has been due process of law in the proceedings leading up to the assessment in the case at bar, but the claim is that the provision does not apply. "That local assessments are made under the taxing power does not admit of a doubt," says Burroughs, in his excellent work on Taxation (p. 461). See also Cooley, Taxn. pp. 623, 624, where he says: "That these assessments are an exercise of the taxing power has over and over again been affirmed, until the controversy must be regarded as closed,"—citing numerous authorities. Bedle, J., in the opinion of the supreme court of New Jersey in the case of State v. Fuller, 84 N. J. L. 227, says: "This class of assessments is distinguishable from our general idea of a tax, but owes its origin to the same source or power; and this power to tax should exist in the discretion of the legislature, without the interference of the courts, unless some radical principle is violated or the guaranties of the Constitution are disturbed under color of its exercise."

A clearer statement of the rule that should govern in considering the question arising in this case cannot be found, and it brings us directly to the question whether the enforcement of a local assessment for improvements to a street, where the person of whom the assessment is exacted has had no opportunity to appear and contest the legality, justice, and correctness of the assessment before it is finally determined upon, and a lien fixed on his property, is the taking of his property without due process of law, within the meaning of the provision of the Federal Constitution. In every instance where the rights of property are involved, before the liability of the taxpayer is finally determined, he must have some kind of notice of the proceedings, and an opportunity to be heard with reference to the value of his property and the amount of the charge. 2 Hare, Const. L. 871, and cases cited in note 8. In Cooper v. Wandsworth Dist. Bd. of Works, 14 C. B. N. S. 181, involving the action of the board of public works, in pursuance of a statute which did not require notice, Willes, J., said: "I apprehend that a tribunal which is by law invested with power to affect the property of one of her majesty's subjects, is bound to give such subject an opportunity of being heard before it proceeds; and that that rule is of universal application, and founded upon the plainest principles of justice." Judge Earl, in an elaborate opinion of the court of appeals of New York in Stuart v. Palmer, 74 N. Y. 191, 30 Am. Rep. 289, said: "It is difficult to define with precision the exact meaning and scope of the phrase 'due process of law.' Any definition which could be given, would probably fail to comprehend all the cases to which it would apply. It is probably wiser, as recently stated by Mr. Justice Miller, of the United States Supreme Court, 'to leave the meaning to be evolved by the gradual process of judicial inclusion and exclusion, as the cases presented for decision shall require, with the reasoning on which such decisions may be founded.'" Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 104, 24 L. ed. 619. It may, however, be stated generally that due process of law requires an orderly proceeding adapted to the nature of the case in which the citizen has an opportunity to be heard, and to defend, enforce, and protect his rights. . . . We cannot conceive of due process of law without this." And, again: "It has always been the general rule in this country, in every system of assessment and taxation, to give the person to be assessed an opportunity to be heard at some stage of the proceeding. That 'due process of law' requires this, has been quite uniformly recognized."

The case of Stuart v. Palmer, supra, arose under the act of the general assembly of New York, passed in 1869, and amended in 1870, entitled "An Act to Lay out, Open, and Grade Atlantic Avenue in the Town of New Lots, Kings County." The act provided for two assessments,—one for the damages awarded to the owners of the land, under § 3 of the act of 1869, as amended, and another for the expense of regulating, grading, etc., under § 4, as amended. The former assessment was to be made and confirmed after proper notice to and hearing of the parties interested. The latter assessment could be made without any notice to or hearing of any person, and was, under the provisions of the act, made a lien upon the lands upon which they should be assessed, and to be levied and collected in the same manner as other taxes are required by law to be collected. Stuart, upon whose land an assessment had been made under this act, brought his action against Palmer, collector of the taxes of the town of New Lots, to vacate the assessment as a cloud upon his title to the land, and to restrain the collector from collecting the tax, upon two grounds, one of which was that the assessment had been made without any notice to or hearing of him or other property owners. The opinion of the court of appeals of New York, by Judge Earl, as stated, held the act unconstitutional, and that the assessment and lien thereof was void, and vacated and set it aside because it was made, levied and confirmed without any notice to plaintiff or other property owners affected by it, and that, as the act required no notice, and a provision for notice could not be implied, it was, in effect, to deprive the owner of his property without due process of law; citing a great number of authorities to sustain this conclusion. Mr. Justice Field, in discussing this question in the opinion of the circuit court of the United States, district of California (Santa Clara County v. Southern P. R. Co. 18 Fed. Rep. 410), says: "The notice to which we refer need not be a personal citation; it is sufficient if it be given by a law designating the time and place where parties may contest the justice of the valuation. As a general rule only a statutory notice is given. The state may designate the kind of notice and the manner in which it shall be given. All that we assert, or have asserted, is that there must be a notice of some kind which will call the attention of the parties to the subject, and inform them when and where they will be permitted to expose any alleged wrong in the valuation of which they may complain. It was with reference to the class of cases where values are to be found upon evidence, that we said in the San Mateo suit that notice and opportunity to be heard were essential to the validity of the assessment, and without which the proceeding by which the taxpayer's property was taken from him would not be due process of law. This eminent jurist goes so far as to say that to exclude the operation of this constitutional provision in matters of taxation would necessitate a limitation by implication upon the broad and comprehensive language used, so as to make it read, 'Nor shall any state deprive any person of his property without due process of law, except it be in the form of taxation,' and adds 'that the power of oppression by taxation is not thus permitted.' He also says 'that the contention that there is a difference in the law as to notice and opportunity to be heard when an assessment is made for local purposes, and where it is made under a statute providing revenue for the state, is without foundation;' that 'nothing is better established, by a weight of authority absolutely overwhelming, than that notice and opportunity to be heard are indispensable to the validity of the proceeding." This case afterwards went to the United States Supreme Court, and the decision of the lower court was affirmed, Mr. Justice Harlan delivering the opinion, though he does not discuss the constitutional question so elaborately argued by both Mr. Justice Field and Judge Sawyer in the lower court, saying that it was unnecessary to do so, as the judgment could be affirmed on another ground.

In discussing the question whether the right to be heard in tax cases is a right which is indefeasible (Cooley, Taxn. 1st ed. 265, 266), Judge Cooley says: "We should say that notice of the proceedings in such cases, and an opportunity for a hearing of some description, were matters of constitutional right. It has been customary to provide for them as a part of what is 'due process of law' for these cases; and it is not to be assumed that constitutional provisions, carefully framed for the protection of property, were intended, or could be construed, to sanction legislation under which officers might secretly assess one for any amount in their discretion, without giving him an opportunity to contest the justice of the assessment. It has often been very pointedly and emphatically declared that it is contrary to the first principles of justice that one should be condemned unheard; and it has also been justly observed of taxing officers, that 'it would be a dangerous precedent to hold that any absolute power resides in them to tax as they may choose, without giving any notice to the owner. It is a power liable to great abuse,' and it might safely have been added, it is a power that, under such circumstances; would be certain to be abused. 'The general principles of law applicable to such tribunals oppose the exercise of any such power.'" See also authorities cited in notes 1, 2, p. 266. Due process of law requires that he (the land owner) shall have a chance to interpose objection to the validity of the tax, or to the contention that his land is liable for it, or to the manner of assessing or collecting it, at some stage of the proceedings, before his property is irrevocably gone; and this before some authority competent to afford relief in case of invalidity or injustice. Mr. Black, in note to case of Read v. Dingess, 8 C. C. A. 398.

Counsel for appellee cite, in support of their contention, the case of Davidson v. New Orleans, supra, quoting from the opinion of Mr. Justice Miller, in which he says—substantially what is said by Mr. Dillon in his work on Municipal Corporations (pages 930-932, § 760)—"that whenever, by the laws of a state, or by state authority, a tax, assessment, servitude, or other burden is imposed upon property for the public use, whether it be for the whole state or of some more limited portion of the community, and those laws provide for a mode of confirming or contesting the charge thus imposed, in the ordinary courts of justice, with such notice to the person, or such proceedings in regard to the property, as is appropriate in such proceedings, it cannot be said to deprive the owner of his property without due process of law, however obnoxious it may be to other objections. So the determination of the taxing district and the manner of the apportionment are all within the legislative power; and whenever the law operates alike on all persons and property similarly situated, equal protection cannot be said to be denied." But it is clear to my mind that this does not sustain appellee's contention, as the court there declares, in plain language, that whenever the laws there discussed provide a mode for contesting the charge imposed in a court of justice, with such notice to the person, or such proceedings in regard to the property, as are appropriate to the nature of the case, then they do not deprive a person of his property without due process of law; thus clearly making the constitutionality of the law dependent upon its giving notice to the party to be affected, and an opportunity of contesting the charge. In every case that I have been able to examine which has gone to the Supreme Court of the United States, and in which the question under consideration was considered, that court has upheld the validity of the laws upon the ground that notice and hearing had been provided for, or held the laws to be unconstitutional and void because notice to the party to be affected and an opportunity to be heard were not provided for. McMillen v. Anderson, 95 U. S. 37, 24 L. ed. 335; Davidson v. New Orleans, supra; Hagar v. Reclamation Dist. No. 108, 111 U. S. 701, 28 L. ed. 569; Spencer v. Merchant, 125 U. S. 345, 31 L. ed. 763; Walston v. Nevin, 128 U. S. 578-582, 32 L. ed. 544-546; Lent v. Tillson, 140 U. S. 316, 35 L. ed. 419; Paulsen v. Portland, 149 U. S. 30, 37 L. ed. 637; Pittsburg, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Backus, 154 U. S. 421, 38 L. ed. 1031. But for extending the discussion of this question to too great a length, if such is not already the case, innumerable decisions of the courts of other states might be cited and reviewed, wherein assessments for local improvements were held to be void, and were vacated, because made, levied, and confirmed without any notice to property owners affected.

We come now to consider the cases that have been before this court since the adoption of the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution, growing out of assessments for local purposes. They are Norfolk City v. Ellis, 26 Gratt. 224; Sands v. Richmond, 31 Gratt. 571, 31 Am. Rep. 742; Richmond & A. R. Co. v. Lynchburg, 81 Va. 473; Green v. Ward, 82 Va. 324; Davis v. Lynchburg, 84 Va. 870, and Norfolk v. Chamberlain, 89 Va. 196. In neither of these cases was the question as to whether the assessment was in conflict with the Federal Constitution raised or discussed, except in the case of Davis v. Lynchburg. In that case, Judge Lacy, delivering the opinion of the court, in discussing the question that no provision was made for the person to appear and contest the proceedings, and that this deprived him of his property without due process of law, says that, while the cases cited by counsel (for Davis) held that the ordinance, without such provision for notice, was unconstitutional, yet, as an original question, it was "obvious that all possible notice is given by the progress of the work itself, and under our system of laws every citizen is held charged with the notice of the public law." In the abstract, this latter proposition is sound, but I do not think that the first can be maintained upon reason or authority. It is not enough that the owners of the property affected by a local assessment may by chance have notice, or that they may, as a matter of favor, have a hearing. The law must require notice to them, and give them a right to a hearing and an opportunity to be heard. It matters not, upon the question of the constitutionality of such a law, that the assessment has, in fact, been fairly apportioned. The constitutional validity of the law is to be tested, not by what has been done under it, but by what may, by its authority, be done. The legislature may prescribe the kind of notice, and the mode in which it shall be given, but it cannot dispense with all notice. Stuart v. Palmer, 74 N. Y. 188, 30 Am. Rep. 289. The object of the Constitution in requiring notice and the opportunity to be heard is that a man may be able to protect himself from wrong. What opportunity is afforded him of doing so by seeing work being done on the street in front of his property, when neither before nor after the passage of the ordinance is he given an opportunity to be heard as to the legality of the ordinance, or the charge against and lien upon his property by the work being done? While he may be held charged with notice of a public law, he cannot be held so charged by a law that is unconstitutional. In addition to the fact that the question of "due process of law," guaranteed by the Federal Constitution, was not raised or discussed when the case of Norfolk City v. Ellis, supra, was decided by this court, the 14th Amendment had been but a few years before adopted, and, so far as I have been able to find, no case had been decided by either a state or Federal court at that time, in which this question was raised; and the cases relied on as authority by Judge Staples for the decision in Ellis' Case, were cases determined before the adoption of the 14th Amendment. At all events, none of them are decisive of the question. Upon this question, I am of opinion that, where a statute (i. e. the charter of a municipal corporation) authorizes an assessment of any part of the costs and expenses of opening, extending, grading, or otherwise improving the streets or sidewalks of such corporation, upon the land or lots abutting on the street opened, extended, graded, or otherwise improved, without providing for a notice to the person whose property may be affected by the assessment, giving such person an opportunity to appear and contest the legality, justice, and correctness of the assessment at some stage in the proceedings before the assessment becomes final, such statute is in conflict with the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and that an assessment made thereunder is void, and creates no lien upon his property.

The validity of assessments for local purposes, made under the charters and ordinances of the cities concerned, was fully considered and decided in the Virginia cases named above, in each of which, with the exception of Chamberlain's Case, supra, the assessment was declared not to be in violation of § 1 of article 10 of the state Constitution; the right to make the assessment being upheld upon the theory of benefits to the abutting lot owners. Chamberlain's Case was typical of that class referred to by Judge Staples in the opinion of this court in Norfolk City v. Ellis, supra, where he says, "I do not mean to say that cases may not occur of such gross oppression and injustice as to require judicial interference;" and the decision of the court, holding that the assessment on Chamberlain's land or lot was void, was on this ground. It may therefore be said that the decisions of this court uniformly hold that an assessment upon abutting lands or lots to meet the expense of improvements to the street in front of such land or lots, levied according to benefits to such land or lots, is not in violation of § 1 of article 10 of the state Constitution. The decisions of a majority of the courts of the other states of the Union having similar constitutional provisions are to the same effect. Among them are the states of New York, Ohio, Wisconsin, Missouri, California, Kansas, Connecticut, New Jersey, North Carolina, Louisiana, Tennessee, Iowa, Indiana, Vermont, and South Carolina. See also Burroughs, Taxn. pp. 467 et seq.; Elliott, Roads & Streets, pp. 369, 370, and citation in note 2; 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. pp. 911, 912, 936. Mr. Burroughs says (on page 369): "It is but just, it is well reasoned, to compel the land owner, who gains by the value added to his land by the improvement, to pay that value, rather than to exact it from those who receive no direct benefit. It detracts nothing from his gain that others profit by the improvement." So, as was said by Judge Lacy in Davis v. Lynchburg, supra, "we cannot be unmindful of the salutary principles stare decisis," and it must therefore be said that it is well-settled law in Virginia that an assessment for local improvement, such as is authorized by § 38 of the charter of Alexandria city, is not in conflict with § 1 of article 10 of the Constitution of Virginia.

It remains, however, to be determined whether the city ordinances of Alexandria, under which the assessment was made, are in conflict with the charter of the city, and therefore void. As will be readily observed, the thirty-third section of the charter provides for an assessment upon the owners of the real estate benefited (i. e. according to the benefits to the property assessed by the improvements), while the ordinances of the city provided, and the assessment in this case was made, according to the proportion the front of appellants' ground bears to the front of all the lots on the same side of and binding on that portion of Alfred street improved. In other words, the assessment was authorized by the ordinances, and actually made, according to the frontage of appellants, and not according to the benefits to their ground by the improvements to Alfred street. Municipalities having no inherent power in these cases, it is necessary to the validity of their action that they keep closely to the authority conferred. Their ordinances and resolutions must be adopted in due form of law, and they must keep within them afterwards. They can bind the taxpayer only in the mode prescribed, and can substitute no other. This is the general proposition of law as laid down by Judge Cooley in his work on Taxation (2d ed. 656). In discussing this question, Mr. Burroughs on Taxation (§ 148, pp. 472, 473) says: "It will be noticed that the questions discussed in this section are totally different from those in § 147. In that section the question was as to the power of the legislature to adopt one mode in preference to another; here the question is, when the legislature has delegated the authority to cities or towns to assess the expense on the lots or property benefited, whether such a delegation of power limits the municipal authorities as to the mode of making the assessment, or whether, having such authority, they may select the mode of apportioning the expense, and impose it by the front foot, square foot, or value, just as the legislature might have done. The weight of authority and of the analogies of law are decidedly that such a delegation limits the municipal authorities to the mode of assessment according to the benefits conferred by the improvement.

No case can be found, it is believed, in which an assessment not according to the benefit conferred has been sustained, when the delegation of authority was to assess on the property benefited." He then adds: "The case of Norfolk City v. Ellis, supra, which is seemingly opposed to this position, does not discuss this question. It merely discusses and decides the general question that an assessment by the front foot is not void, and even in that case it is said that there should be a remedy for cases of hardship by appeal to the council for abatement." In this section (148) the writer does say that "in Pennsylvania, however, a general delegation of authority 'to make rules and regulations and keep streets in repair, and to collect a tax for that purpose,' was considered sufficient to sustain an assessment by the front foot." Here the statute delegating the authority was considered broad enough to confer upon the city authorities the power to select the mode of assessment. It may also be said, with reference to Ellis' Case, supra, that the assessment was made under a provision of the charter of Norfolk city, which conferred upon the council of the city authority to raise annually, by taxes and assessments, such sums of money as they might deem necessary to defray the expenses of street improvements, and in such manner as they should deem expedient.

Whether an assessment by the front foot, i. e. according to the frontage on the street improved, where the charter expressly authorizes this to be done, or is broad enough to plainly confer upon the city the power to select the mode of assessment, would be a valid assessment, I express no opinion, nor as to whether an assessment upon the land or the lots abutting on a street improved for the entire costs of improvements would be valid, as a decision of these questions is not necessary in this case. The question here is, as we have seen, whether the ordinance by which the assessment is per frontage is authorized by § 33 of the charter of Alexandria, which section authorizes an assessment on the property benefited, and clearly means, I think, that the assessment is to be made in accordance with the peculiar benefits accruing to the property assessed by reason of the improvements,—certainly not in excess of such benefits. Upon the theory of benefits rest all of the decisions of this court and of other courts upholding assessments of this character, and upon this theory alone are they looked upon with favor by text writers; nor can they, upon reason and sound principles of justice, be justified upon any other theory. All of the authorities maintain that, when the power to levy such assessments is delegated by the legislature to a municipal corporation, the act must be strictly construed, and that the city authorities must keep closely within its provisions. To this effect are the decisions of the court in Green v. Ward, supra, and Kirkham v. Russell, 76 Va. 956. Strike out the element of benefit and a special assessment loses its foundation. Elliott, Roads & Streets, p. 405; Ashberry v. Roanoke (Va.) 22 S. E. 361. It may be that the assessment upon the property of appellants per front foot does not exceed the peculiar benefits to their property. They deny that it has been benefited at all and there is no proof on the subject; but this is immaterial to a decision of the question here. It is clear to my mind that, where the statute confers this power, and limits its exercise to the benefits by the improvements to the property assessed, or is not broad enough to be considered as by fair intendment to confer upon the authorities of the city the power to select the mode of assessment, an assessment per frontage is an unwarranted assumption of benefits, and does not meet the requirements of the statute, but is in conflict therewith.

For the foregoing reasons, I am of opinion that the decree of the Corporation Court of the City of Alexandria overruling appellants' demurrer to the bill filed in this cause was erroneous, and should be reversed, and that this court should enter such decree as the Corporation Court ought to have entered, sustaining the demurrer, and dismissing the bill.

MISSISSIPPI SUPREME COURT.

George RICHBERGER, Appt.,

v.

AMERICAN EXPRESS COMPANY.

(.....Miss.....)

The cursing, abuse, and maltreatment of a person by an agent of an express company immediately after refunding to such person overcharges which he had come to the office to obtain, and the delivery of a receipt therefor, are part of the res gestæ and make the company liable for the tort.

(January 6, 1896.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Coahoma County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for abuse of plaintiff when he went to defendant's office to transact certain business. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Cook & Yerger for appellant.Mr. D. A. Scott, for appellee:

It cannot be said with any reason that the appellee was under any obligation whatever to protect the appellant from the wilful abuse or insult of its agent; and this, too, notwithstanding the fact that the alleged injury or actionable language was used by the appellee's agent in its office. Unmistakably when this agent thus acted towards appellant he was acting, not within the line of his duty nor within the scope of his employment, but evidently in direct violation of his duties to his principal, and to that extent violated his obligation to his principal. And if any liability whatever was incurred by this wanton act of his, it was a personal liability, and not one for which the court will hold the appellee to account.

M'Manus v. Crickett, 1 East, 106.

The master's responsibility is not the motive of the servant, but whether that which he did was something which his employment contemplated, and something which if he did it wilfully he might do in the employer's name.

Cooley, Tortis, 536; Williams v. Pullman Palace Car Co. 40 La. Ann. 87.

When the agent, acting in the capacity bestowed upon him by the corporation, and in discharge of some duty or employment directed by the employer or incidental to his situation, does an act that causes damage, the corporation is responsible. But where the agent does any act of his own free will, without reference to his functions as an agent, the corporation is not responsible.

For the acts of the agent or servant wilfully and intentionally done without command or authorization of the master, the servant is liable and the master is not.

Whitfield, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff had been made to pay an overcharge on express matter from Clarksdale to Tulwiler, in this state, by the local agent of appellee, and the general agent had been seen, and stated that the matter would be arranged. Plaintiff saw the local agent about it on December 25, but was put off. Subsequently, the declaration avers, "said plaintiff, on or about the first day of January, 1895, went to the office of said express company, upon business with said company, when said agent of said company, in charge of the office, informed plaintiff that he then and there desired to refund to plaintiff the said overcharge, and did then and there pay to plaintiff said overcharge, and required plaintiff then and there to sign a receipt for same, and when the said plaintiff signed and delivered said receipt to said agent, the said agent did then and there, immediately upon the reception of said receipt, and while plaintiff was there in the office of said company, wilfully, wantonly, oppressively, and wrongfully curse, abuse, insult, and maltreat plaintiff, because plaintiff had demanded and received from said company said overcharge," etc. The old doctrine of M'Manus v. Crickett, 1 East, 106, that the master is never liable for the wilful or malicious act of his servant (like the early doctrine that a corporation was never so liable, which latter doctrine arose out of the early misconception of the nature of a corporation. See 5 Thomp. Corp. §§ 6275, 6277, 6280, 6298) has long since been repudiated. Cowen, J., put the whole argument for the opposite view in a single sentence when he said, in Wright v. Wilcox, 19 Wend. 343, 32 Am. Dec. 507, that "the dividing line was the wilfulness of the act." But the whole argument against liability, on such reasoning, is definitely and conclusively answered in Thompson on Corporations.

where the whole question is exhaustively treated. Says this author, in section 6298: "The courts which have so ruled have proceeded on the theory that authority from the master to the servant to commit a wilful wrong or a crime will not be implied, and that the servant, when so acting, will therein be deemed to act, not for his master, but for himself. If he makes use of his master's property in committing this wrong, he will be deemed, according to the fantastic reasoning of Lord Kenyon, in M'Manus v. Crickett, borrowed from Rolfe's Abridgment, to have acquired, for the time being, a special property therein. The fallacy of this reasoning was, that it made a certain mental condition of the servant the test by which to determine whether he was acting about his master's business or not. Moreover, with respect of all intentional acts done by a servant in the supposed furtherance of his master's business, it clothed the master with immunity if the act was right, because it was right; and if it was wrong, it clothed him with a like immunity because it was wrong. He thus got the benefit of all his servant's acts done for him, whether right or wrong, and escaped the burden of all intentional acts done for him which were wrong. Under the operation of such a rule, it would always be more safe and profitable for a man to conduct his business vicariously than in his own person. He would escape liability for the consequences of many acts connected with his business, springing from the imperfection of human nature, because done by another, for which he would be responsible if done by himself. Meanwhile the public, obliged to deal or come in contact with his agents, for intentional injuries done by them, might be left wholly without redress. . . . A doctrine so fruitful of mischief could not long stand unshaken in an enlightened system of jurisprudence." And he states that it is repudiated by eminent text writers, and the great weight of modern authority, citing quite fully the authorities to date. He then clearly shows the true test to be, not whether the act was committed in pursuance of orders from the master or against orders, whether the master ratified or not, whether the tort was wilful and malicious or not, but whether, and solely whether, the act constituting the tort was done in the master's business. As well said in Passenger R. Co. v. Young, 21 Ohio St. 518, 8 Am. Rep. 78: "If the nature of the injurious act is such as to make the master liable for its consequences, in the absence of the particular intention, it is not perceived how the presence of such intention can be held to excuse the master." Sections 6299-6316, inclusive. He also clearly points out that the rule is not one of logic, but of public policy and necessity,—a view concurred in by Judge Andrews in Higgins v. Waterliet Turnp. & R. Co. 46 N. Y., at page 27, 7 Am. Rep. 293, the reasoning in which case, and in Rounds v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 64 N. Y. 129, 21 Am. Rep. 597, is unanswerable. To the same effect, see Pulmeri v. Manhattan R. Co. 133 N. Y. 261, 16 L. R. A. 136; Cooley, Torts, p. 626 (1); Mechem, 31 L. R. A.

Agency, §§ 740, 741, and the authorities cited by these writers. Judge Thompson is not alone in his criticism of M'Manus v. Crickett, supra. Chief Justice Ryan, in Craker v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 36 Wis. 657, 17 Am. Rep. 504, points out the fact that M'Manus v. Crickett rested on Middleton v. Fowler, 1 Salk. 282, the only case cited in its support, and that that case was not a case of malice, but of negligence; and said, with great pertinence and power, that "one employing another in good faith, to do his lawful work, would be as little likely to authorize negligence as malice," and that "either would be equally dehors the employment." See also American Exp. Co. v. Patterson, 73 Ind. 430; Southern Exp. Co. v. Fitzer, 59 Miss. 581; Williams v. Planters' Ins. Co. 57 Miss. 759, 34 Am. Rep. 494.

It thus appears that M'Manus v. Crickett is not now law. Counsel for appellee relies upon and cites this case and the cases of McCoy v. McKowen, 26 Miss. 487, 59 Am. Dec. 264, and New Orleans, J. & G. N. R. Co. v. Harrison, 48 Miss. 112, 12 Am. Rep. 356. It is true that both these cases are based on M'Manus v. Crickett. It is also true that both expressly declare that "it is immaterial whether or not the tortious act be committed while the agent is engaged in the rightful business of his employer, which he is attending to by his direction; for if he transcends his authority while so engaged, his acts do not bind his employer unless sanctioned by him," thus declaring immaterial that which is the very test of liability in this class of cases. So far as this declaration is concerned, these cases are hereby overruled expressly, that they may not further mislead. They have been practically overruled by repeated subsequent decisions of this court, Williams v. Planters' Ins. Co. supra. As to New Orleans, J. & G. N. R. Co. v. Harrison, supra, it is correctly said by Judge Thompson (sec. 6300, bottom of page 4929), that "the true reason of the decision was, not that the act was wilful or malicious, but that it was plainly outside of the line of duty of the servant."

But it is urged that, however applicable this doctrine may be to carriers of passengers, it is not applicable to an express company. Doubtless, there is a difference in the extent of the application of the principle, as between carriers of passengers and express companies, measured exactly by the difference in the things done by them in the discharge of their duties, respectively. But the principle applies to both. An express company does not transport passengers, and cannot be made liable as a carrier of passengers might, for wilful torts committed by its agent on passengers in their transportation; but it keeps offices for the transaction of its proper business, a business calling to its offices every day thousands of citizens, and in its dealing with its customers in its offices, in its business, it is bound, in Judge Story's language, "for respectful treatment and for decency of demeanor." It is impossible to say, on the allegations of this declaration, that the tort committed immediately upon the delivery of the receipt to the agent, and because of the demand for the refunding of what was plaintiff's conceded due, was so separated in time or logical sequence as not to have been an act done in the master's business. The whole transaction occurred in the shortest time, and was one continuous and unbroken occurrence. The cursing and abusing and maltreatment were all administered in connection with the taking of the receipt, and immediately upon its delivery, and because of the demand for his rights in that matter, and while plaintiff was in appellee's office to transact, and transacting, this very business. What was said and done thus immediately upon the delivery of the receipt was part of the res geste. As well said by Judge Thompson, in his Commentaries on Corporations (sec. 6299, top of page 4928): "In this view, even under the modern doctrine, the acts and declarations of the servant or agent, tending to show his state of mind at the time of the act complained of, would be admissible in evidence as part of the res geste." We have heretofore quoted from the masterly opinion of Judge Andrews in Rounds v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 64 N. Y., at page 186, in Illinois C. R. Co. v. Latham (Miss.) 16 So. 757, to show when in this character of case the corporation would not be liable. Complementary to that we close this opinion with the words of the same great judge, in the same case, at page 184, 64 N. Y., to show here a case of liability: "The master who puts the servant in a place of trust or responsibility, or commits to him the management of his business or care of his property, is justly held responsible when the servant, through lack of judgment or discretion, or from infirmity of temper, or under the influence of passion aroused by the circumstances and the occasion, goes beyond the strict line of his duty or authority and inflicts an unjustifiable injury upon another."

Reversed, demurrer overruled, and cause remanded.

TEXAS SUPREME COURT.

WACO WATER & LIGHT CO., Appt.,

v.

City of WACO et al.

(86 Tex. 661.)

The "very question to be decided" which is required to be certified by the court of civil appeals, under the Texas statutes, is not presented by a certificate of the question whether or not a demurrer should be sustained to plaintiff's petition.

(May 10, 1894.)

CERTIFICATION by the Court of Civil Appeals for the Third Supreme Judicial District for the opinion of the Supreme Court of NOTE.—Definiteness of question to be certified.

The practice of certifying questions to a higher court for decision pending the hearing in the lower court without taking up the whole case for review seems to have originated in the statutes governing such practice in the Federal courts in this country. The practice has been more or less fully adopted in several of the states, but must be distinguished from the reporting or reservation of a whole case by a single justice for the opinion of the whole court or by a lower court for the opinion of a higher one which has been practiced in England and in some states in this country. The proper practice as to the form of the question to be certified has been very fully settled by the Supreme Court of the United States, and such decisions will doubtless be regarded as authoritative in states which have adopted the practice.

The whole case must not be sent up.

If the judges divide on the whole case, and not on one or more points contained in it, the supreme court will not take jurisdiction of the case. Saunders v. Gould, 29 U. S. 4 Pet. 392, 7 L. ed. 397.

If the whole record of the case is sent up with a statement that the judges have differed in opinion, with no statement as to what the point of difference is, the supreme court will not take jurisdiction of the case. Wolf v. Usher, 28 U. S. 3 Pet. 269, 7 L. ed. 675.

The provision for certificates of division in opinion is meant to meet a case where, two judges sitting, a clear and distinct proposition of law, material to the case, arises, on which, differing in opinion, they may make such a certificate as will enable the supreme court to decide the question.

If in reality more than one question occurs they may be embraced in the certificate; but where it is apparent that the whole case is presented to the supreme court for decision with all its propositions of law and fact, the case will be dismissed. Waterville v. Van Slyke, 116 U. S. 699, 29 L. ed. 772. The whole case must not be brought up. Webster v. New England Mortg. Co. 106 U. S. 605, 27 L. ed. 99. A certification of the whole case pro forma does not confer jurisdiction. Webster v. Cooper, 51 U. S. 10 How. 54, 13 L. ed. 325.

The case cannot be split up into distinct points to take up whole case.

The whole case cannot be certified by splitting it up into several distinct questions. Jewell v. Knight, 123 U. S. 432, 31 L. ed. 192; Smith v. Craft, 123 U. S. 436, 31 L. ed. 267.

United States v. Giles, 13 U. S. 9 Cranch, 212, 3 L. ed. 708, was an action on a marshal's bond for money alleged to have been converted by him to his own use. The jury found the facts and assessed the damages conditionally upon each of the alleged breaches, leaving it to the court to say whether or not there had been a breach of the bond. The court being divided in opinion certified to the supreme court that they were opposed upon all the points submitted by the special verdict and certified the disagreement to the supreme court. The court ruled that the points on which the judges were divided were too imperfectly stated to enable the court to form an opinion, and remanded the case. The circuit court then certified that they were opposed upon ten questions, and proceeded to state them in order, as to whether judgment should be given for plaintiff or defendant upon each of the breaches assigned. The supreme court questions arising upon the appeal of plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for McLennan County in favor of defendants in an action brought to enjoin the collection of a tax levied upon plaintiff's property. Dismissed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Richard I. Monroe and William B. Hord for appellant.

Messrs. L. C. Alexander and James A. Harrison for appellees.

proceeded to consider the questions in that form and decided the case upon that certification.

But in later cases that practice was disregarded.

The submission of the case in distinct points which in fact cover the whole case will not be sufficient to cause the supreme court to take jurisdiction if by doing so it would exercise original rather than appellate jurisdiction. White v. Turk, 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 238, 9 L. ed. 1069.

The principle involved in the objection to acting on several points which dispose of the whole case is not that the whole case may not properly be disposed of by a decision on what is certified, but that the division must in substance be not on several questions arising in various stages of the case and some of them anticipated and presented so as to cover the whole case. United States v. Chicago, 48 U. S. 7 How. 185, 12 L. ed. 660.

The mere fact that the certificate is divided into points will not suffice if it is evident that the whole case is thereby sent up. Nesmith v. Sheldon, 47 U. S. 6 How. 41, 12 L. ed. 335.

The whole case cannot be brought before the supreme court by splitting it up into fragments so as to procure the opinion of the supreme court before the trial of the case in the lower court. United States v. Hall, 131 U. S. 51, 33 L. ed. 97; United States v. Reilly, 131 U. S. 58, 33 L. ed. 75.

But the fact that the questions are several in number and involve the whole case will not defeat the jurisdiction if they arise at one time, at one stage in the cause, and involve little beyond one point. United States v. Chicago, supra.

The importance of the question is immaterial.

In some of the earlier cases a practice was recognized of permitting difficult questions to be sent up pro forma, but this practice was subsequently discontinued and the court refused to consider such cases.

In Jones v. Van Zandt, 46 U. S. 5 How. 215, 12 L. ed. 122, it is said the questions extend to the unusual number of fourteen; not, however, that the presiding judge in the circuit and his associate sustained strong doubts concerning the general points involved in all of them, but because the questions involved could not otherwise be brought here. And they present so wide and deep an interest as to render it desirable that they should come under the revision of this court. For that purpose in conformity to what is understood to have been the usage in the circuit they accommodated the parties by letting a division pro forma be entered on all the points presented.

In United States v. Stone, 30 U. S. 14 Pet. 524, 10 L. ed. 572, the court says: "We are aware that in some cases where the point arising is one of importance and difficulty, and it is desirable for purposes of justice to obtain the opinion of this court, the judges of the circuit court have sometimes by consent certified the point in this court as upon a division of opinion where in truth they both rather doubted than differed about it. We do not object to a practice of this description when applied in proper cases and on proper questions. But they Stayton, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The statute provides that "whenever, in any case pending before the court of civil appeals, there should arise an issue of law which said court should deem it advisable to present to the supreme court for adjudication, it shall be the duty of the presiding judge of said court to certify the very question to be decided to the supreme court, and during the pendency of the decision by the supreme must be cases sanctioned by the judgment of one of the justices of this court in the circuit."

But in a later case the court said: "It is the divisions of opinion pro forma and from courtesy to counsel and on a variety of points and at times at which they have not actually arisen but being anticipated which appear to transcend the original design of vesting such power in the supreme court. And although an indulgence has sometimes been given to certificates where in important cases a division was certified pro forma, yet we do not feel justified in repeating it." United States v. Chicago, 48 U. S. 7 How. 185, 12 L. ed. 660.

The point of difference must be certified.

A statement in a certificate that the judges are not able to agree, one being of opinion that judgment should be rendered for plaintiff and the other being of opinion that judgment should be entered for defendant, does not state such a distinct point or points as will give the court jurisdiction. Sadler v. Hoover, 48 U. S. 7 How. 646, 12 L. ed. 855.

If no point in the case is certified the case will be dismissed. Luther v. Borden, 48 U. S. 7 How. 1, 12 L. ed. 581.

The question must not be general.

The question whether or not upon the facts as stated and proved the action can be maintained is too general and will not be answered. Daniels v. Chicago & R. I. R. Co. 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 250, 18 L. ed. 224.

The question of the right of plaintiff to recover cannot be certified. State Nat. Bank v. St. Louis Rail Fastening Co. 122 U. S. 21, 30 L. ed. 1121.

The question whether plaintiff or defendant is entitled to judgment on a special verdict is too general. Hosford v. Germania F. Ins. Co. 127 U. S. 399, 32 L. ed. 196; Fire Ins. Asso. v. Wickham, 123 U. S. 434, 32 L. ed. 506.

The question whether upon the facts stated the plaintiffs have any right or title to the lands taken for a street is too general to require an expression of opinion by the supreme court. Harris v. Elliott, 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 25, 9 L. ed. 333.

The question must not be abstract.

The court will not answer an abstract question if no facts are disclosed in the record which show that it has arisen or can thereafter arise in the case. Havemeyer v. Iowa County, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 294, 18 L. ed. 38.

The question must be perfectly stated.

A question is insufficient which requires the court to find out for itself the point intended to be presented by searching through the allegations of the answer and the provisions of a statute relied on in the case, and by also examining either the whole Constitution of the state or else reports or records of decisions of its cases referred to in the answer and made a part thereof. Dublin Twp. v. Milford Five Cent Sav. Inst. 128 U. S. 513, 32 L. ed. 534.

If the points reserved are too imperfectly stated by reason of the fact that the evidence upon which the questions arise is too indefinitely pointed out court the cause in which the issue is raised shall be retained for final adjudication in accordance with the decision of the supreme court upon the issue submitted." Laws 1892, p. 31, § 35. The certificate presented is as follows: "This suit was instituted by appellant in the district court of McLennan county, December 19, 1891. On hearing in chambers, the district judge refused to grant an injunction, and on the 9th day of March, 1892, in term time, a general demurrer to plaintiff's petition was sustained. A copy of the petition and exhibits thereto is hereto attached. The appellant assigns as error the ruling of the court on the demurrer to the petition, and the court of civil appeals for the third supreme judicial district hereby certifies that question to the supreme court for decision." The petition and exhibits referred to are attached, and from them it may be seen that a water company is seeking to enjoin the collection of a tax on its property, levied for the purpose of paying for water which the city authorities had contracted to take from a rival water company.

The determination of the question whether the demurrer was properly sustained to the pe-for the court to determine which is referred to so as to pronounce an opinion on them, no direction as to their solution will be given to the court below. Perkins v. Hart, 24 U. S. 11 Wheat. 287, 6 L. ed. 463.

In Leland v. Wilkinson, 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 294, 9 L. ed. 430, one of the questions was whether the description of the demanded premises in a certain deed taken in connection with the confirmatory act was sufficient in law to divest the plaintiff's title to the same and convey the same to the grantees, and the court held that the reference to the description of the demanded premises was not so stated as to enable it to decide the question.

It must not involve a question of fact.

To give the supreme court jurisdiction there must be questions of law and not questions of fact—not such as involve or imply conclusions or judgment by the judges upon the weight or effect of testimony or facts adduced in the cause. And they must be distinctly and particularly stated with reference to the point of the case upon which such question or questions shall have arisen, and the points must be single and must not bring up the whole case for decision. Dennistoun v. Stewart, 59 U. S. 18 How. 565, 15 L. ed. 499.

A certificate which involves a finding of fact is not sufficient. Adams v. Jones, 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 207, 9 L. ed. 1058.

The question as to whether or not a certain patent infringes another patent involves a question of fact and is not sufficient to give the court jurisdiction. Wilson v. Barnum, 49 U. S. 8 How. 258, 12 L. ed. 1070; California Artificial Stone Paving Co. v. Molitor, 113 U. S. 609, 28 L. ed. 1106.

The question of fraud or no fraud cannot be certified unless the facts upon which it is based are found and distinctly stated, so that a legal conclusion can be reached therefrom. Ogilvie v. Knox Ins. Co., 59 U. S. 18 How. 577, 15 L. ed. 490.

The question whether or not a contemplated bridge will, if erected, constitute a material obstruction to navigation is one of fact and cannot be certified. Silliman v. Hudson River Bridge Co., 66 U. S. 1 Black, 582, 17 L. ed. 81.

The question whether or not grantees of one who obtained title to property by fraud are affected with his fraud so that the title is not good in them involves a question of fact which cannot be certified to the supreme court. Brobst v. Brobst, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 2, 18 L. ed. 387.

There must be no facts to be found by the supreme court. Weeth v. New England Mortg. Co., 106 U. S. 605, 27 L. ed. 99.

Whether a sale of goods was fraudulent is a mixed question of law and fact and cannot be certified. Jewell v. Knight, 123 U. S. 432, 31 L. ed. 192.

Fraud is a question of fact. Smith v. Craft, 123 U. S. 436, 31 L. ed. 267.

Necessary facts must be stated.

The certificate must be accompanied by a proper statement of the facts on which the questions or 31 L. R. A.

propositions of law to which answers are desired arise. Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. McKeen, 149 U. S. 259, 37 L. ed. 725.

The statement of facts should be of ultimate facts, leaving nothing but a conclusion of law to be drawn; not a statement of particular facts leaving an inference of fact to be drawn before a decision can be made. Jewell v. Knight, 123 U. S. 432, 31 L. ed. 192.

The question as to the power of an officer of a foreign government under certain circumstances will not be sufficient to obtain the opinion of the supreme court if it does not state sufficient facts as to the extent of such officer's authority under the laws of his government to enable the court to pass upon the question. Carrington v. Merchants' Ins., 33 U. S. 8 Pet. 495, 8 L. ed. 1021.

The question whether or not a certain act of a bank cashier makes a valid contract on behalf of the bank cannot be certified unless the facts regarding the general power and authority of the cashier and any authorization or ratification of his act on the part of the bank and all other facts affecting the question of the validity of his act are found and reported with the certificate. United States v. City Bank, 60 U. S. 19 How. 385, 15 L. ed. 662.

In Enfield v. Jordan, 119 U. S. 680, 30 L. ed. 523, the court says it might refuse to consider the report of a case referred to but not printed in the record as an embodiment of facts upon which the question was based.

Question whether evidence or indictment sufficient.

The question whether the evidence in a criminal case is sufficient to establish the offense denounced by the statute under which the prosecution is had brings up the whole case and is not a proper form for a certification. United States v. Bailey, 34 U. S. 9 Pet. 267, 9 L. ed. 124.

The question whether upon the whole evidence the plaintiff is entitled to recover is not proper. Williamsport Nat. Bank v. Knapp, 119 U. S. 357, 30 L. ed. 446.

The question whether or not an indictment is sufficient in law is too broad and indefinite for consideration. United States v. Arjona, 120 U. S. 490, 30 L. ed. 732.

The question whether either of the counts of an indictment charges defendant with an offense under the laws of the United States is too vague and general to be considered. United States v. Northway, 120 U. S. 327, 30 L. ed. 664.

The question whether an indictment charges an offense is too general. United States v. Chase, 135 U. S. 255, 34 L. ed. 117; United States v. Brewer, 139 U. S. 278, 35 L. ed. 190.

The question whether or not an indictment presents facts sufficient to constitute an offense cannot be certified, especially where it is impossible to decide the question without the most laborious wandering through the whole three counts of the indictment and passing upon the whole question whether under all the circumstances set out the tion would require an investigation of the powers of the city of Waco under the law incorporating it, the powers of the water company with which it made contracts for water, as well as an inquiry whether the contract between the city and the water company was in due form, executed by proper officers, and within the lawful powers of the two corporations. In the consideration of these general questions, many questions subordinate in nature would necessarily arise, and would require determination before it could be determined whether a general demurrer to the petition was properly sustained. Questions would also arise as to the effect of the several averments of fact which it would be necessary to decide; and the inquiry arises whether it was the purpose of the legislature to permit an entire case on law and fact thus to be certified for decision, or whether it was only intended that this court, on certificate, should decide specific questions of law formulated by a court of civil appeals from a record before it. The statute declares that the question to be certified must present "an issue of law," and that it shall be "the duty of the presiding parties are liable to the indictment. United States v. Perrin, 181 U. S. 56, 33 L. ed. 89.

A question whether an offense against a certain section of the United States statutes is charged in certain counts in an indictment will not be answered. United States v. Lacher, 134 U. S. 624, 33 L. ed. 1080.

Question whether demurrer should be sustained.

The question whether or not a demurrer shall be sustained is too indefinite to be answered. United States v. Waddell, 112 U. S. 77, 28 L. ed. 673; United States v. Minor, 114 U. S. 253, 29 L. ed. 110.

In case of a demurrer upon three grounds to an indictment it is not sufficient to state that the judges are divided in opinion as to whether or not the demurrer should be sustained. United States v. Briggs, 46 U. S. 5 How. 208, 12 L. ed. 119.

In Mason v. Haile, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 370, 6 L. ed. 600, a question was certified whether defendant was entitled to judgment on the ground that the matters set forth in the pleas were sufficient to bar the action or whether the plaintiff was entitled to judgment upon the demurrers and joinders. The court said it is not understood that any question as to the sufficiency of the pleas in point of form is drawn under examination, but simply whether upon the merits the matters thereby set up are sufficient to bar the action, and the court then proceeded to consider the question.

What will be considered.

The certificate gives jurisdiction over the single point upon which the judges were divided, not over the whole case. Wayman v. Southard, 23 U. S. 10 Wheat. 1, 6 L. ed. 253.

Nothing can come before the supreme court for decision under a certificate of division in opinion except such single, definite questions as shall arise and become the subject of disagreement in the court below. Ward v. Chamberlain, 67 U. S. 2 Black. 430, 17 L. ed. 319.

Where the certificate involves the question of the jurisdiction of the court so that until the question is disposed of no further proceedings can be had in the case, the supreme court will consider that question although irrelevant matters which will not be regarded are also embraced in the certificate. United States v. Thomas, 151 U. S. 577, 38 L. ed. 276.

Questions which have been held proper.

It is a sufficient certificate of the question of jurisdiction that the petition of appeal is upon that sole ground, and that the circuit court in the order allowing the appeal states that the appeal is grounded "solely on the question of jurisdiction" and directs the portions of the record to be certified to the supreme court to present that question. Shields v. Coleman, 157 U. S. 168, 39 L. ed. 660.

Under the act of 1891 permitting appeals or writs of error in cases where the question of jurisdiction is involved, but requiring a certificate from the judges that such is the question involved, a certificate is sufficient which recites that it was "held 31 L. R. A.

that the court did not have jurisdiction of the suit and ordered the same to be dismissed," and the order allowing the writ of error certified in effect that it is allowed "upon the question of jurisdiction." Re Lehigh Min. & Mfg. Co. 156 U. S. 322, 39 L. ed. 438.

Under the act of 1891 respecting the certifying of cases by the United States courts of appeal the questions must be distinctly and clearly certified and the certificate must show that the instructions of the supreme court as to the proper decision is desired. Columbus Watch Co. v. Robbins, 148 U. S. 266, 37 L. ed. 445.

Illinois decisions.

If an appeal is allowed to the supreme court of Illinois by the appellate court because of the importance of the questions involved the whole case goes up and the supreme court will consider such questions as arise upon the record in the ordinary way, which it will ascertain by looking at the pleadings and rulings of the court and the orders in the case, and not to the certificate of the appellate court. Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Wachter, 123 Ill. 441; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Schaffer, 124 Ill. 112.

It is not necessary that the certificate shall point out the questions considered of sufficient importance to be passed upon by the supreme court. Steele v. Grand Trunk Junction R. Co. 125 Ill. 385.

A certificate that the case is sent to the supreme court because of a large number of suits and the large number of interests dependent on the final result of the suits will not confer jurisdiction on the supreme court. Lamar Ins. Co. v. Gulick, 96 Ill. 619.

Iowa decisions.

Each question certified should present a question of law distinct from other questions of law or fact, and the certification of questions of fact or questions involving questions of fact does not give jurisdiction. Benaley v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 79 Iowa, 266.

The question whether the evidence set out in the certificate shows contributory negligence is a question of fact and cannot be certified to the supreme court. Chilton v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 72 Iowa, 689.

All of the necessary facts should be stated in the certificate. Vreeland v. Ellsworth, 71 Iowa, 347.

Questions of fact cannot be certified. Hanna v. Collins, 69 Iowa, 51; Riddle v. Fletcher, 72 Iowa, 454.

The court will not go behind the certificate to determine the facts in the case. Miller v. Haley, 66 Iowa, 290.

The certificate must state that the question certified was involved in the case. Van Sickle v. Downs, 72 Iowa, 624; Ball v. Van Riper, 74 Iowa, 146; Beach v. Donovan, 74 Iowa, 543; Beeler v. Garrett, 76 Iowa, 231.

A certificate is sufficiently definite which asks if, under a certain statute limiting appeals from a justice's court to amounts exceeding $25, on defendant's appeal to the circuit court should plaintiff's motion to dismiss for want of jurisdiction be judge of said court to certify the very question to be decided." The purpose of this is manifest. There may be many questions arising, on general demurrer or otherwise, in a cause, necessary to its decision, about which a court of civil appeals will entertain no doubt, while there may be but a single question about which doubt is entertained; and the purpose of the law is to permit courts of civil appeals to have the decision of that question, or such questions made by the supreme court; but the very question for decision here must be stated by the court of civil appeals. Whether a petition is sufficient to maintain an action is a question of law; but, as is frequently the case, the decision of that question involves the decision of many and different questions of law, and, in order that the time of this court may not be sustained, when the petition alleged damages in the sum of $100, a general denial, trial in the justice's court resulting in a judgment for plaintiff of 5 cents and $27 costs. Nichols v. Wood, 66 Iowa, 225.

The certificate must show that the questions upon which the opinion of the supreme court is desired are involved in the case. Estep v. Yetmire (Iowa) 65 N. W. 327.

The court has no jurisdiction to go behind the certificate and determine from the record whether the case involves the questions of law included in the certificate. Curran v. Excelsior Coal Co. 63 Iowa, 94; Lamb v. Ross, 84 Iowa, 579.

But in Swails v. Ciesna, 61 Iowa, 603, it is said: "We have repeatedly held that in this class of cases we will look into the record for the purpose of determining whether the questions certified fairly arise in the case." But in Beach v. Donovan, 74 Iowa, 544, that is explained upon the ground that in these cases the certificates on their face were sufficient to confer jurisdiction. The record was gone into for the purpose of determining whether or not the case in fact involved the determination of the question propounded, not for the purpose of giving, but of defeating or limiting, jurisdiction.

The record may be looked to to see if the questions certified are involved in the case, but questions certified must be decided upon what is shown on the certificate. Jennings v. Bacon, 84 Iowa, 403.

The certificate must be sufficient in itself to present the questions to be determined, and must not refer the court to the record to ascertain such questions. Buchanan County Bank v. Cedar Rapids, I. F. & N. W. R. Co. 62 Iowa, 494.

The questions should be intelligible in and of themselves, and when they are not and it is necessary to examine the whole record to ascertain what the questions are, the case will not be considered. Votaw v. Corwin, 62 Iowa, 39; Bower v. Kavanaugh, 62 Iowa, 757; Long v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 64 Iowa, 541; Bennett v. Parker, 67 Iowa, 451; Hawkeye Ins. Co. v. Lewis, 63 Iowa, 514; White v. Beatty, 64 Iowa, 331.

A certificate stating that the court submitted to the jury certain special interrogatories, and asking, "Was the action of the court error in view of the evidence in this case? Should a new trial be granted?"—is not proper, especially when it is not shown that all of the evidence is in the abstract. Gilliooby v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 61 Iowa, 53.

The questions, Does the evidence legally establish an express contract of payment? and Does the evidence legally establish a release of defendant from payment?—are insufficient. Landers v. Boyd, 59 Iowa, 758.

A question whether the evidence is sufficient to support the verdict is not sufficient. Hudson v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 59 Iowa, 581, 44 Am. Rep. 692.

The trial judge must certify that it is desirable to have the opinion of the supreme court upon the question to render the certificate sufficient. Milliken v. Daugherty, 59 Iowa, 294.

The question whether or not the trial court has jurisdiction of the case is too general when the jurisdiction is questioned on more than one ground. Wheaton v. Foster, 58 Iowa, 661.

More than one question may be submitted in the case, but the several questions must be specifically stated so that the supreme court may determine the precise questions submitted, and questions of law and fact cannot be mingled and called a question of law. Centerville v. Drake, 58 Iowa, 564.

A question as to the validity of a gift of a note as against creditors of the donor under the facts of the case is too general. The specific facts relied upon to defeat the gift should be set out. Fitch v. Flynn, 58 Iowa, 159.

A question whether or not the court erred in determining that plaintiff was entitled to judgment is improper. Ibid.

A question, "Can judgment be rendered in favor of plaintiff and against defendant upon the agreed statement of facts in this case?" is not sufficient. Dawley v. Houck, 53 Iowa, 733.

If no finding of facts appears in the record the supreme court will assume that the question certified did arise upon facts as found. Thorpe Bros. v. Dickey, 51 Iowa, 676.

The certificate need not state the particular question upon which the opinion of the supreme court is desired. Fell v. Burlington, C. R. & M. R. Co. 43 Iowa, 177.

But a rule of court was subsequently made requiring the question to be pointed out. King v. Derby, 51 Iowa, 11; Wetz v. Austin, Id. 342; Minnich v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. Id. 363; Barnes v. Independent Dist. No. 2, Id. 700.

And now by the rules of the Iowa supreme court a case will not be considered on a certificate of importance from the lower court unless the certificate states what the question is. Wilson v. Iowa County, 52 Iowa, 339; Throckmorton v. Horton, Id. 737; Stormer v. Henzie, Id. 743; Gregg v. White, 55 Iowa, 744; Bradenburger v. Rigler, 68 Iowa, 300.

The certificate must state that the question involved is one of law. Kierulff v. Adams, 40 Iowa, 31.

That the question is necessary and involved in the case may be made to appear by showing that unless the ruling made by the trial court upon the question is overruled defendant will be entitled to judgment. Seamans v. Zimmerman, 91 Iowa, 363.

If the question certified is a general one involving the determination of other distinct questions of law not stated, the certificate is insufficient. Hawkeye Ins. Co. v. Erlandson, 84 Iowa, 197.

If the certificate sets forth and numbers two questions, and then states that the case involves the determination of "a question" of law, to wit, the question heretofore set out and numbered 1 and 2, the certificate is not rendered defective by the fact that two questions are numbered while the certificate speaks of them in the singular number. Walters-Cates v. Wilkinson (Iowa) 60 N. W. 514.

If the opinion of the supreme court is desired upon whether certain facts will enable the plaintiff to maintain his action, the facts which are to form the basis of the opinion must be set out in the certificate. Brown v. Petrie, 56 Iowa, 209.

Questions not involved under the pleadings will not be considered. Martin Steam-Feed Cooker Co. v. Olive, 62 Iowa, 122.

The certificate should plainly point out the questions to be determined, and should recite the facts on which the questions of law arise so that they may be determined without resorting to the evidence in the case. McLenon v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 69 Iowa, 320.

taken up in deciding questions about which a court of civil appeals may have no doubt and desires no decision, those courts are required to certify—to make certain or definite—the very question to be decided. It was never intended that this court, on certificate, should determine what questions of law are involved in a cause, and those decide, but it was intended that courts of civil appeals should propound questions which they may deem it proper to certify. The certificate in question does not differ in any material respect from one in which

The certificate must point out the questions upon which the opinion is desired so explicitly as to render an examination of the record unnecessary. Martin Steam-Feed Cooker Co. v. Olive, supra.

Abstract questions cannot be certified. Eckert v. Pickel, 59 Iowa, 545.

The question will not be considered if it involves assumptions of fact in conflict with the record. Cunningham v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 67 Iowa, 519; Miller v. Buena Vista County, 68 Iowa, 712.

The question, "Can plaintiff recover under the facts agreed upon herein as per stipulation on file?" presents the whole case for consideration, and is insufficient. Dunn v. Zoller, 61 Iowa, 227.

New Jersey decisions.

Under the New Jersey act before a case can be certified from the circuit to the supreme court for its advisory opinion all disputed facts must be settled. Destefano v. Calandriello (N. J.) 31 Atl. 385.

Ohio decisions.

There is a practice something like the certification of questions in Ohio. But there is also a difference which makes the practice approach that of report or reservation.

In Ohio the cause itself is reserved into the supreme court. Grant v. Ludlow, 8 Ohio St. 1; Foreman v. Haag, 37 Ohio St. 143.

The whole case may be reserved for the opinion of the supreme court. Chase v. Washburn, 2 Ohio St. 103.

The judgment which was rendered in the trial court and the manner in which the case was removed to the intermediate court must be made to appear. And the intermediate court cannot send to the supreme court questions for determination before they have been regularly presented for determination. Young v. Schenck, 6 Ohio St. 111.

Under the Ohio practice for the reservation of questions for the opinion of the supreme court, before the legal questions arising on the merits can be properly presented to that court the facts should be found or presented on an agreed statement between the parties. Hubble v. Renick, 1 Ohio St. 171.

The finding of facts must be a positive finding upon which a final and not a provisional judgment may be rendered. Patterson v. Lamson, 44 Ohio St. 487.

Questions of fact cannot be reserved. Ogborn v. Taylor, 6 Ohio St. 190.

The supreme court will not entertain a case unless the facts have been settled before it is reserved. Wilson v. Hamilton, 4 Ohio St. 723.

The case cannot be reserved until the facts are settled. Duffy v. Meyers, 44 Ohio St. 245.

Texas decisions.

The very question is not certified within the meaning of the Texas statute by presenting a petition of plaintiff covering a number of pages with exceptions thereto. Union C. L. Ins. Co. v. Chowning, 86 Tex. 680, 24 L. R. A. 504.

The general question whether correspondence was properly admissible in evidence without stating the objection to it will not be considered. Laughlin v. Fidelity Mut. L. Asso. 87 Tex. 115.

The question whether upon the pleadings and evidence the court erred in instructing the jury to return a verdict for defendant will not be considered. Ibid.

The entire case embracing questions of both law and fact cannot be certified. Kelley-Goodfellow Shoe Co. v. Liberty Ins. Co. 87 Tex. 112.

Neither question will be answered where two hypothetical questions are asked based on different statements of facts which cannot coexist in the case. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Belcher (Tex.) 32 S. W. 518.

A question if any of five special charges requested and refused stated correct propositions of law in the case and if so which should have been given, is too general and will not be considered. Laughlin v. Fidelity Mut. L. Asso. supra.

Wyoming decisions.

An order stating that there is an important question arising at the trial, but not stating what that question is, brings up nothing for review. Corey v. Corey, 3 Wyo. 210.

Criminal cases.

In Minnesota and Wisconsin there are provisions for certifying difficult and important questions arising in criminal cases for the opinion of the supreme court.

The Minnesota statute provides that when in the opinion of the judge presiding at the trial a question of law arises in the trial of a criminal action, in which defendant shall be convicted of sufficient importance or doubt to require the decision of the supreme court, he may report the case to that court as far as shall be necessary to present the question. Bonfanti v. State, 2 Minn. 126.

Under the Wisconsin statute permitting the trial court to submit questions to the supreme court it must appear upon the record that the defendant has been tried and convicted upon an information or indictment which charges some crime or offense punishable under the laws of the state. State v. Wentler, 76 Wis. 89.

The trial court must report definitely the exact question or questions on which the opinion of the supreme court is desired, and must not send up the whole record. State v. Anson, 20 Wis. 663; State v. Hill, 30 Wis. 416; State v. Rowan, 35 Wis. 304.

The Wisconsin statute provides for the report of questions arising at the trial of a criminal case in which defendant is convicted. State v. Kneiffe, 12 Wis. 440.

In Wisconsin the reporting of the case to the supreme court is a summary proceeding to obtain before judgment the speedy decision of the supreme court of doubtful questions of law arising on the trial, and such questions must be specially stated. State v. Jenks, 60 Wis. 599.

The questions will not be answered if they involve an examination of the entire record. State v. Cornhauser, 74 Wis. 42.

Only questions of law can be reported, and even such questions cannot be reported if their determination requires that all the testimony shall be before the court. State v. Gross, 62 Wis. 41.

A question which does not appear to have arisen in the case cannot be certified. State v. Hickok, 90 Wis. 161.

Tax cases.

In certifying proceedings for the enforcement of taxes the trial judge should state what points he certifies and make a statement of the facts bearing upon such points together with his decision or conclusion thereon. Morrison County v. St. Paul & N. P. R. Co. 42 Minn. 451; State v. St. Croix Boom Corp. 49 Minn. 450.

H. P. F.

a court of civil appeals would find the facts existing in a cause before them, these certify to this court, and therein propound the question whether judgment should have been rendered in favor of the one party or the other. To decide such a question, appellate jurisdiction was conferred on courts of civil appeals, and neither the statute nor the Constitution contemplates the exercise of such appellate jurisdiction by this court, so long as the cause remains undetermined by a court of civil appeals.

This court, however, has held that so much of the statute as authorizes courts of civil appeals to certify questions of law to them for decision, and makes such decisions binding, is not in violation of the Constitution; but, to confer such jurisdiction, the statute must be complied with. The practice of certifying questions for decision is new in this state, but has long existed under the laws of the United States and examination of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States will show the practice, as well as the jurisdiction which may be lawfully exercised on such certificates by that court. There are several statutes bearing on that matter. One of them relates to criminal proceedings, and provides that, when "the judges are divided in opinion, and the point upon which they disagree is certified to the supreme court according to law, such point shall be finally decided by the supreme court." U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 651, 697. Another related to civil proceedings, and provided that when "any question has occurred upon which the opinions of the judges were opposed, the point on which they so disagree shall, during the same term, be stated under the direction of the judges, and certified, and such certificate shall be entered of record." U. S. Rev. Stat. § 652. There was still an earlier law, which required a circuit court, at the request of either party, to certify to the supreme court a question of law existing in a cause in reference to which the judges might differ, and on this the supreme court was required to decide the questions so certified, which would govern in the after-disposition of the cause. Under these statutes, many decisions were made, and reference to some of them will be given to illustrate the construction placed on such statutes. Demurrers to an indictment were filed, and, after argument, certified to the supreme court for decision, without stating upon what point a decision was desired. In disposing of the case, Chief Justice Taney said: "Now in the case before us, the question upon which the disagreement took place is not certified. The difference of opinion is indeed stated to have been on the point whether the demurrer (which was certified) should be sustained. But such a question can hardly be called a point in the case, within the meaning of the act of Congress; for it does not show whether the difficulty arose upon the construction of the act of Congress on which the indictment was founded, or upon the form of proceeding adopted to inflict the punishment, or upon any supposed defect in the counts in the indictment. On the contrary, the whole case is ordered to be certified upon the indictment, demurrer, and joinder, leaving this court to look into the record, and determine for itself whether any sufficient objection can be made in bar of the prosecution, and without informing us what questions had been raised in the circuit court, upon which they differed." United States v. Briggs, 46 U. S. 5 How. 209, 12 L. ed. 119. "The question, whether a demurrer shall be sustained is not sufficiently definite. The precise legal point involved . . . should be stated. The court is not bound to look beyond the certificate to ascertain the point. . . . In the case before us the questions certified are, 'whether, in point of law, upon facts as stated and proved, the action could be maintained; and whether, consequently, the jury should be instructed that, under the facts as proved, the plaintiff could not recover.'" Daniels v. Chicago & R. I. R. Co. 70 U. S. 8 Wall. 250, 18 L. ed. 224. The certificate was dismissed. "This court cannot take jurisdiction of this case because, besides the manifest attempt to refer to this court for decision substantially the whole case by the device of splitting it up into several questions, neither of the questions certified presents a distinct point or proposition of law, clearly and precisely stated; but each requires this court to find out for itself the point intended to be presented, by searching through the allegations of the answer and the provisions of the statute relied on by the plaintiff, and by also examining either the whole Constitution of the state, or else reports or records of decisions of its courts, referred to in the answer and made part thereof. The certificate is even more irregular and insufficient than one undertaking to present the question, arising on demurrer or otherwise, whether an indictment, or a court therein, sets forth any offense, which this court has constantly held not to be a proper subject of a certificate of division of opinion, Dublin Twp. v. Milford Fire Cent. Sav. Inst. 128 U. S. 513, 32 L. ed. 534. "The question certified 'must be a distinct point or proposition of law, clearly stated, so that it can be definitely answered, without regard to other issues of law or fact in the case. . . . It must be a question of law only, and not a question of fact, or of mixed law and fact; hence it must not involve or imply a conclusion or judgment upon the weight or effect of testimony or facts adduced in the cause,—as, for example, a question of fraud, which is necessarily compounded of fact and of law. . . . It must not embrace the whole case, even where its decision turns upon matters of law only, and even though it be split up into the form of questions." Fire Ins. Assn. v. Wickham, 128 U. S. 434, 32 L. ed. 506. The opinions in the following cases, in which are cited many others, are to the same effect: Jewell v. Knight, 123 U. S. 432, 31 L. ed. 192; United States v. Hall, 131 U. S. 51, 33 L. ed. 97; United States v. Perrin, 131 U. S. 56, 33 L. ed. 89; United States v. Reilly, 131 U. S. 58, 33 L. ed. 75; United States v. Lacher, 134 U. S. 625, 33 L. ed. 1081; United States v. Chase, 135 U. S. 255, 34 L. ed. 117. The statute in force in this state, permitting questions to be certified, is more peremptory than the acts of Congress in the requirement that the very point or question must be certified, and a certificate which does not comply with its requirements must be dismissed.

It is so ordered.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

PEOPLE of the State of New York, ex rel.
John William McCLELLAND, Appt.,
v.

James A. ROBERTS, Receipt.

1. The constitutional provisions respecting the powers and duties of the superintendent of public works, which the New York Constitution of 1894 adopted from the former Constitution, must be read and understood in connection with the new section of the Constitution requiring civil service appointments to be made according to merit, ascertained so far as practicable by competitive examinations.

2. The self-executing mandate of Const. 1894, art. 5, § 9, declaring that civil service appointments "shall be made according to merit and fitness, to be ascertained, so far as practicable, by examinations which so far as practicable shall be competitive," requires the courts in a proper case to pronounce appointments made without compliance with its requirements illegal.

3. The re-enactment of the New York civil service law after the adoption of the Constitution of 1894 is not necessary in order to make it applicable to the department of public works, to which it could not apply under the Constitution in force when the act was passed, as the new Constitution not only adopts the principle of the law, but declares: "Such acts of the legislature . . . as are now in force shall be and continue the law of this state, subject to such alterations as the legislature shall make."

A PPEAL by relator from an order of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Third Department, affirming an order of a Special Term for Albany County in favor of defendant in a proceeding, brought to compel defendant as comptroller of the state, to audit and pay the salary of relator as clerk in the office of canal statistics. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Mr. Myer Nussbaum, for appellant:

The provisions of chap. 354, laws of 1883, did not originally apply to the department of public works, and are not extended by § 9, art. 5, of the Constitution over that branch of the civil service.

People, Killeen, v. Angle, 109 N. Y. 564.

An unconstitutional act is as if it had never been passed.

Chenango Bridge Co. v. Paige, 83 N. Y. 190, 38 Am. Rep. 407.

Constitutions must be "held to be prepared and adopted in reference to existing statutory laws, upon the provisions of which, in detail, it must depend to be set in practical operation."

People, Jackson, v. Potter, 47 N. Y. 375.

If the act of 1883 be still in force, new legislation is necessary to extend its operation to the public works, because: (1) there was no original intention to include that department in the act; (2) the constitutional provision does not extend it, but merely permits the legislature to do so.

N. Y. Ops. Atty. Gen. (1871), p. 566.

If it be competent for the legislature to pass such a statute, clearly the concluding sentence of § 9 makes that a legislative duty and a legislative duty cannot be delegated.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 137.

The legislature neither must, nor can, transfer the power of making laws to anybody else or place it anywhere but where the people have placed it.

Upon all questions of the expediency of general statutes the legislature must determine for itself definitely and finally. The determination of that question cannot be delegated.

People v. Fire Assn. of Philadelphia, 92 N. Y. 316, 44 Am. Rep. 380.

Mr. Matthew Hale, respondent:

The act to regulate and improve the civil service of the state of New York (chap. 354 of 1883), by its terms applied to the entire public service of the state of New York.

By the new Constitution which took effect January 1, 1895, the law of 1883 was made applicable to the department of public works; and it follows that the reclassification, or restoration of the old classification, made by Governor Morton April 15, 1895, was valid and effectual.

The two provisions of article 5 of the Constitution must be considered together. The provisions of § 3, which gives the superintendent of public works the appointment and removal of employees, is subject to the provision of § 9 of that article, that all appointments and promotions in the civil service of the state shall be made according to merit and fitness, to be ascertained so far as practicable by competitive examinations.

See Smith v. Lawrence County Supers. 148 N. Y. 187; Re Sweeney, 12 Misc. 174, Affirmed 146 N. Y. 401.

The constitutional provision, § 9 of art. 5, required no legislation in order to the enforcement of its provisions so far as it related to competitive examinations.

Chapter 354 of the laws of 1883 was a valid act, and has been so held by this court.

Rogers v. Buffalo, 123 N. Y. 173, 9 L. R. A. 579.

It is only the application of the act to the department of public works which this court decided in the case of People, Killeen, v. Angle, 109 N. Y. 572, to be void.

O'Brien, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The relator, in the month of April, 1895, was appointed to the position of clerk to the collector of canal statistics by the superintendent of public works of the state at a salary of $65 per month. When he applied for his monthly compensation, the defendant, as comptroller of the state, refused to audit or pay the same, and the relator thereupon applied for a peremptory writ of mandamus, to be directed to the comptroller, commanding him to draw his warrant for the payment of the claim. The application for the writ was denied and the order denying the same affirmed at general term.

The only question involved in this appeal is whether, upon the undisputed facts disclosed upon the application, the relator was entitled to the writ. It is admitted that the relator was appointed to the position without having passed the civil service examination, and that his name has never been certified to the comptroller by the civil service commission, and it was for that reason that the comptroller refused to pay the claim.

The legal question thus presented has been so fully and ably discussed in the courts below that we feel relieved from the necessity of much further argument in support of the conclusions there indicated. Indeed there is very little further to be said upon the important and interesting subject which is involved in the controversy beyond a brief statement of the grounds upon which we think the order below should be sustained.

The statute of this state, commonly known as the civil service law (chap. 354, laws of 1883, as amended by chap. 681, laws of 1894), not only required that clerks and other subordinates in the civil service of the state should be appointed or selected from lists, constituted as therein provided, after competitive examination, but that it should be unlawful for the comptroller to pay the compensation of any clerk in the civil service who had not been appointed pursuant to the provisions of the law, and whose name had not been certified to him by the civil service commission. It is not necessary to subject these statutes to a very close analysis in order to determine the general purpose and policy of the legislature with reference to appointments and promotions in the civil service. It is too plain for argument that these enactments require appointments to be made from the civil service lists, made up in the manner indicated in the statute and in the rules formulated by the commission under the authority of the law; and, in order to insure obedience to the system on the part of the appointing power, the chief financial officer of the state was prohibited from making payment to any clerk of his salary or compensation who had not been appointed as required by the law. It is quite clear, also, that the civil service statutes constitute a general system of statute law applicable to appointments and promotions in every department of the civil service of the state, with such exceptions only as are specified in the statute itself. It was held in the case of People, Killeen, v. Angie, 109 N. Y. 564, that the law could not apply to the department of public works for the reason that the Constitution, as then in force, vested in the head of that department the exclusive power and duty of appointment and removal, and that any restriction upon such power imposed by the legislature, through the civil service act, was inoperative. That case did not hold that the civil service act or any part of it was unconstitutional. The power of the legislature to enact the law, as it appears on the statute book, has never been doubted or questioned, and the only point raised in that case was with respect to its application to a particular department of the state government under the Constitution as it then existed, and it was held that, notwithstanding the general language and scope of the act, and the purpose of the legislature in enacting a general law, without excluding any department from its operation, the law could not reach the superintendent of public works, for the reason that the words of the Constitution would not permit it. If the fundamental law which governed the question then before the court is the same now it is quite clear that the order in this case should be reversed, since the same question is involved. But it is apparent that the Constitution has been changed in such a manner as to include within the scope and operation of the civil service law just such a case as this court then held to be beyond its application. This clearly appears, not only from the plain words since incorporated into the Constitution, but from the debates on the subject in the recent constitutional convention. The new or amended and revised Constitution of this state, adopted by the people in 1894, and which went into effect on the first day of January, 1895, has superseded the decision in the case of People, Killeen, v. Angie, supra. It is quite true that the identical words of art. 5, § 3, upon which that decision turned, are still in the Constitution. Instead of changing the language or arrangement of the different provisions of that article, the convention adopted and the people have inserted and added an entirely new section, which reads as follows: "Appointments and promotions in the civil service of the state, and of all the civil divisions thereof, including cities and villages, shall be made according to merit and fitness, to be ascertained, so far as practicable, by examinations, which, so far as practicable, shall be competitive.

Laws shall be made to provide for the enforcement of this section" (§ 9). The provisions of the article with respect to the powers and duties of the superintendent of public works in the appointment and removal of persons employed in the care and management of the canals, which were under consideration in the case of People, Killeen, v. Angie, must now be read and understood in connection with this new section, and, reading them all together, there can be little doubt that the obstacles then found to exist to the full operation of the civil service law in every department of the state government have been entirely removed. Smith v. St. Lawrence County Supers. 148 N. Y. 187, 193. That such was the intention of the convention that framed and adopted the amendment is clear beyond all question. If anything in support of this view is wanting, beyond the broad and comprehensive words of the amendment itself, it will be found in the debates on this subject in the convention, in which the intention of that body was declared in the most explicit terms, to bring every department of the government within the operation of the law by such a change in the Constitution as would meet and obviate the difficulties pointed out by this court in the case referred to. The declared views in favor of that course by some of the leading members of the convention are to be found in the learned opinion below, and the whole discussion on the question leaves no doubt of the intention to remove every constitutional objection to the full operation of the law, and to its application to all appointments in the civil service in all the public departments of the state. There was no provision in the Constitution of 1846, or in any of its numerous amendments, requiring appointments in the civil service to be made according to a general system based upon a merit and fitness to be ascertained by competitive examinations under public authority. That is a conception of comparatively recent date with us, and a step in the line of administrative reform which had forced itself upon public attention, until it finally received practical approval and recognition by the passage of the act of 1883. The operation of that act, the obstacles in the way of its general application, as well as the general merits and advantages of the system to the public service, were all familiar to the members of the convention of 1894, called to revise the Constitution, and it cannot be doubted that the intention was not only to permit, but to require, its general application to appointments in all departments. This result has been effectually accomplished by the adoption of a new provision in the fundamental law. The principle that all appointments in the civil service must be made according to merit and fitness, to be ascertained by competitive examinations, is expressed in such broad and imperative language that in some respects it must be regarded as beyond the control of the legislature, and secure from any mere statutory changes. If the legislature should repeal all the statutes and regulations on the subject of appointments in the civil service the mandate of the Constitution would still remain, and would so far execute itself as to require the courts, in a proper case, to pronounce appointments made without compliance with its requirements illegal.

It is therefore apparent that a new principle, far reaching in its scope and effect, has been firmly imbedded in the Constitution. Like many other reforms, this work has not been accomplished without a long and persistent struggle. The friends and the opponents of the measure have debated its merits and the difficulties in the way of its practical and harmonious operation before the public for years. The considerations which entered largely into this debate are no longer pertinent, since the principle has become an accomplished fact and placed by the people beyond the possibility of any substantial change in a contrary direction. This court, upon more than one occasion, has, with entire unanimity, expressed its approval of the principle, and exercised all of its powers in every proper case in aid of all laws intended to carry out the idea which was always at the foundation of the question. Rogers v. Buffalo, 123 N. Y. 178, 9 L. R. A. 579; Peck v. Belknap, 180 N. Y. 394; Re Keymer, 148 N. Y. 219. Whatever doubt or distrust may exist with respect to the possibility of obtaining for the law an honest and fair execution, there is none and can be none, at least among thinking men, with respect to its ultimate beneficial effect upon the service. That it must, if fairly and honestly administered, go far to suppress very grave evils and abuses that have become peculiarly rife and active in our political system few intelligent people who have given the subject much attention can doubt. In so far as its administration may depend upon the action of the judicial department, it is entitled to, and doubtless will, receive a fair and liberal construction, not only according to its letter, but its true spirit and the general purpose of its enactment. The Constitution, as it now exists, must be read and considered in all its different parts, and each provision must be given its appropriate place in the system and some office to perform, and at the same time all must be so construed as to operate harmoniously. The application of these familiar rules of constitutional construction removes all doubt or difficulty with respect to the question under consideration, and the conclusion must follow that, while the power of appointment and removal is still with the superintendent of public works, it is subject to legislative regulation as to the mode and manner, and is brought within the operation of general laws on that subject.

There is another question in the case which is pressed with much vigor by the learned counsel for the relator. He contends, as I understand his position, that the new section of the Constitution referred to contemplated the enactment of appropriate laws to carry it into effect, and that, since the civil service act of 1883 and its amendments did not, and, when passed, could not, apply to the department of public works, they cannot now be made to operate upon the appointments of public officers formerly beyond the power of legislative regulation. In other words, that the new section of the Constitution is not self-executing, and, as the civil service law has not been re-enacted since the change or any other legislation supplied, there is now no law or regulation applicable to the relator's appointment save the will of the superintendent himself.

We do not think that this contention is at all tenable. The act of 1883 and its amendments constitute a general system in terms applicable to the whole service. It is not limited to any particular department, but is broad enough to embrace all. Statutes of this character, framed in general terms, apply to new cases as they arise from time to time that fall within their general scope and policy. Since the enactment of the civil service laws new offices have been created, to which the power to appoint subordinates attached, but it cannot be doubted that this power, when given, came within the operation of all general regulations on the subject. A general law may, and frequently does, originate in some particular case or class of cases which is in the mind of the legislature at the time, but so long as it is expressed in general language the courts cannot, in the absence of express restrictions, limit its application to those cases, but must apply it to all cases that come within its terms and its general purpose and policy. So a general law, when passed, may be incapable of application to certain cases within its general scope and policy by reason of the existence of other and conflicting enactments of equal or higher authority, but when the latter are repealed or modified, the general law is given full operation. In the present case it will be observed that there is nothing in the civil service act indicating any intention to exclude any department from its operation. On the contrary, it was manifestly intended to have general operation, and not until the decision of the courts in People, Killeen, v. Angle, was it understood to be inapplicable to the department of public works. The section of the Constitution with which it was then found to be in conflict, and which had the effect to suspend its operation as to that department, having been since modified in such a manner that both the organic law and the general statute are in harmony, each expressing the same general policy and directing the same thing to be done, the suggestion that, in order to make the general law operate upon this case, the legislature must re-enact it, has no reasonable or just foundation, and, so far as I am aware, is not sustained by authority.

Moreover, it is evident from the language of the new provision of the Constitution and from the debates in the convention which followed its introduction into that body, that it was framed and adopted with reference to existing laws, which were intended to give to it immediate practical operation. So that in adopting the new Constitution, the people, in their original capacity, decreed that thereafter all the departments of the government should be brought within the operation of existing laws on the subject of appointments. The mandate to the legislature to enact laws to provide for the enforcement of the section does not in any degree conflict with this view. That was a prudent and proper, though, perhaps, an unnecessary precaution. But it affords no ground for the inference that the people intended to ignore the aid and utility of existing laws to give immediate practical effect to the principle, or that they were content to wait for the reform until the legislature should make new regulations on the subject. It was the intention to put all the new provisions of the Constitution into operation through the instrumentality of such laws as were then in force, so far as practicable, and if, in practice, they were found to be in any respect insufficient for that purpose, they were to be replaced or supplemented by new ones. This view does not depend entirely upon construction, since the instrument itself contains an express provision on that subject. The people declared in § 16, art. 1, that "such acts of the legislature of this state as are now in force shall be and continue the law of this state, subject to such alterations as the legislature shall make concerning the same; but all such parts of the common law, and such of the said acts, or parts thereof, as are repugnant to this Constitution, are hereby abrogated."

If the act of 1883 or any of its amendments needed new life and vigor in order to bring this case within their operation, it has thus been given to them by an authority from which even the legislature itself has derived all of its powers. All these questions, and others of a minor character, have been so thoroughly examined in the court below, upon the hearing of the original application, that in our opinion further discussion is unnecessary.

Our conclusion is that, since it appears that the position to which the relator was appointed had, prior to that time, been classified by the civil service commission, in pursuance of the statute, as one subject to competitive examination, and as the commission had not certified to the comptroller that he had been lawfully appointed, but, on the contrary, refused the certificate, his application for the writ of mandamus was properly denied, and that the order appealed from should be affirmed, with costs.

All concur with O'Brien, J., for affirmance, except Martin, J., who reads for reversal; Vann, J., not voting.

Martin, J., dissenting:

That chap. 354 of the laws of 1883, so far as it related to the department of public works, was held by this court to be unconstitutional and void in the Killeen Case, 109 N. Y. 564, is manifest from the opinion and admitted by the respondent. If this statute was unconstitutional, and consequently void, when passed, so far as it applied to that department, I am unable to agree to the proposition that the constitutional amendment which went into effect January 1, 1895, revived or infused new life into it and rendered it valid. It makes no difference that it was only void in part, for so far as it was void it had no effect, and could not be rendered valid except by re-enactment. Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, at page 188 [6th ed. p. 222], says: "When a statute is adjudged to be unconstitutional, it is as if it had never been. Rights cannot be built up under it; contracts which depend upon it for their consideration are void; it constitutes a protection to no one who has acted under it, and no one can be punished for having refused obedience to it before the decision was made. And what is true of an act void in toto is true also as to any part of an act which is found to be unconstitutional, and which, consequently, is to be regarded as having never at any time been possessed of any legal force." That language was quoted and approved by this court in Chenango Bridge Co. v. Paige, 83 N. Y. 178, 191, 38 Am. Rep. 407. See Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, § 538; Meagher v.

Storey County, 5 Nev. 244, 250; Sumner v. Reeler, 50 Ind. 341, 342, 19 Am. Rep. 718; Woolsey v. Dodge, 6 McLean, 142; Astrom v. Hammond, 3 McLean, 107, 110; Strong v. Daniel, 5 Ind. 348; Clark v. Miller, 54 N. Y. 528, 532. The statute of 1883, having been declared unconstitutional and void so far as it affected the department of public works, was invalid and had no existence so far as it related to that department. To that extent it was as if it had never been enacted. It being so far void, I think the subsequent amendment infused no life into it as to that department. It was so held in State, Stevenson, v. Tufts, 20 Nev. 427, and in Opinions of Attorneys General of the State of New York for 1871 (p. 566). I am aware of no principle upon which it can be held that this statute became valid by the subsequent constitutional amendment, unless the amendment was self-executing. That it was not seems manifest, as, after providing for civil service appointments and promotions, it expressly declares that "laws shall be made to provide for the enforcement of this section." This provision is inconsistent with and negatives the idea that the amendment was self-executing, or that it was intended to reinstate a statute already declared to be unconstitutional. The logic of the position that the Constitution, before it was amended, simply obstructed or suspended the statute of 1883 as to the department of public works, and that the amendment removed the obstruction and leaves the statute in full force, is not apparent to me. That argument seems to me fallacious. If any constitutional obstruction existed which prevented the enactment of a statute including the department of public works in the provisions of the civil service act, it was so complete as to render the statute to that extent unconstitutional and void. As to the department of public works, the statute was either valid or void. If valid, it could have been enforced when passed; if void, it could not, and the amendment effected no change that would render the statute valid.

Again, if it be said that the decision in the Killen Case was based upon the theory that the legislature did not intend to include the department of public works in the statute of 1883, because it would be in conflict with the Constitution, then the statute did not affect that department. If that was the intent of the legislature, I know of no principle by which an amendment of the Constitution would breathe into that statute an intent which never existed.

If the legislature never intended to pass such a statute, its intent must govern, and the statute of 1883 should not be regarded as applicable to the department of public works. If it did intend to include that department, then it violated the Constitution and was so far null and void. Therefore, whatever view may be taken of the question, it seems to me that it cannot properly be held that the statute is applicable to the department of public works.

I think the judgment of the general and special terms should be reversed.

1. A loan by a bank to an embarrassed telegraph company which is in pressing need of money to meet its current expenses, and which uses the money in paying debts of a character for which receivers' certificates were authorized to be issued, will not give the bank a lien on the assets superior to a first mortgage on the property if neither the bank nor the persons who were paid out of the loan obtained receivers' certificates.

Statement by Andrews, Ch. J.:

The Third National Bank of the city of New York, in May, 1884, upon the application of the officers of the Bankers' & Merchants' Telegraph Company, a New York corporation owning and operating lines of telegraph in New York, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and other states, loaned to the company $50,000, upon the statement that that amount was needed to meet current supply bills and contract obligations; taking as collateral security $300,000 of the bonds of the company, secured by a trust mortgage for $10,000,000, dated November 24, 1883, on all its property and lines, executed to the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company, as trustee. The telegraph company was financially embarrassed at the time, but the officers represented to the bank that the amount of the proposed loan would relieve the company, and enable it to go on with its business. The company paid $10,000 of this loan, and on August 4, 1884, the bank renewed the loan for thirty days, taking the company's note for $40,000, giving additional bonds to the amount of $100,000 as further security: so that the bank held bonds to the amount of $400,000, then worth in the market 20 cents on the dollar, as security for the note of $40,000. The note went to protest, and the bank subsequently sold the bonds, and after applying the proceeds of the sale there remained due to the bank, December 2, 1885, the sum of $28,350.09, which has never been paid. One Day, a judgment creditor of the company, execution on his judgment having been returned unsatisfied, commenced in the fall of 1884 an action in the supreme court of this state against the company, to sequester its property, and for the appointment of a receiver; and receivers were appointed, September 24, 1884, of all its property and effects, real and personal, wheresoever situate, with power to operate and manage its lines of telegraph, and by the order appointing the receivers all persons were enjoined from interfering in any manner with the receivers in the discharge of their duties. In October and December, 1884, the receivers in the Day suit were authorized by the court to issue receivers' certificates for money to be borrowed to carry on the business and to pay certain claims, which certificates, it was declared, would constitute a first lien on the property of the company. Under this authority, receivers' certificates were issued, aggregating $195,000. After the commencement of the Day suit, an action was commenced by one De Haven, a bondholder, against the company, the receivers in the Day suit, and the trustee of the mortgage, for the dissolution of the company and the appointment of a receiver; and January 6, 1885, judgment was entered in the action, appointing the same persons who had been appointed receivers in the Day suit receivers in the De Haven suit, and the entry of the judgment in the De Haven suit substantially superseded the prior proceedings in the Day suit. The judgment in the De Haven suit made very broad provision for the issue of receivers' certificates to take priority of the mortgage, and, under its provisions and the prior order referred to, receivers' certificates were issued amounting in the aggregate to $602,802.66. The judgment in the De Haven suit contained a provision enjoining interference by any person with the receivers in the discharge of their duties, similar to the provision in the order in the Day suit.

On the 23d of April, 1885, the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company, the trustee under the mortgage, commenced an action for the foreclosure of the mortgage; and May 1, 1885, receivers were appointed therein as successors to the receivers appointed in the Day and De Haven suits. June 5, 1885, judgment of foreclosure was entered in the action, which, among other things, authorized the purchasers on the sale under the judgment to receive on the bid receivers' certificates theretofore issued in the Day and De Haven suits, and to pay over any surplus to the bondholders. The sale under the foreclosure took place August 10, 1885, and the property was bid in by or for a corporation known as the United Lines Telegraph Company, for the sum of $500,000; and by an order of distribution made July 2, 1894, it appears that the entire proceeds of the sale, above costs and expenses, were applied on receivers' certificates, and were sufficient to pay thereon only 69 per cent of their amount. The Third National Bank of the city of New York never, so far as appears, applied for or received from the receivers any certificates. On the 5th of May, 1885, long after the appointment of the receivers in the Day and De Haven suits, and the appointment of receivers in the foreclosure suit, and about six weeks after it had been served with a copy of the order in the De Haven suit appointing receivers, and enjoining interference with the receivers so appointed, the bank instituted attachment suits in the states of Massachusetts and Rhode Island against the Bankers' & Merchants' Telegraph Company, upon their debt, and caused the attachments to be levied upon the poles and lines and other property of the company in those states, respectively. It is undisputed that the receivers, at the time of these attachments, were in possession of the property of the company in these states, and were operating the lines of telegraph therein, and had been in such possession since their appointment, and this was known to the bank when the attachments were issued. On the 11th of June, 1886, on the matter being brought to the attention of the court in this state, the bank was enjoined from the further prosecution of the attachment suits commenced in Massachusetts and Rhode Island. On July 31, 1885 (the same day on which the judgment of foreclosure was entered), the bank entered into a stipulation, entitled in the foreclosure action, that "in case the petitioner [the bank] shall establish, on a reference to be ordered herein, that it is entitled to share in the proceeds of the sale in preference to the bondholders, then the petitioner shall be paid the amount that it may be adjudged as entitled to receive out of the proceeds." March 19, 1886, the court on motion, in the foreclosure action and the actions of Day and De Haven, directed the bank to cancel and annul of record its attachments obtained in Massachusetts and Rhode Island, so that the property of the telegraph company could be sold on the foreclosure judgment free of all encumbrances created thereby, and that the liens, if any, thereunder, be transferred to the proceeds; but in the order it was directed that the order was not to be taken "as an adjudication that any such lien actually existed, or that the bank is entitled to share in preference to such bondholders." Other facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Everett P. Wheeler, with Messrs. Shearman & Sterling, for appellant:

In equity, a person who, at the request of a corporation, furnishes money for the specific purpose of paying an indebtedness which, by law, or the contract of the parties, or by the order of the court, becomes entitled to a preference, is subrogated to the rights of the creditors whose debts are paid by the money so furnished.

In Rhode Island the mortgage from the Bankers' & Merchants' Telegraph Company to the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company was not recorded as a mortgage of real estate. The law of that state is that a mortgage on real estate, if not recorded in the registry of real estate mortgages, is absolutely void as to all persons except the parties and their heirs.

In Massachusetts the mortgage to the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company was not recorded as a mortgage of personal property. The law of Massachusetts in relation to telegraph poles and wires is peculiar.

The intention of the legislature evidently was to treat these poles and wires as personal property.

The mortgage, therefore, not having been recorded as a mortgage of personal property, and possession not having been delivered under it to the mortgagee, it is void as against the attaching creditor.

Andrews, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is claimed in behalf of the Third National Bank that the money loaned to the Bankers' & Merchants' Telegraph Company created a debt which, in equity, was entitled to rank as a charge on the proceeds of the foreclosure sale prior to the claim of the bondholders. It is undisputed that the mortgage to secure the bonds was executed November 23, 1883, and that the loan by the bank was not made until the following May. By the general rule, the bondholders who relied upon the mortgage as security for their debts, which was a specific charge upon the property of the Bankers' & Merchants' Telegraph Company, are entitled to preference in the distribution of the proceeds. The claims of general creditors of a mortgagor are, in general, postponed to the mortgage, even when their debts were contracted prior to its execution. The bank seeks to raise an equity to preference in the case, although its debt was subsequent to the mortgage, by invoking the doctrine upon which courts of equity have acted in the administration of the assets of insolvent corporations,—that expenses incurred by receivers in the management and preservation of the property which is the subject of the receivership may, by order of the court, be made a primary charge, and displace the priority of lien which, in ordinary cases, attaches to a mortgage security existing at the time of the insolvency. The courts have assumed to go still further, and to adjudge priority of payment of debts contracted by a failing corporation within a few months prior to its adjudged insolvency, for labor, supplies, and necessary current expenses incurred in the struggle to keep itself alive. There is a sound equity which supports the doctrine that, when the nature of the property is such that the business to which it has been devoted cannot be discontinued without great probable loss, the court may authorize it to be continued by its officer and receiver pending the closing up of the affairs of the insolvent corporation. Expenses incurred by a receiver under such circumstances may be justly said to be expenses of preservation for the benefit of bondholders or other persons entitled to share in the final distribution, which ought to be first paid. But it is obvious that, with the best intentions, attempts by the court to carry on the business of a railroad or of a telegraph company through its receiver are hazardous, and we think courts may well pause before extending the application of the principle to which we have adverted.

The petitioner in this case is a banking institution, and it loaned its money upon what at the time was ample security, and, as is to be inferred, in the ordinary course of banking business. It had record notice of the mortgage, by the records in this state. Its security, as it has turned out, was inadequate, but by the payment made on the loan, and sale of the bonds taken as security, it has realized on its debt nearly as large a percentage as any of the unsecured creditors of the company whose debts were outstanding at the time of the appointment of the receiver, who received receivers' certificates. The latter received only 69 per cent of their claims. The bondholders and general creditors received nothing. The bank neither applied for nor received receivers' certificates. But the claim is that when it made the loan the Bankers' & Merchants' Telegraph Company was in pressing need of money to meet its current expenses, and that it was used by the company in paying debts of a character for which receivers' certificates were authorized to be issued by the judgment in the De Haven suit of January 6, 1885. It is also suggested that it was deceived by the assurances of the officers of the company when the loan was made. There is no foundation for the charge of fraud; and, moreover, if any fraud was committed by the company in securing the loan, the bondholders received no benefit, and their rights are not affected. The bank is not in the position of a certificate holder, and only the holders of receivers' certificates were, under the judgment in the De Haven suit, entitled to a preference over the bondholders. The right of a creditor of an insolvent corporation in the hands of a receiver to have a preference over bondholders under a first mortgage is strictissimi juris.

Assuming that the bank is entitled to be subrogated to the claims of the persons paid out of the loan, such claims are not entitled to preference out of the proceeds over the claims of the bondholders, because they were not represented by receivers' certificates, and it was only claims so represented which, under the judgment in the De Haven suit, were entitled to preference. The bank has no equity to call upon those who held receivers' certificates, and were paid a part of their claims, to contribute to make the bank equal with them. They secured the proper evidence of their right to participate in the distribution, and the bank neglected to do so. The bank is entitled to no dispensation to give it a standing which it has not acquired. But we think the claim of the bank may properly be denied on the broad ground that a party loaning money to an embarrassed corporation, subsequently adjudged to be insolvent, and taking security therefor, is not in a position which entitles him, in equity, to be adjudged to have a lien on mortgaged property of the corporation, or its proceeds, in preference to bondholders under a mortgage existing when the loan was made, and that it is immaterial for what purpose the loan was made, or how the money received thereon was applied, provided the bondholders were not parties to the transaction. The recent cases, we think, support this view. Penn. v. Calhoun, 121 U. S. 251, 30 L. ed. 915; Morgan's L. & T. R. & S. Co. v. Texas C. R. Co. 137 U. S. 171, 34 L. ed. 625; Cole v. Cunningham, 133 U. S. 107, 33 L. ed. 538; Re Regent's Canal Ironworks Co. L. R. 3 Ch. Div. 411.

The bank presents another and different claim upon which it bases its right to priority of payment out of the fund. It asserts that it acquired a legal lien on the property and lines of the Bankers' & Merchants' Telegraph Company in the states of Massachusetts and Rhode Island by the levy of its attachments in those states May 5, 1885; and it claims that these attachments were prior to the mortgage to the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company, by reason of the fact that it was not recorded in either of those states at the time of the levy of the attachments. The further claim is made that, under the statutes and decisions in Massachusetts and Rhode Island, attachments levied before the record of a mortgage acquire priority. We are of opinion that the bank can take nothing by its attachments. When they were issued, the property levied upon was in the possession of the receivers in the De Haven suit, who were then engaged in operating the entire lines of the company, including the lines in Massachusetts and Rhode Island, and this was known to the bank when it caused its attachments to be issued. The issuing of the attachments was a contempt of the process of the court. The judgment in the De Haven suit, entered January 6, 1885, by its terms vested the whole property of the company, wheresoever situate, in the receivers appointed thereby, and enjoined all persons from interfering with them in the discharge of their duties. It moreover provided for the issuing of receivers' certificates as a first lien on all the property of the company. The bank, when it caused the attachments to be levied, had full notice of the judgment, having six weeks prior to that time been served with a copy. The bank was a citizen of this state, and amenable to the jurisdiction of its courts. The act of the bank was a clear violation of the injunction, and tended, moreover, to thwart the scheme formulated in the judgment in respect to receivers' certificates. We are of opinion that the bank cannot be heard, in a court of equity engaged in the administration of the proceeds of the mortgaged property, to assert an alleged lien having its origin in a violation of the injunction and judgment of the court. It is not material to consider whether, under the laws of Massachusetts and Rhode Island, the attachments created a lien prior to the mortgage. The bank was bound to submit to the injunction, and an attachment which might ripen into a judgment upon which the sale of the property levied upon could be made was an interference with the receivership, contrary to the spirit and intent of the judgment of January 6, 1885. Upon the whole case, we think the bank failed to show any right to relief, and the orders appealed from should be affirmed.

All concur.

An equity court is not compelled to issue an injunction which would afflict the defendants with irreparable loss and occasion the public immeasurable inconvenience, solely upon proof of a mere technical trespass which has not resulted in substantial pecuniary damage to the plaintiff.

Gray, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is one of the many actions which have been brought against the elevated railway companies in New York city, in which the complainants seek the equitable interference of the court, to restrain the defendants from operating their railway in front of their premises. The demand for this equitable relief, in the present case, relates to property upon Ninth avenue and proceeds upon allegations of interference by the defendants with the plaintiffs' enjoyment of the easements of light, air, and access appurtenant to their abutting property. The complaint charges that by reason of the unlawful and injurious acts of the defendants the rental value of the premises has been depreciated, to the extent of $1,000 a year, since the construction of the road, and that the market value thereof has been diminished not less than $10,000; wherefore judgment is asked for past damages at the rate of $1,000 a year and that, if the defendants be permitted to continue the operation of their road through Ninth avenue, in front of their premises, it shall be upon condition that they pay for the value of the rights and easements taken, at least, the sum of $10,000, as adequate compensation therefor. The case comes to us upon the judgment roll and without the evidence.

The referee before whom the trial was had found all the facts in favor of the plaintiffs, which related to the discomfort and annoyance incidental to the operation of the defendants' road in the deprivation of the beneficial use and enjoyment of the easements of light, air, and access; but he also found it to be the fact that a general benefit had been produced by the presence of the railway, in which the plaintiff's property participated, and that the fee value of their property had increased since the construction of the road and was of greater value, to the extent of at least $8,000, than at any time prior to the construction of the railway. He found that "there has been no disparity between the rate of increase in value experienced by the property in question and other property in the vicinity of the line of the elevated road, as would justify the conclusion that the property in question had failed to share in the general increase of values which is shown to have taken place in respect of all real estate in that vicinity." Finding that the plaintiffs had failed to show that the fee or rental value of the premises had been diminished by the acts of the defendants, he found the value of the easements taken, or interfered with, to be the sum of six cents, or nominal merely. His legal conclusions were also favorable to the plaintiffs, to the extent that he found that their right to an unimpaired enjoyment of the easements was a substantial right of property and that the authority of the defendants to construct and operate their railway did not exempt them from the same measure of liability for damages as would attend a totally unauthorized erection and operation of such a structure. He even found that, even though no diminution in the money value of the premises was shown, equity may forbid the continuance by the defendants of their interference with the appurtenant easements. His determination, however, was that, though the plaintiffs had shown title to the property in question and to the easements of light, air, and access appurtenant thereto, and though the defendants had appropriated such easements without the sanction of the plaintiffs and without having made compensation therefor, yet, as the plaintiffs had failed to show that any substantial loss had resulted to them, or that other than nominal damages had been suffered, and because it appeared that to grant the equitable relief prayed for would involve serious public inconvenience, judgment should be directed dismissing the complaint; "but without prejudice to the right of the plaintiffs to bring such action as they may hereafter be advised, based upon facts not inconsistent with those herein adjudged."

Thus, equitable relief by way of injunction was refused to the plaintiffs in the court below, upon the ground that, notwithstanding the defendants had interfered with the easements in the street which were appurtenant to the abutting property and, to the extent of that interference, were quasi trespassers upon the plaintiffs' rights, nevertheless, as the benefits resulting to the property from the presence and operation of the elevated railway had greatly enhanced its value, and in equal measure with other property in the vicinity, off of the line of the railroad, the trespass was but technical and only nominal damages of six cents should be allowed.

The contention of the appellants is that proof of a monetary damage is not necessary, and that the court may not, and must not, refuse an injunction, where substantial rights of property are invaded; even if the damage to those property rights cannot be measured by a money standard. We cannot approve of that proposition, as applicable to the present case, without being in conflict with the authority of our previous decisions, as well as with what I believe to be the sound equitable principle. However plausible the argument which is advanced and which rests upon the general notion that the right to the injunction is not to be determined by the extent of the damage, I think that, where the gist of the action is an actual damage suffered by property, it must be proved as a fact in the case; or else the court is at liberty to disregard the mere technical trespass and to refuse its writ of injunction. It is true that the discretion of a court of equity is not to be arbitrarily exercised, and that it should be regulated upon grounds that make it judicial; but there is neither a feature in this case which appeals to the conscience of a court of equity, nor one which compels the application of the equitable principle of interference. There are, of course, the facts that the defendants have come into the street, and that they have appropriated certain easements appurtenant to the abutting property, without making compensation therefor, or offering to do so; but the trespass (to use a term now somewhat commonly applied to these invasions of easements) was merely technically such and caused no actual damage.

Equitable relief by way of injunction in cases of trespass may often depend for its award upon the nature of the particular case. In such cases the court must look into them to see if a strong case of actual and irreparable mischief is presented and if the circumstances justify equitable interference. In Jerome v. Ross, 7 Johns. Ch. 315, 11 Am. Dec. 484, Chancellor Kent considered at some length the practice of granting injunctions in trespass, and reached conclusions which are valuable enough to be referred to here. Adverting to the sufficiency, in ordinary cases, of the common-law remedy by action, he says: "I do not think it advisable, upon any principle of justice or policy, to introduce the chancery remedy as its substitute, except in strong and aggravated instances of trespass which go to the destruction of the inheritance, or where the mischief is remediless." He declares this to be the English doctrine, in conformity with which the court had proceeded, and he says: "I do not know a case in which an injunction has been granted to restrain a trespasser merely because he was a trespasser, without showing that the property itself was of peculiar value, and could not well admit of due recompense, and would be destroyed by repeated acts of trespass." He sums up the results of the decisions in England and in this state as follows: "These cases all show that, in respect to acts of trespass committed upon land, even by persons in a public trust, under color of law, the court has not interfered by injunction unless where the trespass was permanent as well as grievous, or went to destroy the value of the property to the owner. It is not sufficient that the act be simply per se a trespass, but it must be a case of mischief and of irreparable ruin to the property in the character in which it has been enjoyed." In Kerlin v. West, 4 N. J. Eq. 449, the chancellor of New Jersey, citing Jerome v. Ross, observed: "I am satisfied that the court of chancery should not interfere in a case of naked trespass, where there is a full remedy at law." In Troy & B. R. Co. v. Boston, H. T. & W. R. Co. 86 N. Y. 123, Danforth, J., observed that trespass alone will not authorize the interference of a court of equity, and quotes from Chancellor Kent's opinion in Jerome v. Ross, supra, upon the proposition that where damages are nominal, the court should not assume cognizance of the trespass and lay the interdict of an injunction. In all the cases which have come before the court in the course of this elevated railway litigation, the complainants, where they have been awarded judgment in their favor, have recovered upon the theory that the defendants' acts were causing an injury through an invasion of certain property rights in the street and, because the trespass was a continuing one, the court interfered to restrain it, in order to prevent irreparable injury and a multiplicity of suits. The action has always been regarded as one for the recovery of damages to the complainant's property, however equitable in its form. Allegations of damage are not necessary, in the sense that the amount which the plaintiff should recover enters into the determination of the right to the equitable relief; but they are necessary in order that the court may determine whether, as alleged and shown, they are of such substance as to warrant the equitable intervention of the court. Gray v. Manhattan R. Co. 128 N. Y. 499; Shepard v. Manhattan R. Co. 131 N. Y. 215. In the former case it was said in the opinion, upon the question of the materiality of the damage: "Unless the court had found it to be substantial, it could, in the exercise of its discretion, have withheld the injunction and left the plaintiff to his remedy at law. An equity court is not bound to issue an injunction when it will produce great public or private mischief merely for the purpose of protecting a technical or unsubstantial right." A number of authorities might be adduced in support of that proposition; but it is too evident to require it to be done. In Hunter v. Manhattan R. Co. 141 N. Y. 281, it was observed: "The question for the tribunal in each case is, whether by the construction and operation of the elevated railroad, there has been an intrusion upon the complainant's property rights, to his actual prejudice and damage." In Doyle v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. 136 N. Y. 505, it was said: "The proof of damages was an indispensable element of the plaintiff's case, and it cannot be supposed that a court of equity would entertain jurisdiction to restrain a trespass that was not shown to have produced any damage or loss to the plaintiff." Quite recently, in Bookman v. New York Elev. R. Co. 147 N. Y. 298, it was held that the decree recovered by the plaintiffs was erroneous, in view of the fact that the finding that the plaintiffs' property was injured by the railroad over and above all benefits conferred was wholly unsupported by the proof. The theory adopted in that case by the court in its decision was, practically, that if benefits only are shown to have been caused as the result of the construction and operation of the elevated railway, the complainants are without right to equitable relief, as well as not entitled to any award of damages.

In this class of litigation, in which the court has been engaged for a number of years, it not only has never been assumed that a complainant against the elevated railway companies might recover a judgment for equitable relief by way of injunction, upon the mere basis of the unlawful intrusion by the elevated railway companies upon his easements in the street, without proof of actual damage sustained; but it has been frequently held, as shown by the cases above referred to, that there must be proof of a substantial damage to the plaintiff's property to warrant the granting of the equitable relief demanded. It is perfectly true that the defendants are quasi trespassers with respect to the plaintiffs' easements in the street in front of their property. But, so far from the trespass being shown to be destructive of the value of their estate, or to have inflicted an irreparable injury, the proof is that the value of the property has been greatly enhanced and that it has shared equally in the general rise of value. Therefore, the only ground for the claim of the plaintiffs, that they are entitled to equitable relief, is in the mere fact that the defendants have invaded their rights in the public street, without their consent and without having first condemned the same by an exercise of the right of eminent domain. It must be borne in mind, however, that the defendants, in occupying the street with their structure and in operating a railroad thereupon, were carrying out the provisions of their charter and were subserving the public interest and convenience, as all corporations of a public, or quasi public, nature are presumed to do. I do not mean to say, because they are in the street by authority of law, that that protects them against the consequences of their acts, when in invasion of those private rights which are secured to property owners. But it seems to me to be perfectly clear that the court, when appealed to by the property owners to enjoin the operation by the corporation of its franchises, upon the ground that certain easements have been invaded, will consider the fact that the corporation is there for the public convenience and is executing a quasi public work, and, if it finds that no injury is in truth inflicted and that the property owner has suffered no actual damage, it may and should refuse to grant the relief prayed for. A court of equity has a certain latitude in the exercise of its great power, and under no authority or rule with which I am acquainted is it compelled to grant an injunction in a case like the present one, which belongs to a peculiar class and is governed by a doctrine of recent growth in the courts. The court recognizes the fact that the defendants had the right to appropriate the street easements by condemnation proceedings and, hence, when appealed to, to enjoin them from operating their franchises, it looks into the question of the substantial nature of the damage alleged to have been done to the property, or of the loss suffered by the owner. If it is found to be such, then the court proceeds in the matter as though the proceeding was one to condemn to the defendants' uses the property appropriated, and, having ascertained the value of the property, it suspends the decree, which it finds the plaintiff is entitled to, to restrain the continuance of the defendants' acts for a sufficient period within which to permit the defendants to acquire the right to appropriate the easements through a conveyance, as a condition of avoiding the enforcement of the decree. The proceedings by which the court ascertains and fixes the damages done to the abutting property in the deprivation of easements are, in fact, but a substitute for condemnation proceedings. If the plaintiffs fail to establish that substantial injury had been inflicted upon their property, a decree enjoining the operation of the railroad would be unwarranted. One of the very grounds, and a main one, upon which equity proceeds in granting relief, by way of injunction against the unlawful acts of the defendants, would have been wanting if no actual and irreparable damage were shown.

I have not overlooked the many authorities to which the appellants' counsel has called attention; but I think it quite unnecessary to review them. There may be some embarrassment in reconciling all that has been decided in the courts, with respect to the practice of granting injunctions in trespass. But that embarrassment seems to arise from the difficulty of applying the principle of equitable interference to the differing circumstances of the cases. The case of Corning v. Troy Iron & N. Factory, 40 N. Y. 191, relied upon by the appellants, was an action to obtain a perpetual injunction, restraining the defendant from diverting the waters of a stream along the lands of the plaintiffs, and the question being as to the legal rights of the parties, it was held that the defendant had acquired no right to divert the water. The dispute, in fact, was over the title to the stream and whether the defendant had acquired any rights as against the plaintiffs and their grantors. There Judge Woodruff in his opinion observed: "If it was clear that the restoration of the water was of no value to them, the case would not call for equitable interference. We cannot, however, say that the case so stands upon the evidence." So the case of Smith v. Rochester, 38 Hun, 612, was one of an action brought to restrain the diversion of the waters of a lake by a municipal corporation; by which plaintiff's riparian rights upon a stream were violated. The defendant, acting in pursuance of an act of the legislature, for the purpose of supplying its citizens with water, was drawing off the waters of the lake through an iron pipe. Without commenting upon the opinion which prevailed in that case, it is sufficient to observe that the circumstances were not such as to make it an authority in point here. It may also be repeated, as a pertinent observation, in connection with that and other cases, that the defendants here were in the street by direct authority of law; although, with respect to private rights in the street not taken by eminent domain, they may have been quasi trespassers. In other words, the defendants were rightfully and lawfully in the public street; but, in so far as they had failed to make compensation for any damages suffered by abutting property owners, they were at fault and therefore liable in an action at law to respond in damages to the abutting owner; or were subject, in an equitable action, to be enjoined with respect to the operation of their franchises, unless compensation was made to the abutting owner for the ascertained damages.

The suggestion by the appellants' counsel that a reason exists for the granting of an injunction, even in the absence of any proof of damage to the property measured by a monetary standard, in the fact that the continued tortious acts will eventually give to the defendants title to the property rights which they have wrongfully appropriated, is met, in this case, by the form of the decree. It is "without prejudice to the right of the plaintiffs to bring such action as they may hereafter be advised, based upon facts not inconsistent with those herein adjudged." This leaves it entirely open to them in the future, and before the defendants could acquire any adverse rights, if they are able to prove any actual damage or loss, to commence an action against the defendants and to obtain such relief at law or in equity as the case shall warrant.

Without continuing further the discussion, it is sufficient to say, in conclusion, that we do not feel compelled by authority, nor upon principle, to hold that the court must grant relief by way of injunction in a case where the plaintiffs are unable to show any actual damage to their property, or loss suffered, by reason of the defendants' acts, and in the face of the fact that, by reason of the presence and operation of the elevated railroad in the street, the value of their property has greatly increased, and that it has shared equally with all the property in the vicinity in the general increase of values which has taken place.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

All concur.

(February 15, 1896.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Los Angeles County in favor of defendant in an action brought to annul a marriage. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Knight, Simpson, & Harpham for appellant.

Mr. S. A. W. Carver, for respondent:

The burden of proof was on the plaintiff throughout the whole case.

A marriage entered into by a minor fifteen years of age against the consent of the parents, and which was renounced within ten days thereafter, was not valid.

Lyndon v. Lyndon, 69 Ill. 43; Robertson v. Cole, 12 Tex. 356; Moot v. Moot, 37 Hun, 288.

The circumstance of the second marriage gives rise to a collateral presumption that the death occurred prior to that marriage.

Johnson v. Johnson, 114 Ill. 616, 55 Am. Rep. 888; Bishop, Mar. & Div. §§ 452-456; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 41.

When a marriage is shown in fact, the law raises a strong presumption in favor of its legality, and the burden is with the party objecting to its validity to prove that it is not valid.

Bishop, Mar. & Div. §§ 457, 458; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 39-35; King v. Twynning, 2 Barn. & Ald. 386; Yates v. Houston, 3 Tex. 449; Dixon v. People, 18 Mich. 84; *Senser v. The record and decree in the divorce proceedings are lacking in several of the essentials to an estoppel. As an estoppel in pais it is wholly insufficient.

Boggs v. Merced Min. Co. 14 Cal. 368.

As res judicata it could only work an estoppel, in any case, as between the same parties and upon the same subject-matter.

Freem. Judgm. 159.

So far as the decree of divorce is considered as a judgment in rem, it is binding on the whole world only in the sense that it fixes the status of the parties thereafter as being one of divorcement and release from the marriage bonds.

*On petition for rehearing.

The fact that the plaintiff and defendant had lived together as husband and wife for twenty-two years, until this rumor as to Milam's being alive was heard, supposing in good faith that they were husband and wife, as both parties concede, would greatly weaken the force of such rumor as evidence, as well as the force of such declarations as admissions.

Le Brun v. Le Brun, 55 Md. 496; Johnson v. Johnson, 114 Ill. 615, 55 Am. Rep. 888; Gerlach v. Turner, 89 Cal. 446.

Such declarations are at most only admissions of defendant inconsistent with her present position, and could only be used by plaintiff by way of impeachment of defendant's testimony in case she should take the stand herself on the trial and testify differently, or possibly in rebuttal of such testimony.

Mechem v. McKay, 37 Cal. 154; Johnson v. Powers, 65 Cal. 179.

The mere declarations or admissions of one of the parties to the marriage are not sufficient to annul or dissolve it.

Le Brun v. Le Brun, supra; Gaines v. Relf, 58 U. S. 12 How. 472, 13 L. ed. 1071; Harman v. M'Leland, 16 La. 28; Montgomery v. Montgomery, 3 Barb. Ch. 132; *Clayton v. Code, § 130; 2 Bishop, Mar. & Div. § 294.

While decrees of divorce are in general terms called judgments in rem, yet, by all authorities who have closely considered the question they are declared to be only quasi in rem, like attachment and other similar suits.

Brown, Jur. § 59a, p. 168, note 1, §§ 70, 75; Woodruff v. Taylor, 20 Vt. 73; Lord v. Chadbourne, 42 Me. 443, 66 Am. Dec. 290; Waples, Proceedings in Rem, § 598; Burien v. Shannon, 3 Gray. 387; Gill v. Read, 5 R. I. 343, 73 Am. Dec. 73; Gouraud v. Gouraud, 3 Redf. 262.

As against strangers to the suit, a decree of divorce is not evidence of the marriage of the parties to it.

Freem. Judgm. § 154, p. 281; Fox v. Fox, 25 Cal. 588.

The presumption in favor of the validity of an actual ceremonial marriage is "one of the strongest known to law."

Schmisseur v. Beatrie, 147 Ill. 210.

The presumption of the validity of the marriage is so much stronger than that of the continued life of Milam, that upon the consummation of said marriage in July, 1862, it immediately overcame the presumption of life, and gave rise to the presumption of Milam's death prior thereto.

The occurrence of the second marriage also brings into existence the presumption that the parties to it are innocent of the crime of bigamy or of adultery, which is a much stronger presumption than that of continued life, even though the other party has been absent or unheard of much less than the statutory period of seven years. The effect is that there is at once induced the presumption of the prior death of Milam.

Johnson v. Johnson, 114 Ill. 611, 55 Am. Rep. 888; Myatt v. Myatt, 44 Ill. 478; Hull v. Rawls, 27 Miss. 471; Yates v. Houston, 8 Tex. 433; Lockhart v. White, 18 Tex. 102; *King v. The fact of the marriage between plaintiff and defendant in 1862 gave rise to a fourth presumption of fact which strongly supports the validity of the present marriage, to wit, the presumption that Milam had previously obtained a divorce.

Carroll v. Carroll, 20 Tex. 781; Hull v. Rawls, supra; Coal Run Coal Co. v. Jones (Ill.) 8 N. E. 866; Boulden v. McIntire, 119 Ind. 574; Schmisseur v. Beattie, supra; Blanchard v. Lambert, 43 Iowa, 228, 22 Am. Rep. 245.

The occurrence of a second marriage has in every case been held to have the effect of pressing forward the date of presumptive death, locating it prior to such second marriage.

Temple, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The action was brought to annul a marriage between the parties, entered into on the 3d day of July, 1862, upon the ground that defendant had another husband, to wit, Joseph Milam. It is now conceded that defendant was married to Joseph Milam in February, 1858, when defendant was but fifteen years of age; that she lived with Milam as his wife for ten days, when she was taken away by her parents, and went to Salt Lake. It does not appear how long she was absent from San Bernardino, but it could not have been a very long time, for she testified that she lived at San Bernardino, after her marriage to Milam, about four and a half years, when she married plaintiff. Only about that period elapsed between her first and second marriages. She testified that Milam left a few days after her marriage to him, and she had heard nothing of him since. Plaintiff and defendant lived together as husband and wife at Los Angeles for about twenty-two years, when, as defendant testified, she was told by her nephew, who lived in Arizona, that he had met a brother of Joseph Milam, who said Joseph Milam was living at Walla Walla. This is all she has ever heard in regard to Milam since he left San Bernardino. She then commenced an action against Joseph Milam to secure a divorce. In her verified complaint, filed December 21, 1888, she describes herself as Jane Elizabeth Milam, and states that plaintiff and defendant were married in February, 1858, and ever since have been, and now are, husband and wife, and that defendant resides out of the state of California. On the same day she made and presented to the court her affidavit to procure the publication of summons, in which she stated that defendant resides out of the state, that his last residence within the state was in Pajaro, in Santa Cruz county; that through knowledge derived from his brother she believes he resides at Walla Walla, in Washington territory. Such proceedings were had in the action that on the 29th day of March, 1894, a decree was entered dissolving the marriage between Joseph Milam and the defendant, plaintiff in that action. Certain findings were also filed, and purport to constitute part of the judgment roll, but, as there were no issues to try, and judgment was entered on default, express findings were unauthorized, and add nothing to the necessary adjudication. Subsequently defendant commenced an action against the plaintiff to have her marriage with him declared void on the same ground on which plaintiff now seeks relief, to wit, that at the time of her marriage with him her first husband, Joseph Milam, was living, and she had not been divorced from him. The complaint in that suit was also verified. The action was finally dismissed by her before it came to judgment. Two of plaintiff's brothers testified that at the time the parties to this action were married they heard travelers say the man defendant married was still living there (San Bernardino). It is, however, pretty certain that he was not then living at San Bernardino. This is all the evidence contained in the record upon this subject.

It is contended, first, that the judgment in the divorce suit is conclusive upon defendant that she was divorced from Milam; that is, that Milam was then alive, and that until the decree was entered she was his wife. But this adjudication as such did not bind Milam. He was not served with summons, and was without the state, and the action was therefore strictly in rem. "No sovereignty," says Story, Conf. L. § 539, "can extend its process beyond its own territorial limits to subject either persons or property to its judicial decisions. The res before the court was the status of the plaintiff in the divorce suit. No service of summons being had, it was not an action inter partes, but a proceeding affecting only the status of the wife. "It did not establish, but recognized and presupposed, the relation of husband and wife as previously existing." Burlen v. Shannon, 3 Gray, 387. It was conclusive against all the world that the plaintiff in that suit was no longer the wife of Joseph Milam, and it was an adjudication of nothing else. No one would claim that Milam would be estopped by the decree to deny that he had ever been married to defendant, or, had he remarried and had children, that the decree would be evidence of their bastardy. Milam may have been previously divorced, and in such case there would be two valid decrees, which, on the theory that they constituted an adjudication of marriage at the time of the divorce, conclusive against the world, would contradict each other, and yet both be binding on all the world. See, on this point, Gill v. Read, 5 R. I. 843, 78 Am. Dec. 73; Gouraud v. Gouraud, 3 Redf. 262; Freem. Judgm. 154. But since the court had jurisdiction to declare the status of Mrs. Milam as affected by an assumed marriage with Joseph Milam, and did adjudge that she was no longer the wife of Joseph Milam, it would follow that he could no longer be her husband. He was thus affected by the judgment as he would have been by the death of his wife, and this resulted simply from the fact that the status of his wife was changed. So far, and no further, the judgment bound him and all the world. That being so, it must follow that as an adjudication it bound her no further. Had she borne children to Hunter, the judgment would have estopped neither such children nor her to deny that she was the wife of Milam when she married Hunter.

It is further contended that her affidavits are conclusive evidence against her. Three times she stated under oath that she was the wife of Milam when she was married to Hunter. This is very strong testimony against her, but is only strong evidence. It is not an estoppel. She went upon the stand as a witness for herself, and explained that she made those affidavits upon the strength of a rumor she heard. This was all she had heard. The court found in her favor, and must have believed her statement. The statements made by plaintiff's brother do not show that Milam had been heard from, and if defendant's testimony was true, such statements must have been unfounded. The court could well find that there was no authentic information to the effect that Milam was alive.

But it is said the marriage of the parties to this suit took place only about four and a half years after the marriage to Milam, and it will be presumed that Milam was alive, in the absence of proof to the contrary. There was no proof tending to show that Milam was dead, or that his chance for life was below the average; therefore it is contended the court should have found that he was alive. This presumption of the continuance of life is, however, overcome by another. It is presumed that a person is innocent of crime or wrong. Code Civ. Proc. § 1963. There is also a presumption, and a very strong one, in favor of the legality of a marriage regularly solemnized. Rather than hold a second marriage invalid, and that the parties have committed a crime or been guilty of immorality, the courts have often indulged in the presumption of death in less than seven years: or, where the absent party was shown to be alive, have allowed a presumption that the absent party has procured a divorce. A more correct statement perhaps would be that the burden is cast upon the party asserting guilt or immorality to prove the negative,—that the first marriage had not ended before the second marriage. A few cases will best illustrate the rule. King v. Treynning, 2 Barn. & Ald. 386, was a question as to a settlement, which depended upon the validity of a second marriage of Mary Burns. She was a pauper, and married about twelve months after her husband had enlisted as a soldier in foreign service. The second marriage was held good. The court said: "The law presumes the continuance of life, but it also presumes against the commission of crimes, and that even in civil cases, until the contrary is proved." This was the question in Rex v. Harborne, 2 Ad. & El. 540. It was said that there was no absolute presumption, but that it was a question for the jury to determine under the circumstances of the case, and a verdict convicting a defendant of bigamy was upheld on proof that the husband was alive twenty-five days before the second marriage. See also Reg. v. Lumley, L. R. 1 C. C. 196. Murray v. Murray, 6 Or. 17, involved the legitimacy of the children of a second marriage. It was held that the presumption of innocence should be preferred, but the presumption was not absolute, and the question would depend upon the special circumstances of the case. In Lockhart v. White, 18 Tex. 102, Mrs. Waggoner had been separated from her husband about five years. One witness had heard of him since the separation. The court said: "There is no evidence that Waggoner had been heard of within twelve months (though that exact time is not necessary to raise a favorable presumption) prior to the marriage with Allsbrooks, and under the rule established in the above case the continuance of the life of Waggoner will not be presumed. The second marriage was consequently lawful and valid." It was also said that the presumption of the continuance of life was weaker, and must yield to the presumption of innocence. Sharp v. Johnson, 22 Ark. 79, was a case involving a question of heirship depending upon legitimacy. This depended upon the validity of a marriage. The court refused an instruction to the effect that the former wife, if alive within five years before the last marriage, was presumed to be still alive. The ruling was affirmed, and the court quoted from Mathews on Presumptive Evidence: "A charge of an act of immorality, or of disobedience of a positive law, will not be received unless supported by direct evidence. Circumstances showing probability merely are not enough; the fact averred must be conclusively proved." Klein v. Laudman, 29 Mo. 259, was an action of slander, and a similar ruling was made. Spears v. Burton, 31 Miss. 547, involved the question of legitimacy, and it was held that the presumption of continuance of life would not establish a crime, even in a civil case. To the same effect is Greensborough v. Underhill, 12 Vt. 604. The question in that case was as to settlement. Schmisseur v. Beatrice, 147 Ill. 310, was a case involving the question of legitimacy. It was proved that an absent husband was alive at the time of the marriage, and the court held that in favor of this second marriage it would presume that the absent party had obtained a divorce, and that the burden of proving that such divorce had not been obtained was on the party alleging the invalidity of the second. It is said that a contrary doctrine is established in People v. Stokes, 71 Cal. 263. This precise point was not there discussed, although it was raised. The court contented itself with asserting the general proposition, which no one disputes, that the presumption of life continues for seven years. The fact that there were conflicting presumptions must have escaped the attention of the court, otherwise the case is in conflict with all the cases upon the subject and with all the text books. We cannot hold that this long line of decisions, in which there is no break, has been overruled in a case in which the point was not discussed.

The court found for the defendant upon all points, notwithstanding the fact that owing to her former statements under oath her testimony was justly subject to grave suspicion. If her explanation of the former affidavits was true,

I think it sufficient. We cannot reverse the judgment for insufficiency of the evidence.

As the appeal from the judgment was taken too late, we cannot consider the objections to the allowance of alimony. A new trial is a re-examination of an issue of fact in the same court after a trial. The allowance of alimony is an incident to an action for a divorce, and, although the determination as to its allowance may involve a controversy as to facts, such determination is not the trial of an issue in the case. It may be before or after trial.

The appeal from the judgment is dismissed, and the order denying a new trial is affirmed.

MERZ CAPSULE COMPANY.

(71 Fed. Rep. 787.)

1. A sale of the entire manufacturing plant, including patents, processes, and goodwill, of a corporation, with an agreement that it would never again engage in the same business, made in consideration of stock in a new corporation, without intending to wind up the affairs of the former, but with the object of continuing its corporate life and activity, to be exercised through the other corporation,—is ultra vires and void.
2. The consent of stockholders cannot legalize or vitalize a void illegal contract by which a corporation attempts to transfer all its property to another company in consideration of shares in the latter.
3. Affirmative relief in equity against an illegal contract by a corporation to transfer its entire plant and business to another company, and a conveyance in pursuance thereof, may be given to the extent of an injunction against interference with the title or possession of the original corporation, where, before actually surrendering the possession of its property or receiving all the consideration, it repudiated the whole scheme and tendered back all that it had ever received, and has kept the tender good.

erally engaged in the manufacture and sale of hard, empty, gelatine capsules, entered into an agreement, dated November 29, 1893, for the combination and consolidation of their several properties and business interests. The plan by which this was to be accomplished is fully set out in the agreement here following:

"This agreement was made on the 29th day of November, 1893, between the National Capsule Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the state of New Jersey, and doing business at Indianapolis, Indiana; the Merz Capsule Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Michigan, and doing business at Detroit, Michigan; J. E. Warren and James Wilkie, copartners doing business at Detroit, Michigan, as the Warren Capsule Company; and John A. Grogan and W. H. Warren, copartners doing business at Detroit, Michigan, as the Michigan Capsule Company.—Witnesseth: (1) That said parties agree to organize a corporation for the manufacture and sale of hard, empty, gelatine capsules. The main office and point of shipment of the goods manufactured by said company to be at Detroit, Michigan. The capital stock to be $70,000, allotted among the parties hereto as follows: $20,000 each to be allotted to the National Capsule Company, the Merz Capsule Company, and jointly to the parties doing business as the Warren Capsule Company, and $10,000 to be allotted jointly to the parties doing business as the Michigan Capsule Company. Three quarters of the stock allotted to each of the said parties shall be issued at the time of the organization of the company. The remaining one quarter of each allotment shall be held as treasury stock of the new company until the several parties shall demonstrate that the present capacity of their respective plants is as follows: The National Capsule Company, at least twenty gross of completed capsules per day; the Warren Capsule Company, at least twenty gross of completed capsules per day; the Michigan Capsule Company, at least ten gross of completed capsules per day. The capacity of each plant to be de-terminated by the average amount produced during a test of five consecutive days of ten hours each, to be had in the presence of representatives of each party, and under ordinary conditions of manufacture. Such test to be had within three months from the date of the said organization of said corporation, unless said test shall be prevented by reason of injury or destruction of the plant by the elements, or for other good and valid reasons, in which case a reasonable time in addition shall be allowed to restore the plant to a proper working condition. In case any of the parties above named shall fail to demonstrate that the capacity of their plant is as above stated, the 25 per cent of stock retained by said corporation shall be forfeited by said party, and remain the property of the corporation. (2) The parties hereby agree to sell and convey to said corporation, upon its organization, free and clear from all encumbrances, their respective plants operated by them in the manufacture of hard, empty, gelatine capsules, including all real estate owned and used by them for such purpose, together with all machinery and appliances of every kind pertaining thereto, stock in trade, goodwill, all patentable devices, labels, trademarks, trade secrets (except processes for treating gelatine), now owned by said parties, and used in connection with the business of manufacturing hard, empty gelatine capsules, and in payment therefor (except for manufactured stock or boxes or raw materials) to receive from said corporation mortgage bonds to the amount of the appraised value of the property thus conveyed to said corporation. Said bonds to bear interest at 8 per cent per annum, payable five years from the date of issue, and only sufficient amount of bonds to be issued to cover the value of the property conveyed to said corporation by all of the parties hereto. Said bonds to be secured by mortgage covering all of the property of every kind belonging to said corporation. The value of the property conveyed to said corporation by the respective parties shall be determined in the following manner: If all of the parties hereto are unable to agree upon the value of the property conveyed by each, the value of the real estate now owned by each party in Detroit shall be appraised by three disinterested competent persons, one to be chosen by the National Capsule Company, and one by the other three parties, and the two so chosen to select a third. The decision of said appraisers, or the majority of them, to be final. The value of the real estate now owned by the National Capsule Company in Indianapolis to be appraised by three appraisers to be chosen in a similar manner, whose decision or that of a majority of them, is to be final. The machinery and appliances of every kind, including box-making machinery, to be appraised by three disinterested and competent appraisers at the price at which it can be duplicated in open market; and, in estimating the value thereof, only such machinery and appliances shall be considered as are practical in the manufacture of empty capsules, and now used by the parties hereto in the conduct of their business. The appraisers to be chosen as follows: The National Capsule Company to select an appraiser in Indianapolis, the other parties to select an appraiser from Detroit, and the two so chosen to select a competent expert machinist from a city outside of the two cities above named; the decision of such appraisers, or that of a majority of them to be final. (3) The parties hereto agree that each shall receive, in payment for the manufactured stock, boxes, and raw material conveyed to said corporation, notes of said corporation payable six months from the date of delivery of the property, and all marketable manufactured and unmanufactured stock of completed empty capsules to be paid for at thirty cents per thousand; partially manufactured goods, and all other material as can be readily utilized at appraised value, and raw material, to be appraised at market value. (4) All expenses of appraisal and organization of the new company shall be borne by the new company. (5) Each of the parties hereto agree, from the date hereof, not to make, sign, or accept any contract whatsoever for the future sale or delivery of any hard, empty capsules, or any other contract whatsoever, except ordinary contracts for immediate sale and delivery. All old existing contracts with drug jobbers are to be completed by the new company, provided such are not for over fifty gross of capsules. (6) It is also agreed that none of the parties hereto shall hereafter engage in the manufacture or sale of empty gelatine capsules in any manner whatsoever. In witness whereof the parties hereto have set their hands and seals, and have affixed the seals of the various corporations, by the hands of their respective officers thereunto duly authorized, the day and year above written. All patents, procured or pending, owned by parties hereto, shall be assigned to the new company, with the sole provision that there shall be a reversion to the present owner thereof in case of dissolution or failure, or sale of assets under the mortgage, or retirement from active business of the new corporation. The word 'dissolution' shall, however, not be construed to apply to a nominal or formal reorganization or merger of the new company with any other corporation, person, or persons."

The steps taken in pursuance of this scheme were these: First. The agents of the parties organized a new corporation under the general law of New Jersey, called the United States Capsule Company. The capital stock of this new company was subscribed and allotted as follows: $20,000 par value to each of the two contributing corporations; $20,000 to one of the partnerships, and $10,000 to the other; single shares being allotted to such members of the contracting corporations as were essential to qualify them for becoming directors. Second. The property owned and operated by each of the parties in making and selling hard, empty gelatine capsules was valued by appraisers as provided in the agreement, and conveyances and bills of sale executed to the United States Capsule Company. The instrument of sale executed by the appellee, the Merz Capsule Company, bears date December 21, 1893, and recites a consideration of $15,000. "and other good and valuable considerations." In point of fact, this part of the transaction is yet incomplete. No mortgage has been made by the United States Capsule Company, and no bonds have been executed for the appraised value of this property, as contemplated by the agreement, though the United States Capsule Company did give to the Merz Capsule Company a certificate reciting that the latter company was to receive bonds to the amount of the appraised value of its property when the mortgage should be made and the bonds executed.

On the same day that the above-mentioned deed was made and delivered, the Merz Capsule Company accepted a lease upon its premises, machinery, plant, etc., in consideration of a nominal rent, the lease to terminate January 15, 1894, and thereafter continued in the use and occupation of its property, operating the plant for the purpose of working up stock on hand not included in the sale. While thus remaining in the actual possession of its premises and manufacturing plant, the Merz Capsule Company determined to withdraw from its engagements and contracts with the other parties to the agreement; being advised, as the original bill alleges, that the contract then entered upon, and the conveyance in furtherance thereof, were unlawful, and in excess of its corporate powers. The motive which led to this repentance is not of great importance, though the evidence seems to make it pretty clear that disappointment in obtaining the control of the new business led to serious doubt as to the validity of the arrangement. This determination was notified to the officers and directors of the new corporation, the stock certificates tendered back, and a complete rescission demanded. This tender was refused, and a rescission denied. Having also given public notice of the invalidity of the instrument under which the United States Capsule Company asserted title and right of possession to its manufacturing plant, the Merz Capsule Company resumed its ordinary course of business as an independent manufacturing corporation. On the 22d of January, 1894, while thus in full and peaceable possession of its premises, and the use of its machinery and appliances, the defendants are shown to have made an entry upon those premises, through the officers, agents, and servants of the United States Capsule Company, under circumstances of considerable aggravation, for the purpose of removing the machinery and stock of the said Merz Company, and did actually tear down a part of such machinery, and remove a part thereof from the premises, and were only prevented from completely dismantling the factory by an exertion of force. In consequence of this alleged trespass, and because, as further alleged, like trespasses were threatened and feared, under color of the instrument conveying title to the United States Capsule Company, the Merz Capsule Company filed its original bill in the circuit court for Wayne county, Mich., against the United States Capsule Company as a corporation of the state of New Jersey, and Robert H. McCutcheon, its president; the National Capsule Company, another corporation of the state of New Jersey; J. E. Warren and James Wilkie, copartners under the name and style of the Warren Capsule Company; and John A. Grogan and William H. Warren, copartners under the name and style of the Michigan Capsule Company.

This bill, after setting out the several contracts, conveyances, etc., referred to, and charging that the object and purpose of the combination were to advance the price of empty capsules by suppressing competition and creating a monopoly, as a ground for equitable relief set out the trespass before mentioned, and charged that for the purpose of compelling complainants to stand by and carry out the plan and scheme set out in the agreement of November, 1893, the defendants threatened still other and further trespasses and interference with complainant's business. It alleged that the machinery and appliances used in its business were of "peculiar character and make," and very difficult to replace, and that, if defendants were suffered to take and remove same, its business would be stopped indefinitely, and irreparably ruined, and that its remedy through a court of law was inadequate. It also insisted that to completely relieve complainants against the oppressive and unlawful trespasses, done and threatened, under color of the several agreements and conveyances mentioned, the same should be canceled, and defendants enjoined from interfering in any way with the possession of its property and premises. A temporary injunction was granted as prayed. Thereupon the suit was removed from the United States circuit court upon petition of defendants. After the removal the said United States Capsule Company answered and filed a cross bill setting up the said several agreements, contracts, and conveyances as valid and legal instruments, and praying that they might be so decreed, and that it be placed in full and peaceable occupation of all the property, premises, plant, and machinery thereby transferred to it, and that the same, in all regards, be specifically enforced and performed. Upon full proof, and by final decree (67 Fed. Rep. 414), the circuit court perpetually restrained the United States Capsule Company from the commission of further trespass as prayed, and declared the several agreements ultra vires and illegal under the law of Michigan. The further decree of the court was "that neither the defendant the United States Capsule Company, nor any other of the defendants in the original bill of complaint in this cause, has any title, right, claim, or demand whatsoever in, to, or upon the property of the complainant, the Merz Capsule Company, described in the bill of complaint, and the title thereto is quieted in the said Merz Capsule Company, free from any claims of the defendants in said original bill, or of any of them." The court declined to order an account of damages sustained by complainant, and for this purpose remitted it to a court of law. The cross bill of the United States Capsule Company was also dismissed, as stating no case entitling it to specific performance. From this decree the United States Capsule Company and its codefendants to the original bill have appealed, and assigned as error so much of the decree as gave to the Merz Capsule Company the relief mentioned, and the United States Capsule Company has also assigned error upon the dismissal of its cross bill.

Before a combination or consolidation can be declared void under the principles above referred to, there must be established, first, an intent to monopolize and control trade, and, second, an actual accomplishment of that fact by the combination. Intent alone is not sufficient.

Re Corning, 51 Fed. Rep. 210; Re Greene, 52 Fed. Rep. 113.

There must be a monopoly in fact, which substantially controls trade and dictates prices and production; otherwise the agreement is valid.

The true purpose of the consolidation was to combine the best features of the various patents and processes of the several parties, so as to provide a superior article at a reduced cost and to stop the ruinous competition that existed between them, so as to obtain a reasonable price. This was a reasonable and lawful purpose.

Beal v. Chase, 31 Mich. 531.

The intention of the parties was that all of the plans should continue in operation, and that the individuals who formerly owned them should continue to operate them. In order to successfully carry on the business, the processes and patents conveyed to the new company for a separate and distinct consideration must be used for its exclusive benefit. Under these circumstances it not only is reasonable that the several individuals should bind themselves not to engage elsewhere in the same business, but such conduct on their part would wholly destroy the value of the processes of manufacture and goodwill sold to the company for a good and adequate consideration.

The transaction was consummated; and if any question exists, it is simply that of the right of the complainant corporation to hold the stock which it received. The decision of that question cannot affect in any way the validity of the conveyance which was actually made by the corporation.

Such action on the part of the complainant would not render illegal an actual conveyance of its property which it, as a corporation, had the power to make.

Holmes & G. Mfg. Co. v. Holmes & W. Metal Co. 127 N. Y. 260.

A corporation, with the assent of all its stockholders, has ample power to sell its property and receive in payment stock of another corporation.

If the court should find the entire transaction illegal either upon the ground that it was in violation of the state statute or that the action of the complainant was ultra vires, the complainant would not be entitled to any relief in a court of equity.

Lurton, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The solution of this case depends upon the validity of the agreement of November, 1893, and the subsequent contracts and conveyances made in furtherance thereof. The appeal perfected, and the errors assigned, involve, not only the propriety of the decree granting any relief to the complainant, but the decree dismissing the cross bill of the United States Capsule Company. The object of that cross bill was to have the agreement of November 29, 1893, and all the proceedings taken and conveyances made in pursuance thereof, decreed to be valid, and specifically enforced, by placing the United States Capsule Company in full possession and control of all the property of the Merz Capsule Company, and by enjoining the latter corporation from interfering with the possession or use of same by the cross complainant. These several agreements, contracts, and conveyances are but parts of one plan, and must be read and construed together. The validity of the instrument passing title to the property of the Merz Capsule Company depends upon the objects and purposes of the conveyance. Having been made in express furtherance of the combination scheme inaugurated November 29, 1893, its validity must depend upon the legality of that agreement. Both the original and cross complainant, in their pleadings, have distinctly recognized this, and sought relief upon that basis. The invalidity of this agreement and conveyance has been urged upon several grounds: First, it has been said that the scheme embodied in the agreement for a combination is illegal, as tending to create a common-law monopoly. Much of the evidence found in a very large record has been addressed to this aspect of the question, and appellee earnestly insists that the evidence establishes the fact that the sole object and purpose of the two corporations and two firms, in undertaking to bring about a consolidation of their several manufacturing interests, were to advance and control prices, through a monopoly of the business of making empty gelatine capsules. Second, it has been also insisted that the whole scheme involved the creation of an unlawful combination or trust, within the prohibition of the Michigan statute on that subject. Mich. Laws 1889, Act No. 225, § 3; 3 How. Anno. Stat. § 9354j. Finally, it is urged that whether the combination plan, and the instruments in furtherance thereof, be illegal, as tending to a monopoly, or as a combination unlawful under the Michigan antitrust statute, it is null and void, as to the Merz Capsule Company, as in excess of its corporate powers under the law and policy of Michigan in respect of its domestic corporations.

We have no difficulty in assenting to this latter position, and therefore find it unnecessary to express an opinion upon either of the first two propositions, although they involve, and have elicited, a learned discussion concerning monopolies, competition, restraint of trade, and like problems of political economy. The general rule is that, without express authority, a corporation cannot invest its funds in the stock of another corporation. Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 431; Cook, Stock & Stockholders, § 815; Marbury v. Kentucky Union Land Co. 10 C. C. A. 393-401, 62 Fed. Rep. 335, 22 U. S. App. 267; Buckeye Marble & F. Co. v. Harvey, 92 Tenn. 115-118, 18 L. R. A. 252; Talmage v. Pell, 7 N. Y. 328; Central R. Co. v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 31 N. J. Eq. 475; Hazlehurst v. Savannah, G. & N. A. R. Co. 43 Ga. 57; People, Peabody, v. Chicago Gas Trust Co. 130 Ill. 268-284, 8 L. R. A. 497. To this rule there are certain exceptions, due in part to strong implication from the powers expressly granted, or to the objects and purposes for which stock had been acquired. Thus, under the rule that the implied powers of a corporation are only such as are necessary to the exercise of its corporate franchises, it has been held that, where a debt was collected in the stock of another company, it was a valid transaction, under the implied authority to collect its debts in the most efficient way. Talmage v. Pell, supra; Hove v. Boston Carpet Co. 16 Gray, 493; Hodges v. New England Screw Co. 1 R. I. 312-347, 53 Am. Dec. 624. So in Treadwell v. Salisbury Mfg. Co. 7 Gray, 393-405, 66 Am. Dec. 490, it was held that, for the purpose of retiring from business, it was competent for a manufacturing corporation to sell the whole property of the corporation, taking payment in the shares of a new corporation, to be distributed among the stockholders of the old company. Confessedly, the act under which the Merz Capsule Company was organized confers no express authority under which it would be authorized to invest capital stock in the shares of another corporation. Neither can it be insisted that there is any legislative permission whatever in the statutory law of Michigan which confers any such power upon the corporations of that state. That the facts of this case do not bring it within any well-recognized exception to the general rule inhibiting such investments is to us a most obvious proposition. By the agreement of November 29, 1893, which we are asked to sanction and specifically enforce, the Merz Capsule Company contracted, not only to sell its entire manufacturing plant, including patents, processes, and goodwill, to the new corporation, when organized, but that it would never again engage in the same business. If its purpose had been in good faith to wind up its affairs, and distribute the price to be paid among its stockholders, or to convert the same into money for purposes of distribution, the transaction might be supported under the authorities heretofore cited, although payment was to be received in the stock and bonds of the new company. The implied power to wind up its business and to make a sale of its property would probably authorize a sale for stock in another corporation. Holmes & G. Mfg. Co. v. Holmes & W. Metal Co. 127 N. Y. 252. But here there was no purpose to wind up, and abandon the field. The avowed object was to continue corporate life and activity through the instrumentality of another corporation. There was to be a corporation within a corporation. Individual activity was to cease, but corporate energy was to be exercised through a living corporation, whose life and functions were to be controlled through the shares held by its corporate creator and master. Forbidden to exercise the very functions for which the breath of corporate life had been breathed into it by the state, there would remain standing only the shell of a corporation, retaining corporate existence only for the purpose of controlling and directing the new corporation, in which was invested its corporate capital, and to receive and distribute its aliquot proportion of those earnings as dividends among its own shareholders. The effect of this action of the appellee was to divest itself of the power to exercise the essential and vital element of its franchise, by a renunciation of the right to engage directly and individually in the very business which it was organized to carry on, and is a disregard of the conditions upon which corporate existence was conferred. The state is presumed to grant corporate franchises in the public interest, and to intend that they shall be exercised through the proper officers and agencies of the corporation, and does not contemplate that corporate powers will be delegated to others. Any conduct which destroys their functions, or maims or cripples their separate activity, by taking away the right to freely and independently exercise the functions of their franchise, is contrary to a sound public policy. Central Transp. Co. v. Pullman's Palace Car Co. 139 U. S. 24, 35 L. ed. 55; Thomas v. West Jersey R. Co. 101 U. S. 71, 25 L. ed. 950; People v. North River Sugar Ref. Co. 121 N. Y. 582-625, 9 L. R. A. 38; Mallory v. Hanau Oil Works, 86 Tenn. 598.

The evils incident to such a perversion of corporate capital and stifling of corporate franchises are further aggravated by the peculiar circumstances attendant upon the combination scheme now under consideration. In the execution of this plan, a New Jersey charter of incorporation was secured, though it was never contemplated to carry on business in that state. The active functions of the Michigan corporation, it was contemplated, would be exercised alone under color of this foreign "tramp corporation." This substitution of a New Jersey charter and corporation was not 81 L. R. A.

without purpose. The Michigan statutes, under which the Merz Capsule Company had been organized, provided for a stockholders' liability for labor debts. It also required public reports, at stated intervals, showing the character of the corporation business, such as amount of its capital stock, amount of debts and assets, and a list of stockholders. All of these provisions are eminently calculated to bring about prudent and conservative conduct of corporate business, and to advise the public, in some degree, as to the solvency of the corporation with which they may have dealings. The New Jersey corporation law contains none of these features, and in no way undertakes to safeguard either the shareholders or the public. These differences in the law and policy of the two states was, on the evidence of appellants themselves, a determining feature in procuring a New Jersey charter under which to thereafter carry on the enlarged and combined business. Another remarkable feature deserves comment. This New Jersey corporation, under color of which the combining corporations and firms were to carry on business, contemplated no capital stock other than that contributed by the promoters of the scheme. This was, as mentioned in the second paragraph of the agreement, to consist of "their respective plants, operated by them in the manufacture of hard, empty gelatine capsules, including all real estate owned and used by them for such purpose, together with all machinery and appliances of every kind pertaining thereto, stock in trade, good will, all patentable devices, labels, trademarks, trade secrets (except processes for treating gelatine)." The sellers themselves were to appraise this property through one appraiser selected by the National Capsule Company, one selected by the three other promoters, and a third selected by the two thus appointed. When the value was thus fixed by the sellers, the so-called buyer was to make a mortgage upon the whole of this property, and issue bonds bearing 8 per cent interest, to be divided among the contributors in proportion to their several contributions. The capital stock of the corporation was also to be divided, in agreed proportions, among the parties organizing and controlling this new instrumentality for carrying on business. Having thus secured their contributions to the capital stock against any possible hazards of the business, by taking a mortgage to secure themselves against loss, and having also provided for the management and control of the business, by the practically free distribution of the stock in proportions agreed upon, the corporation was launched upon the business public without a dollar of capital responsible for its general engagements. As a plan for doing business, with the chance of loss reduced to a minimum, it is quite as unique as the instance reported in the case of Morroe v. Nashville Iron & S. & C. Co. 87 Tenn. 262, 3 L. R. A. 37. Nothing, it seems to us, need be added to justify the conclusion that the agreement of November 29, 1893, as to the Merz Capsule Company, and the subsequent conveyance and bill of sale to the United States Capsule Company made in furtherance of that agreement, are inoperative, null, and void, as in excess of its corporate powers.

Being ultra vires, the consent of its stockholders cannot legalize or vitalize the transaction.

The final objection urged by appellants is that if the agreement between the Merz Capsule Company and its associates is subject to the objection that it was unauthorized by its organic law, and contrary to the public policy of Michigan, the objection cannot be urged by that corporation as a ground for affirmative relief in a court of equity. Undoubtedly, if the parties are in pari delicto, and the contract has been fully executed on the part of the plaintiff, and has not been repudiated by the defendant, neither a court of law nor equity will lend its active assistance to the recovery of property or money paid on such a contract, or aid in bringing about its surrender or cancellation. The doctrine of the courts applicable was stated very aptly by Mr. Justice Gray in St. Louis, V. & T. H. R. Co. v. Terre Haute & I. R. Co. 145 U. S. 407, 36 L. ed. 754, when he said: "The general rule in equity, as at law, is in pari delicto, potior est conditio defendentis; and therefore neither party to an illegal contract will be aided by the court, whether to enforce it or to set it aside. If the contract is illegal, affirmative relief against it will not be granted, at law or in equity, unless the contract remains executory, or unless the parties are considered not in equal fault, as where the law violated is intended for the coercion of the one party and the protection of the other, or where there has been fraud or oppression on the part of the defendant. Thomas v. Richmond, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 349, 355, 20 L. ed. 453, 456; Congress & E. Spring Co. v. Knowlton, 103 U. S. 49, 26 L. ed. 347; Story, Eq. Jur. § 298. While an unlawful contract; the parties to which are in pari delicto, remains executory, its invalidity is a defense in a court of law, and a court of equity will order its cancellation only as an equitable mode of making that defense effectual, and when necessary for that purpose."

But this rule by which the defense of pari delicto criminis is sanctioned by courts, as stated by Lord Truro in Benyon v. Nettlefold, 3 Macn. & G. 102, and approved by Lord Selborne in Ayerst v. Jenkins, L. R. 16 Eq. 283; is rested "on the ground of public policy, namely, that those who violate the law must not apply to the law for protection." But, in the case last cited, Lord Selborne notices a very obvious limitation by saying: "When the immediate and direct effect of an estoppel in equity against relief to a particular plaintiff might be to effectuate an unlawful object, or to defeat a legal prohibition, or to protect a fraud, such an estoppel may well be regarded as against public policy."

The contract in the case at bar between the parties in pari delicto is, in a large degree, still executory. Though a deed and bill of sale had been executed and delivered in furtherance of the original agreement, possession has not been surrendered, and the bonds to be delivered in payment have neither been delivered nor executed. The conveyee under the deed has indeed applied to this court, through its cross bill, for the specific performance of the agreement, by being placed in possession under the deed, and for an accounting with the appellee. There is an obvious distinction between the attitude of a complainant asking relief against an unexecuted agreement, illegal for reasons not appearing upon its face, and where it is sought to recover back money or property paid upon a contract fully executed. The cases stating this distinction are referred to and commented upon by Lord Cottenham in Simpson v. Lord Howden, 3 Myl. & C. 99 et seq.; by Lord Selborne in Ayerst v. Jenkins, L. R. 16 Eq. 275; and Justice Gray in St. Louis, V. & T. H. R. Co. v. Terre Haute & I. R. Co. 145 U. S. 393, 36 L. ed. 749. In Whaley v. Norton, 1 Vern. 483, the master of the rolls said "that there would be a difference in these cases between a contract executed and executory, and that this court would extend relief as to things executory, which, if done, it may be might stand." The case of Congress & E. Spring Co. v. Knowlton, 103 U. S. 49, 26 L. ed. 347, is highly instructive, and supports the proposition that affirmative relief may be extended to one of the parties in pari delicto, where the contract is unexecuted, and he be desirous of rescinding it, provided the contract was not one malum in se.

The specific performance sought under the cross bill has rendered necessary the expression of a definite opinion as to the validity of the contract thus set up by the United States Capsule Company. In view of this opinion, necessitating an affirmance of the decree, so far as it dismissed the cross bill, ought we to stop at this point, and decline to grant any part of the relief sought by the appellee? The Merz Capsule Company does not seek to recover back either property or money paid or delivered under its agreement or deed. Before actually surrendering possession of its premises, machinery, and appliances, or transferring its patents and processes, it repudiated the whole scheme, and tendered back all that it had ever received, and has kept that tender good. But it has neither lost possession, nor received the bond payment it was entitled to receive. Having given notice of its purpose to go no further in an illegal scheme, it remained in the peaceable possession of its property; and in the ordinary conduct of its business. Without resorting to legal proceedings, the United States Capsule Company sought to obtain possession of the property of the recalcitrant grantor, and, when prevented by force from accomplishing its unlawful object, avowed its purpose by a repetition of the trespass to obtain a possession which it could not secure by a resort to legal procedure. The effect of a continuance of these unlawful methods to obtain possession, as shown by pleadings and proof, would be most injurious to the business of the complainant, and the remedy at law inadequate. Under all these circumstances, to hold that the complainant is estopped to rely upon the illegality of the agreement and conveyance to which it was a party would be to effectuate an unexecuted, unlawful object, and aid in the defeat of a legal prohibition. The door of this court should not be closed against one seeking to extricate himself from an unlawful connection, provided relief is sought without delay, and before the contract is executed, or other persons have irrevocably acted in reliance upon its supposed legality.

The decree of the court declaring the illegality of the agreement of November 29, 1893, and of the deed of December, 1893, and restraining the appellants from interfering with the title or possession of appellee under color thereof, should be, and accordingly is, affirmed.

(May 24, 1895.)

NOTE.—Right to amend affidavit for attachment.

In many states the statutes expressly provide for amendment of the affidavit.

Decisions in such states are of little value upon the general question of the right to amend. In states where there is no statute upon the subject the decisions are not entirely harmonious. The decisions based on statutes will be first stated that their proper influence on the general question may be seen.

Statutes permitting amendments.

The statutes are not all alike. Some authorize amendments to the fullest extent while others confine them to mere matters of form.

In Alabama, since December, 1887, when the Code became operative, an affidavit for an attachment may be amended in matters of substance as well as in matters of form. Robinson v. Holt, 85 Ala. 596; Richards v. Bestor, 90 Ala. 352.

An affidavit may be amended so as to allege that plaintiff, whose correct name was originally given, is a corporation. Rosenberg v. Clafin Co. 95 Ala. 249.

The affidavit may be amended so as to state that defendant is a married woman doing business by consent of her husband, although it formerly stated that defendant was a corporation, where the entity of defendant is not questioned. Ex parte Nicrosi, 103 Ala. 104.

The Arkansas statute provides that the affidavit may be amended so as to embrace any grounds of attachment that may exist up to and until final judgment upon the same. Rogers v. Cooper, 33 Ark. 406.

Under the Arkansas statute the power to amend is the same in attachment suits as in others. Allen v. Clayton, 11 Fed. Rep. 73.

An allegation as to the amount of the debt sued for may be corrected by amendment at any time. Sannoner v. Jacobson, 47 Ark. 31.

An affidavit may be amended after appeal from a justice of the peace to the circuit court if the amendment contains no cause for attachment not existing at the commencement of the suit. Sherill v. Bench, 37 Ark. 560.

An affidavit by an agent may be amended so as to state that his principal was absent from the county, which fact, by statute, was necessary to give the 81 L. R. A.

agent authority to make the affidavit. Nolen v. Royston, 36 Ark. 581.

The Colorado statute provides that no writ of attachment shall be dissolved in any case for any error or defect in the affidavit if at the request of plaintiff such defective paper may be amended or new paper substituted therefor, and the suit shall proceed as if such defective paper had been originally sufficient.

An affidavit in attachment may be amended by affixing the jurat when that has been omitted. Skinner v. Beehoar, 2 Colo. 383.

Under the Georgia act of 1889 permitting amendments an affidavit for attachment which states that defendant is about to remove without the limits of the state may be amended by adding the words "and county". Brumby v. Rickoff, 94 Ga. 429.

The Illinois statute provides that no attachment shall be quashed on account of any insufficiency in the original affidavit if some one shall cause a sufficient affidavit to be filed. Campbell v. Whetstone, 4 Ill. 381; Kruse v. Wilson, 79 Ill. 233.

But it had previously been held that an amendment of the affidavit will not help the previous illegal proceedings. The affidavit, being the foundation of the proceedings, must be framed agreeably to the provisions of the statute, otherwise there is no jurisdiction. Clark v. Roberts, 1 Ill. 222.

Under the Illinois statute an affidavit insufficiently stating nonresidence on information and belief may be amended, but if the affidavit is so defective that it will not be regarded as an affidavit in the case it will be void and not subject to amendment. Booth v. Rees, 26 Ill. 45.

If the attachment is in aid of a suit at law there is no error in allowing an amendment of the affidavit so as to show that fact, and thus avoid a motion to dismiss for want of a declaration. Roberts v. Dunn, 71 Ill. 46.

If the affidavit is not so defective as to be practically a nullity it may be amended so as to support the action. Moore v. Mauck, 79 Ill. 391.

If there is an attempt to comply with the requirements of the statute, though some are omitted and others are defective, the affidavit may be amended so that it will uphold the proceedings. Hogue v. Corbit, 156 Ill. 540.

Under the Illinois statute an amended affidavit

A PPEAL by plaintiffs and by intervener Habighorst from an order of the District Court for Ramsey County denying motion for a new trial after judgment denying a portion of the relief demanded by complainants in a proceeding to establish a homestead claim to certain property which had been attached for a debt; the plaintiffs appealing from so much of the decision as refused to recognize the homestead claim to the entire property, and the assignee appealing from so much as recognized the validity of the attachment. Affirmed on plaintiffs' appeal, and reversed on defendant's.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. T. R. Palmer and Lewis E. Jones, for appellants:

The plaintiffs are entitled to the entire tract described in the complaint, because the land is not within the "laid-out or platted portion of the city."

Smith's Estate, 51 Minn. 816; Baldwin v. Robinson, 39 Minn. 244; Mintzer v. St. Paul Trust Co. 45 Minn. 323; Lundberg v. Sharvey, 46 Minn. 350.

The assignment by August Heidel was made and must be carried into effect under and pursuant to the insolvent law of 1881. It operated ipso facto to vacate the Benedict attachment.

The insolvent law makes it the duty of the assignor to prevent any creditor obtaining a preference by attachment or other legal process.

Rollins v. Rice (Minn.) 62 N. W. 325; Yanish v. Pioneer Fuel Co. (Minn.) 62 N. W. 387; Smith v. Bean, 46 Minn. 138; Stahl v. Mitchell, 41 Minn. 325.

When an assignment is made under the statute, the rights of creditors rest, and they can compel the assignee to exercise the powers which the law expressly, or by implication, confers upon him as they can restrain him if he attempts to exercise powers which the law does not confer upon him.

Schooler v. Hutchins, 66 Tex. 324; Sanborn v. Norton, 59 Tex. 308.

While an assignment pursuant to chapter 41, Gen. Stat. 1878, will not ipso facto vacate attachments, the assignee has full power to follow and secure any property fraudulently disposed of or concealed by the assignor, and to set aside any liens and recover any property acquired by creditors by fraud.

may be filed which will defeat a motion to strike the papers from the files and quash the writ. Bailey v. Valley Nat. Bank, 127 Ill. 332.

The Iowa statute permits the amendment of a defective affidavit for attachment. Graves v. Cole, 1 G. Greene, 405; Bunn v. Pritchard, 6 Iowa, 56.

A defective affidavit may be amended in substance as well as in form. Langworthy v. Waters, 11 Iowa, 432; Shaffer v. Sundwall, 33 Iowa, 579.

If the defect is amended the plaintiff will not be prejudiced by the defect. Wadsworth v. Cheney, 13 Iowa, 576.

If through inadvertence the signature of the affiant and that of the officer to the jurat were omitted, though the affidavit was actually sworn to, the omission may be cured by amendment. Stout v. Folger, 34 Iowa, 71, 11 Am. Rep. 138.

Under the Kentucky statute an amendment may be made so as not to affect the lien if it contains only such matters as existed at the time the suit was brought. Allen v. Brown, 4 Met. (Ky.) 342; Overruling Pool v. Webster, 3 Met. (Ky.) 282.

But in Cabell v. Patterson, 17 Ky. L. Rep. 836, it is said if the affidavit was defective, and required amendment the plaintiff has only such lien as he acquired by amending the grounds of attachment.

Under the Michigan statute the attachment will not be quashed for defects in the affidavit if, when objection is made, the plaintiff shall file such affidavit as is required by law. Drew v. Dequindre, 2 Dougl. (Mich.) 98.

A statute permitting the filing of a new affidavit to correct defects in the former one does not permit the filing of an affidavit after judgment to supply the place of one which was no affidavit because not properly executed as against one who had purchased the property from the attachment debtor. Greenvault v. Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank, 2 Dougl. (Mich.) 498.

If a statute gives the court discretion to permit the filing of an affidavit at any time before the order of dismissal is entered for failure to file it, it is not an abuse of discretion to refuse to permit it to be filed after the property has been sold under execution on judgment in the suit. Savidge v. Ottawa Circuit Judge (Mich.) 63 N. W. 295.

By the Missouri statute the insufficiency of the affidavit will not require dissolution of the attachment if plaintiff will file a good and sufficient affidavit in such time and manner as the court may direct. Henderson v. Drace, 30 Mo. 358; Hackney v. Williams, 3 Mo. 455.

The Missouri statute is broad enough to cover every possible defect in the affidavit. Claffin v. Hoover, 20 Mo. App. 314.

Where a person has in good faith made a mistake in the amount of indebtedness to secure which the attachment is issued, it is within the power of the court to permit an amendment to be made, and plaintiff should not lose his whole lien because of the inadvertent error. *Newell v. Under a statute permitting amendments to defective affidavits an affidavit may be amended by adding a new ground of attachment,—as, that the debt was fraudulently contracted. Fitzpatrick v. Flannagan, 106 U. S. 648, 27 L. ed. 211.

The result of the above decisions would seem to be that if what purports to be an affidavit is so defective that in fact it is not an affidavit there is nothing to amend and no aid can be derived from the statute permitting amendments. The only course is to begin anew and the lien will then date from the proper commencement of the proceedings with a proper affidavit.

General statute of amendments.

Some of the states have no separate statute permitting amendments of attachment affidavits but the courts permit an amendment of such papers under a general statute of amendments.

The general statute of amendments does not authorize the filing of a substituted affidavit in attachment proceedings. Howard v. Pratt (Mich.) cited in 22 Fed. Rep. 62.

An amendment of an affidavit may be allowed after the affidavit has been adjudged insufficient so as to connect the grounds of attachment by "and" instead of "or" under a statute which permits amendments of pleadings to make them definite and certain and makes the affidavit the plea in attachment cases. Salmon v. Mills, 49 Fed. Rep. 333, 4 U. S. App. 101.

An amendment may be permitted for the insertion of the Christian names of the plaintiffs although the statute does not expressly provide for amendment in attachment cases. Barber v. Smith, 41 Mich. 138.

But if no statute permits amendment of attachment affidavits an amendment permitting the insertion of "not" before "resided" in an affidavit stating that defendant had resided in the state for one month preceding this date cannot be permitted, but the whole proceeding will be void. Freer v. White, 91 Mich. 74.

An amendment may be allowed in matters which

If at the time the writ issued plaintiff did not own the cause of action on which the attachment was based an amendment is not proper to permit plaintiff to show that he had purchased it since the commencement of the action. John V. Farwell Co. v. Wright, 38 Neb. 445.

If the attachment proceeding is ancillary to the action defects in the affidavit may be amended. Branch v. Frank, 81 N. C. 180.

A defect in failing to state how the debt was due and that defendant could not after due diligence be found in the state may be cured by amendment. Sheldon v. Kivett, 110 N. C. 408; Cook v. New York Corundum Co. 114 N. C. 617.

An amendment may be allowed so as to change the designation of defendant from his initials to his full Christian name. Hall v. Thorburn, Phill. L. 158.

A plaintiff has a right to amend his affidavit as to mere matters of form. Palmer v. Bosher, 71 N. C. 291. But the court says it is of the opinion that if the affidavit was insufficient in matters of substance it could not be amended.

However, a later case decided that an amendment affecting the substance of an affidavit in an attachment proceeding may be allowed. Cushing v. Styron, 104 N. C. 388.

The court may permit the amendment of an affidavit although it is wholly insufficient. Brown

What is matter of substance and matter of form.

Under a statute permitting amendment of defects of form an amendment cannot be allowed to supply the omitted allegation that the attachment is not "sued out for the purpose of vexing or harassing the defendant," such allegation being a matter of substance. Hall v. Brazelton, 40 Ala. 406, 46 Ala. 359.

The affidavit may be amended so as to state the names of the individuals composing the partnership plaintiff or defendant, which names were omitted in the original. Sims v. Jacobson, 51 Ala. 186.

That affiant is the agent or attorney of the plaintiff may be shown by amendment. Paulhaus v. Leber, 54 Ala. 91.

If the statute prescribing the affidavit does not require it to be signed, the omission of the signature is not a matter of substance but may be supplied by amendment in open court. Watts v. Womack, 44 Ala. 605.

An affidavit for attachment which states that defendants "are or will be justly indebted" may be amended by striking out the words "or will be." Tommey v. Gamble, 66 Ala. 469.

The failure of the clerk to certify the affidavit is a defect of form and amendable before or during the trial. Hyde v. Adams, 80 Ala. 111.

Omission of subscription may be supplied by amendment. West Tennessee Agri. & M. Asso. v. Madison, 9 Lea, 407.

The clerk's failure to attest that the affidavit had been sworn to may be cured by amendment. Wiley v. Bennett, 9 Bart. 581.

A defective affidavit may be amended. Maples v. Tunis, 11 Humph. 108, 53 Am. Dec. 779.

But if the statute authorizes amendments as to defects in form amendment as to defects in substance cannot be allowed, although the attachment proceeding is merely ancillary. Watt v. Carnes, 4 Heisk. 532; Lillard v. Carter, 7 Heisk. 604.

The matters of substance are the existence of the debt, its amount, and that it is justly owing from defendant to the plaintiff, that some one of the causes for which an attachment may issue exists, and a negation of a purpose to vex or harass the defendant. All else than this is mere matter of form. Sims v. Jacobson, 51 Ala. 186.

In an attachment suit by a landlord matters of substance are that the advancements were in necessary implements or provisions to make a crop or in money to purchase them, that the tenant could not have procured them otherwise, that written obligation was taken, and that it was registered and the existence of one of the causes for attachment. Flexner v. Dickerson, 65 Ala. 129.

In an attachment suit by a landlord against a tenant the affidavit must state that the relation of landlord and tenant exists between the parties, and that the indebtedness is for rent or advances or both. The want of these averments cannot be remedied by amendment. Staggers v. Washington, 56 Ala. 225.

An affidavit in an attachment suit by a landlord against his tenant is fatally defective if it does not allege that the removal of the crops from the rented premises was without the landlord's consent. Shield v. Dothard, 59 Ala. 596.

The affidavit cannot be supplied after the issuance of the writ. Wright v. Smith, 66 Ala. 545.

Statute denying amendment.

Under a statute requiring a discharge of the attachment upon motion if it satisfactorily appears that the writ was improperly or irregularly issued, the affidavit cannot be amended upon such motion. Winters v. Pearson, 72 Cal. 563.

Rule in absence of statute.

There are some cases which seem to be firmly opposed to permitting any amendment of the affidavit.

In Brown v. McCluskey, 26 Ga. 577, the court in denying the right to amend says: "It is difficult to conceive how an oath when it is a necessary preliminary step can be changed so as to sustain a proceeding which is based upon it."

The omission of the signature cannot be supplied by amendment. Cohen v. Manco, 28 Ga. 27.

If the affidavit could be amended in one important respect it might also in another until its whole character was changed and the party affiant made to appear as presenting a state of facts different.

addition to St. Paul, upon which was situated a house in which he resided. This block was not subdivided into lots, but the blocks generally in the addition had been subdivided by plat into lots, varying in size from 35 to 55 feet in width, and from 95 to 170 feet in depth. The property in the addition is strictly urban in character. On November 24, 1893, the defendant Benedict commenced an action against the plaintiff in which a writ of attachment was issued and levied on the property in question. In both the complaint and affidavit for attachment the cause of action was stated to be upon account for goods sold and delivered by Benedict to Heidel. Within ten days after the levy of the attachment, Heidel made an assignment of all his non-exempt property to defendant Habighorst for the benefit of all his creditors. The question is raised whether this was a common-law assignment or an assignment under the insolvent law of 1881; but, as we view the case, this question is not material. After the execution of this assignment, Heidel made a motion to dissolve the attachment. Thereupon Benedict amended his complaint, setting up, in place of the original cause of action, sixteen other separate causes of action, fourteen of which were promissory notes executed by Heidel to various parties, and by them transferred to Benedict, and the two others, respectively, for money loaned and for goods sold to Heidel, by other parties who had assigned the claims to Benedict. Benedict also made a motion for leave to amend his affidavit for attachment, so that the statement of his causes of action would conform to his amended complaint. When the motions came on for hearing, the court denied Heidel's motion to dissolve the attachment, but allowed Benedict's motion to amend his affidavit. Heidel then commenced this action, his contention being that the entire tract was exempt as his homestead, and hence was not subject to attachment, and did not pass by his assignment for the benefit of creditors. Both of the defendants denied that the whole tract was thus exempt, but, as against each other, Benedict claimed that his attachment constituted a lien on the non-exempt part of the tract prior and paramount to the assignment for the benefit of creditors, while Habighorst claimed from those actually sworn to. Halley v. Jackson, 48 Md. 254.

In the absence of express statutory authority an affidavit cannot be amended so as to substitute a corporation as plaintiff in place of the individuals who compose it. C. H. Fargo & Co. v. Cutshaw, 12 Ind. App. 392.

A supplemental affidavit will not be received when the original proves to be insufficient. Elldridge v. Robinson, 4 Serg. & R. 548.

Nor will an amendment be allowed. Mylert v. White, 1 W. N. C. 626.

Although in the Pennsylvania lower courts it has been held that an affidavit may be amended. Brock v. Brock, 17 Phila. 156; McCulley v. Chisholm, 19 Phila. 337.

An affidavit for attachment cannot be amended. Marx v. Abramson, 53 Tex. 264; Slaughter v. Bevans, 1 Pinney, 348.

The statutory remedy by attachment, being summary in character and onerous in its effects, has by all courts and in all times been restricted by the most guarded rules of construction. The right to amend does not exist unless it be given by the statute of attachment or by some other statute in part materia. Sydnor v. Chambers, Dall. Dec. (Tex.) 601.

In the absence of a statute authorizing it a court has not power to allow the amendment of an affidavit for an attachment. Flexner v. Dickerson, 65 Ala. 129; Bennett v. Zabriski, 2 N. M. 7.

That statement is not, however, supported by all the authorities. Of course if a statute attempts to regulate the matter and permits amendments in some cases while failing to provide for others, the proper rule of construction would probably be that in the latter class of cases amendments could not be permitted. But in the entire absence of any statute on the subject, a large number of cases permit amendments in matters of form when the attachment is jurisdictional, and permit all kinds of amendments when the attachment is ancillary.

Amendment of the affidavit in attachment so as to add the necessary allegation that the demand is upon contract, express or implied, or upon judgment, may be allowed in a circuit court of the United States, although, under the statutes of the state in which the court is held, the state court would have no power to allow it, since in the United States courts the attachment is not jurisdictional but is merely incidental to the suit, jurisdiction of which must have been acquired by personal service of process. Erstein v. Rothschild, 22 Fed. Rep. 61.

Since the jurisdiction of the court in cases arising in New York before the Code depended upon the facts set up in the affidavits, the sufficiency of such affidavits was necessarily a jurisdictional question; and if they failed to state facts necessary to confer jurisdiction the defect could not be supplied by amendment. But under the Code attachment is not an original process and the attachment may issue whenever it is made to appear that the facts exist for which the Code permits an attachment to issue. And under the Code the affidavits are proceedings in an action within the meaning of the section which authorizes the court, in furtherance of justice, to amend any pleading or proceeding by inserting material allegations therein. Furman v. Walter, 13 How. Pr. 348.

In Donnell v. Byern, 80 Mo. 332, the court says, where a defendant is personally served with process or voluntarily appears, the proceedings, however defective the affidavit, will be valid and the rights acquired thereby will not depend for their validity upon the attachment but upon the judgment which will bind the attached property as well as the other property of defendant.

An amendment may be allowed to supply defects in the original affidavits and show facts authorizing the attachment. As where the omission is to make a formal computation of receipts for the period covered by the demand and deduct the expenses therefrom so as to show the exact amount demanded. Sulzbacher v. Cawthra, 14 Misc. 545.

A mistake in the name of the plaintiff is not a jurisdictional defect, but may be corrected by amendment at any time. Ruthe v. Green Bay & M. R. Co., 37 Wis. 344.

The court may permit the correction of clerical errors, as of the insertion of a false date by the clerk, at any time. Anderson v. Kanawha Coal Co., 12 W. Va. 526.

There are many cases in which the original affidavit may be amended, such as mere clerical errors and certain defects in form. Crim v. Harmon, 38 W. Va. 596.

that, as to the assignment, the attachment was discharged—First, by force of the assignment itself, as being made under the insolvent law of 1881; and, second, because of the amendment of the complaint and affidavit for attachment substituting entirely different causes of action after the rights of creditors under the assignment had intervened. The trial court held that Heidel was only entitled, as a homestead, to the dwelling and the land on which it was situated, not exceeding in size the average sized lots in Dayton's addition; and that upon the remainder of the tract Benedict's attachment constituted a subsisting lien, paramount of Habighorst's interest under the assignment. Both Heidel and Habighorst appealed.

1. We are of opinion that the decision of the court as to the extent of Heidel's homestead exemption was correct. The tract was within the laid-out or platted portion of an incorporated city. It was strictly urban in character, —a fact which distinguishes the case from that of Re Smith's Estate, 51 Minn. 316, relied on by plaintiff's counsel. It is almost impossible to construe the crude provisions of our homestead law without sometimes resorting to what might seem to be judicial legislation, and it is almost equally difficult to build up a line of decisions that will always be strictly logically consistent with each other; but the conclusion arrived at by the trial court is the only equitable and reasonable one under the facts of this case. It is not to be presumed that the legislature intended that where a part of the platted portion of an incorporated city, strictly urban in character, was not subdivided into lots on the plat, a party might claim an exemption to the extent of acres; while his neighbor across the street, residing on a block of exactly the same kind of property, but subdivided on the plat into lots, could only claim 2,000 or 3,000 square feet.

2. Assuming that, as between the parties to the action, the amendments to Benedict's complaint and affidavit for attachment were permissible, yet we are of opinion that the effect of them was to discharge the attachment as to the intervening rights of Habighorst, and the creditors whom he represents under the as-

The court should only permit such amendments as do not change the cause of action, and therefore if the proceedings are instituted and the case fully tried under one section of the statute the court should not allow an amendment which will base the action upon another section. *Jaffray v. Substantial defects in affidavits which are jurisdictional in the proceedings are not amendable. Tanner & D. Engine Co. v. Hall, 23 Fla. 391.

If the defect in the affidavit is such that the court acquires no jurisdiction it will not be aided by a subsequent amendment, although a good cause for attachment is then stated. Pope v. Hibernia Ins. Co., 24 Ohio St. 481.

If no oath was in fact taken to the affidavit there is nothing which is the subject of amendment, but an attempted amendment will be a new affidavit, and unless filed in time it is of no effect in the suit. Carlisle v. Gunn, 68 Miss. 243.

If the attachment was issued without an affidavit the affidavit cannot be supplied by amendment. McReynolds v. Neal, 8 Humph. 12.

An affidavit which wholly omits to state the grounds of the cause of action is not sufficient to give jurisdiction, and cannot be remedied by amendment. Zeregal v. Benoist, 33 How. Pr. 129.

That the oath was properly taken to the affidavit cannot be shown by amendment. Cosner v. Smith, 36 W. Va. 788.

signment. The amendment, it will be observed, is not of matters of mere form, or of the manner of stating the same cause of action, but is a substitution of entirely different causes of action, having no connection with that set up in the original complaint and affidavit. The extent of the right of amendment as against the defendant in an action is not necessarily by any means the extent of the right of amendment as against third parties who have acquired intervening rights in the attached property. The intervening rights of third parties are quite as sacred as the plaintiff's right of amendment as against the defendant debtor. The courts have likewise generally recognized subsequent attaching creditors as occupying in this regard a more favored position than voluntary purchasers, so that some amendments which would be allowed against the latter would be held to discharge the attachment as to the former; and it seems to us that the rights of creditors under a general assignment for their benefit are quite as great as those of attaching creditors. The authorities seem to be practically all one way on this question, and we have found no case that goes anywhere near so far as to hold that, as against creditors, a plaintiff may amend by substituting an entirely different and distinct cause of action for the one stated in his original complaint and affidavit. That this cannot be done would seem on principle to be self-evident. Creditors under this assignment are entitled to all the surplus that is left after satisfying the liens upon the property existing at the date of the assignment. When this assignment was made, the claim upon which the property had been attached was wholly fictitious and unfounded. Hence no recovery could have been had upon it, and the creditors under the assignment would have secured the property unencumbered. But by this amendment, made after the right of creditors had intervened, it is sought to secure a lien, paramount to these rights, for other debts which had not been sued on at all at the date of the assignment. With one exception, all the cases cited by counsel for Benedict relate to the right of amendment as between the parties to the action, and hence are not in point. The only case where the rights of a third party had intervened is Tilton v. Coffield, 93 U. S. 163, 23 L. ed. 858. But in that case the indebtedness stated in the original affidavit and declaration was upon account for goods sold and delivered, while in the amended affidavit and declaration it was upon a note for the same amount given to balance the same account set forth in the County Bank v. Alberger, 75 N. Y. 185, Reversing 55 How. Pr. 481.

On a hearing of a motion to discharge an attachment issued upon an insufficient affidavit, it is not competent for plaintiff, in the absence of leave to amend or a motion for such leave, to supplement the affidavit by new affidavits. Garner v. White, 23 Ohio St. 192.

A defective affidavit cannot be supplemented by a subsequent affidavit. United States Baking Co. v. Bachman, 38 W. Va. 84.

The filing of a supplemental affidavit presents a different case from an amendment proper of the original affidavit. Crim v. Harmon, 38 W. Va. 596.

Right to amend as against third person.

HEIDEL v. BENEDICT makes a distinction which has not been fully developed by the decisions. The question of amending as against the original defendant is quite different from that of amending as against a subsequent attaching creditor or other third person. There are cases which hold that third persons cannot attack the proceedings in the attachment suit. If such doctrine is adopted it would eliminate the necessity of determining the question of the right to amend as against them. That class of cases does not involve the question of amendment, so such cases will not be collected here. Attention is, however, called to them and to the rule applied in them as stated in Tilton v. Coffield, 93 U. S. 163, 23 L. ed. 858, which held that purchasers pendente lite cannot attack in equity a judgment in an attachment proceeding, although the court permitted an amendment of the affidavit so as to include a promissory note which had not been originally included in the action, if the amendment does not contravene any local statute or rule of local law.

Some cases permit amendments as against third persons.

A defective signature to the affidavit may be corrected as against a subsequent attaching creditor. Fortenheilm v. Claflin, 47 Ark. 49.

The jurat of the officer who administered the oath to the affiant may be added by amendment as against a subsequent attaching creditor. Ibid.

Where the statutes permit an amendment of affidavits for attachment an affidavit made on belief only may be amended as against the second attaching, so as to positively allege the facts supporting the attachment. Sannoner v. Jacobson, 47 Ark. 31.

An affidavit for attachment which fails to definitely state the nature of the demand may be amended as against an intervening creditor under the provisions of the Colorado statutes as to amendments. Leppel v. Beck, 2 Colo. App. 390.

An affidavit which does not state that plaintiff had a just demand against defendants, nor the amount due, is so far subject to amendment that in case judgment is entered on it the judgment will not be void so as to be subject to collateral attack. Burnett v. McCluey, 92 Mo. 230.

Amendments by leave of court adding additional items of indebtedness are conclusive as against a surety on a bond given for a release of the property. Chapman v. Stuckey, 22 Ill. App. 81.

The amendment of the original affidavit without the objection of the principal defendant is not a matter to which the garnishee can make objection. Baltimore, O. & C. R. Co. v. Taylor, 81 Ind. 24.

Other cases refuse to recognize the right to amend as against third persons.

An affidavit which sets forth no cause for attachment cannot, as against subsequent attachment creditors, be amended so as to give the court jurisdiction over the property, although the statute provides for the amendment of informal or insufficient affidavits. Mentzer v. Ellison (Colo.) 43 Pac. 464.

If the affidavit on which a priority has been gained between creditors proves defective the court will not permit an amendment so as to save the priority. Patterson v. The Guinare, 2 Disney (Ohio) 505.

If the original affidavits are defective so as to require amendment, the amendment will be good as between plaintiff and defendant from the time of the commencement of the action, but as to intermediate attaching creditors it will be good only from the time the amendment is filed. Hell v. Hall, 2 Duv. 288.

H. P. F.

prior proceedings and representing the same debt; and the court places its decision expressly upon the ground that, while the description of the cause of action was changed, yet it was, in view of equity and in point of fact, substantially the same with that originally described. The court also calls attention to the distinction, already alluded to, between creditors and voluntary purchasers; saying that the parties in that case "are not subsequent attaching creditors, nor creditors at all; they are purchasers lite pendente." The authorities upon this question are cited in Waples, Attachm. § 145, and Drake, Attachm. §§ 282 et seq. Our conclusion is that the attachment was discharged as to the assignee, Habighorst, by the amendment referred to.

It appears that, before this action was commenced, the assignee had intervened in the suit between Benedict and Heidel, and made a motion to dissolve the attachment and that the court denied the motion. It is now claimed that, under this decision, the validity and priority of the attachment lien is res judicata. But it is well settled that the determination of a motion or summary application is not res judicata so as to prevent the parties from drawing the same matters in question again in the more regular form of an action. Black, Judgm. § 691; Kanne v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 33 Minn. 419.

Upon the appeal of the plaintiff the order appealed from is affirmed, and upon the appeal of defendant Habighorst the order appealed from is reversed.

An application was subsequently made for rehearing, in response to which, on June 4, 1895, the following opinion was handed down:

The application for a reargument is denied; but in doing so it is proper to say that possibly the statement in the opinion that "the determination of a motion or summary application is not res judicata, so as to prevent the parties from drawing the same matters in question in the more regular form of an action," may be too broad, and not universally true under our practice. It was not necessary to go that far in this case. The case of Dwight v. St. John, 25 N. Y. 203, relied on by counsel as qualified and limited by the subsequent case of Riggs v. Pursell, 74 N. Y. 370, only goes to the extent of holding that in the case of an order affecting a substantial right, and appealable when a full hearing has been had on a controverted question of fact, the decision of a point actually litigated upon the motion is an adjudication binding upon the parties, and conclusive to that extent. In the present case it appears from the memorandum of the trial judge that the only question which Habighorst, as intervenor, was permitted to litigate, was whether the assignment by Heidel to him for the benefit of creditors was under the insolvent law of 1881, and hence ipso facto worked a dissolution of the Benedict attachment. The court held that it was merely a common-law assignment, and therefore did not ipso facto dissolve the attachment; and this was the only question litigated or decided on the motion. Hence, under any rule, the questions decided by us were not res judicata by the order denying the motion.

MONTANA SUPREME COURT.

John H. LEYSON, Substituted for James A. Talbott, Admr., etc., of Andrew J. Davis, Deceased, Appl.,

v.

Andrew J. DAVIS, Jr., et al., Repts.

1. A gift of shares of stock in a national bank may be made causa mortis by actual delivery as a gift without indorsement on the certificates or any assignment in writing or transfer on the books of the company, at least where there is no assignment or power of attorney on the back of the certificates and the by-laws require no blank for such purpose or anything except a transfer on the books of the bank.
2. A gift causa mortis is not limited to the event of the donor's failure to return from a trip on which he is about to start, by his statement that he wants the donee to have it if he does not come back or if anything happens, where this remark is made after an actual delivery, without qualification of the gift, and in response to encouraging words respecting his prospects of life.

NOTE.—For gift causa mortis sustained to the extent of transferring a large portion of the estate of a donor, see also Page v. Lewis (Va.) 18 L. R. A. 170, with note on the sufficiency of constructive delivery to sustain gift causa mortis, 31 L. R. A.

3. Certificates of stock in a bank are sufficiently delivered to sustain a gift causa mortis when handed to the donee by the donor with words indicating a gift in case of the donor's death, spoken on the eve of the latter's departure on a trip which was but a desperate fight for life, or to prolong the life which he felt that he must soon lose.
4. A statutory adoption of the common law of England, so far as applicable and of a general nature and not in conflict with special enactments, does not preclude the consideration of the expositions of the common law by judicial authorities of our own country in determining what the common law is.
5. A transfer on the books of a national bank is not necessary to give to a donee or purchaser an equitable title to the shares.
6. A gift of shares of stock causa mortis is not defeated by the subsequent use, without the donor's knowledge or consent, of a proxy executed by him before the gift was made, when it is filled out by the donee and the voting upon it is done under his direction.
7. Testimony that a decedent had declared his intention to give stock standing in his name to another person is admissible in support of a claim that it was given to him.
8. Testimony that a person controlled and directed the voting of stock standing in the name of another is admissible in support of a claim by the former that it was given to him.

9. A new trial will not be granted where it is apparent that the result of another would probably be the same.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Silver Bow County in favor of defendants in a proceeding brought to recover stock alleged to belong to plaintiff's intestate and to be in the possession of defendant Davis and to compel a transfer of it upon the books of defendant bank. Affirmed.

Statement by Hunt, J. :

The appellant, as special administrator of the estate of Andrew J. Davis, deceased, sued to recover 950 shares of the capital stock of defendant bank, alleged by him to belong to the estate of said deceased, and claimed by said defendant Andrew J. Davis, Jr., under a donatio causa mortis. The material allegations of the complaint are: Appellant was and is the duly qualified and acting administrator of said estate. That the defendant was and is a national bank duly organized and existing under the laws of the United States, and that said decedent at the time of his death was the owner of said 950 shares of the capital stock of the said defendant bank, which he had never indorsed, transferred, conveyed, or otherwise disposed of, and that said shares of stock at the time of the death of said decedent stood, and still stand, upon the books of said bank, in his name, and that each of said certificates of stock contains the following provision: "Transferable only by him or his attorney on the books of this bank, on the surrender of this certificate." That, prior to the commencement of this action, appellant presented to the officers of said bank a duly certified copy of his letters of administration, and demanded that said stock be transferred to him, as such administrator, upon the books of said bank, which was refused. That the said defendant Andrew J. Davis, Jr., was and is the cashier and one of the directors of said bank, has possession of said certificates of stock, and claims some right or title thereto, or interest therein. That his claim thereto has no foundation in law or equity. That he refuses to surrender or deliver up said shares of stock, although demand has been made, and that said claim and possession of said certificates of stock cast a cloud upon appellant's title as such administrator, and prevent him from obtaining a transfer of said stock upon the books of said bank. It also alleges that the entire capital stock of said bank consists, of 1,000 shares, and that said bank is an established institution, with a large and increasing business. The prayer is that the claim of said defendant Andrew J. Davis, Jr., be declared void; that he be compelled to deliver up said certificates of stock; and that defendant bank be required to transfer the same upon its books, and issue new certificates therefor to this appellant as such administrator.

To this complaint the defendants made separate answers. The said defendant Andrew J. Davis, Jr., denies that said shares of stock, or any of them, or the certificates representing the same, or any thereof, were or are the property of said decedent, left by him at the time of his death; denies that said decedent was the owner of the whole or any of said stock or certificates, or that he never transferred, conveyed, or otherwise disposed of the same; and avers that said defendant is the owner and in possession of said shares of stock and the certificates thereof, and was such owner and in possession at the time of the death of said decedent. He denies that his claim to the said shares of stock and the certificates thereof is without merit or foundation in law or equity, or that his claim to said stock, or possession of said certificates, casts any cloud upon appellant's title, or that he ever had or has any title thereto. He admits that he is, and for several years last past has been, cashier of said defendant bank, but denies that he now is, or has been at any time since the death of said decedent, a director thereof. The answer, for affirmative matter, substantially avers that said defendant Andrew J. Davis, Jr., was a nephew of said decedent; was cashier of said bank for several years before decedent's death, and for some time before said death he had managed and attended to all the business of said bank; that in the latter part of the month of December, 1889, said decedent was, and had been for some months, seriously and dangerously ill, and suffering from the disease and ailment of which he afterwards died; that he was then about seventy years of age, and preparing to travel to the Pacific coast for his health; that on the 27th or 28th day of December, 1889, at Butte City, in the county of Silver Bow and state of Montana, said decedent, being seriously and dangerously ill, and suffering from the disease and ailment of which he afterwards died, but being of sound and disposing mind, and in view and apprehension and expectation of his death, gave to said defendant as a gift the shares of stock and certificates thereof described in the complaint, and at the same time delivered said certificates of stock to defendant as a gift, and that defendant then and there received and accepted the same, and that thereafter, on the 11th day of March, 1890, said decedent died of said disease and ailment of which he was suffering at the time he made said gift and the delivery of said stock and certificates thereof to defendant, and he has ever since said gift and delivery held in his possession, claimed as his own, said shares of stock and the certificates thereof, and now so holds and claims the same, and is entitled to have said stock transferred upon the books of defendant bank, but that said bank and the directors refused, and still refuse, to permit said transfer to be made until the rights of said parties to said stock and shares are determined by the court. The prayer is that said defendant Andrew J. Davis, Jr., be adjudged the owner of said stock and certificates thereof; that said appellant, as such administrator, and said estate, have no right or interest therein; and that said defendant bank be requested to make the proper transfers upon its books.

To this complaint the defendants made separate answers. The said defendant Andrew J. Davis, Jr., denies that said shares of stock, or any of them, or the certificates representing the same, or any thereof, were or are the property of said decedent, left by him at the time of his death; denies that said decedent was the owner of the whole or any of said stock or certificates, or that he never transferred, conveyed, or otherwise disposed of the same; and avers that said defendant is the owner and in possession of said shares of stock and the certificates thereof, and was such owner and in possession at the time of the death of said decedent. He denies that his claim to the said shares of stock and the certificates thereof is without merit or foundation in law or equity, or that his claim to said stock, or possession of said certificates, casts any cloud upon appellant's title, or that he ever had or has any title thereto. He admits that he is, and for several years last past has been, cashier of said defendant bank, but denies that he now is, or has been at any time since the death of said decedent, a director thereof. The answer, for affirmative matter, substantially avers that said defendant Andrew J. Davis, Jr., was a nephew of said decedent; was cashier of said bank for several years before decedent's death, and for some time before said death he had managed and attended to all the business of said bank; that in the latter part of the month of December, 1889, said decedent was, and had been for some months, seriously and dangerously ill, and suffering from the disease and ailment of which he afterwards died; that he was then about seventy years of age, and preparing to travel to the Pacific coast for his health; that on the 27th or 28th day of December, 1889, at Butte City, in the county of Silver Bow and state of Montana, said decedent, being seriously and dangerously ill, and suffering from the disease and ailment of which he afterwards died, but being of sound and disposing mind, and in view and apprehension and expectation of his death, gave to said defendant as a gift the shares of stock and certificates thereof described in the complaint, and at the same time delivered said certificates of stock to defendant as a gift, and that defendant then and there received and accepted the same, and that thereafter, on the 11th day of March, 1890, said decedent died of said disease and ailment of which he was suffering at the time he made said gift and the delivery of said stock and certificates thereof to defendant, and he has ever since said gift and delivery held in his possession, claimed as his own, said shares of stock and the certificates thereof, and now so holds and claims the same, and is entitled to have said stock transferred upon the books of defendant bank, but that said bank and the directors refused, and still refuse, to permit said transfer to be made until the rights of said parties to said stock and shares are determined by the court. The prayer is that said defendant Andrew J. Davis, Jr., be adjudged the owner of said stock and certificates thereof; that said appellant, as such administrator, and said estate, have no right or interest therein; and that said defendant bank be requested to make the proper transfers upon its books.

The separate answer of defendant bank, in substance, says that it has no interest in the controversy; that it has heretofore refused, and now refuses, to make any transfers of said stock upon its books, although requested by appellant and said Andrew J. Davis, Jr., to do so; and that it is ready to make such transfers, or whatever else the court may order it to do in the premises.

To the separate answer of the said defendant Andrew J. Davis, Jr., appellant filed his replication, which is substantially as follows: He denies the serious or dangerous illness of the said decedent, or that he died from any disease or ailment of which he was suffering at the time of the alleged gift, or in December, 1889, or that on account thereof the decedent was preparing to travel to the Pacific coast for his health; denies that on the 27th or 28th day of December, 1889, at Butte City, Mont., or at any other time or place, said decedent ever made the gift of said shares of stock, or certificates thereof, to said defendant Andrew J. Davis, Jr., or that he ever accepted or received the same, or held or retained possession thereof under any such gift, or that said decedent was of sound and disposing mind at the time of the alleged making of the same, or that he died on account of the disease or ailment of which he was suffering at the time of the alleged making thereof; and avers that the facts set forth in his complaint are true, and asks judgment according to the prayer of the same.

The case was tried to the court sitting without a jury. Upon the trial the following facts were adduced:

A. J. Davis, designated by counsel and witnesses throughout this case as Judge Davis, a resident of Butte in this state, and for many years prior to his death president of the First National Bank of that city, died March 11, 1890, leaving an estate, exclusive of 950 shares of the capital stock of said bank, now involved in this controversy, and other valuable assets, appraised in value at $2,489,393. By accumulated profits and enhanced value during the twelve or fifteen years of the bank's existence, for nearly all of which time the deceased actively and personally controlled the bank's affairs, the value of this stock when this action was begun was admitted to be $950,000. In the latter part of the year 1889 Judge Davis was in somewhat feeble health, and close to seventy years old. He had not been in perfect health for some time, and had on divers occasions told plaintiff herein, who was a close and old friend, that he was too old to recover from his ailment. It appeared, too, that he had been for some time trying to straighten up his affairs and fix up everything in the bank. In November of that year he joined Judge Hiram Knowles and Hon. W. W. Dixon in a trip to Tacoma and Victoria. While away he was very nervous, worrying over money affairs, was quite feeble and ill much of the time, suffering from insomnia and pain, and often took medicine. After one particularly bad night of suffering, Judge Davis wanted to return to Butte at once. So about December 1st the party came 81 L. R. A.

home, having been gone scarcely three weeks. Judge Davis' health declined. He was no better a day or two after his return than before he went to Puget sound. The insomnia continued, and the habit of taking medicine every day or two was kept up.

But his mind was perfectly clear, although he seems not to have resumed any activity in business generally, except to adjust some important and unfinished transactions, extending over seven or eight years, with this plaintiff, Talbott. The nature of this business was an accounting in mining matters in which Talbott and Judge Davis were jointly interested. It was Talbott's habit to go to the judge's rooms at night, and to proceed with the adjustment. The "figuring" connected with the settlement was done by Andrew J. Davis, Jr., principal defendant in this suit. The settlement included many items of account, and occupied three or four hours of every evening, commencing about December 19, and continuing until about the 27th, when Judge Davis executed a deed to Talbott, and thus finally concluded their business affairs. If the deceased showed fatigue occasionally, as he did, during the settlement, the matter was continued until the next evening. When all was about wound up, and upon the evening before the deed to Talbott was executed,—say December 27,—the judge said to Andrew J. Davis (who was always call Andy, and whom we will likewise, for convenience, call Andy), "When you come down to-morrow, fetch my box down," and at the same time he told Talbott to come too.

Certain other material testimony appropriately finds place at this point: Judge Davis was a bachelor living with a private family in Butte. He is described by certain witnesses as a very close man, sagacious, careful, and correct in business affairs; and by Judge Knowles, United States district judge for Montana, decedent's successor as president of the bank (a very confidential and intimate friend, and for a long time his counsel), as a man of few friendships,—a remarkably reticent and secretive man about himself and his affairs.

But he spoke freely and often of his nephew and namesake, Andy. Not one, but numerous witnesses, several nonresidents, and others, prominent citizens of the state, testified to voluntary statements made by the decedent, that Andy was a good business man, was coming out all right, and would some day own the bank. For instance, to one friend he stated in the summer of 1889, that he "never intended the bank to go into his estate, that he always intended that for Andy, and that was what he expected to do with it." To another friend, in July, 1889, he said: I intend to make another trip to Europe, and before I go I intend to give the bank to Andy,—and afterwards said to the same friend that he wanted to call in all of his outside business, and that he had intended to give the bank to Andy. To another, that it was his intention to give the bank to Andy, in due course of time. And again, in speaking of a new bank building which was being erected in the summer of 1889, the decedent remarked: "As the bank belongs to Andy, you will put in a set of rooms, bathroom, and everything complete." To others he remarked that the bank would be Andy's. To still another friend and former employee, in speaking of business generally, he said the bank was "Andy's, and he considered it Andy's, and wanted it so considered; . . . that he was not giving him much,—$100,000, and what it earned." To an old business acquaintance he said in 1888 that "he hoped that Andy's sickness [at the time Andy was sick, and at some springs away from Butte] would not amount to anything, because he wanted him to be well before taking charge of the bank, because he intended to give him the bank, and wanted him to be a healthy man." To a national bank examiner, in August, 1889, when it was suggested that the responsibilities of being cashier of the bank were great for Andy, the decedent replied: "That will be all right, as Andy will some day get the bank, any way." And afterwards, in October, 1889, he repeated this conversation, saying that Andy should have it all when he was gone. To a banking friend from Omaha, whom he met in November on the steamboat going to Victoria, he said his health was very poor, and that he had started to take a trip to Japan, hoping to be improved by the sea voyage, but that he did not know whether he would be able to continue or not, as he was feeling very poorly; that he had built up the bank in Butte by his own personal efforts, and had made it the best bank in Montana, and had a great deal of pride in it, and had trained his nephew Andy to the business, so that he could take sole charge of the bank after his death, and when he got home he expected to give over control of the bank to him, and intended to give the stock of the bank owned by him to Andy, and that it was his intention that Andy should eventually be the manager of the bank; and that he would leave his stock in said bank to him. To the physician of Andy, likewise an old friend of decedent's when told that Andy's constitution was not strong enough to enable him to work in the bank from morning until night, he remarked: "Andy knows very well that that bank will belong to him some day." To another friend, who had had charge of his business in Butte for a number of years, he related the history of Andy's coming to Montana, and said that before Andy had come he had consulted Mr. Story, of the Chicago Times, about the boy, Andy; that Story had spoken well of him; that frequently, from the year 1884 up to nearly the time of his death, Judge Davis had spoken about Andy, said that he was getting along nicely, and that he wanted the bank to remain in the Davis family, and in the Davis name, and under Davis management, even after his death, and that he expected the bank to fall to Andy when he died.

The decedent had brought Andy to Montana when a boy, years before, and put him to work in the bank, where the young man's industry and business capacity had so impressed themselves upon his uncle that he made him the cashier about 1887. The evidence is that he loved his nephew Andy, and regarded him as a father would a son. "He was the only person," said Judge Knowles, "that I ever knew Judge Davis to exhibit any particular warmth or affection towards." He was solicitous of Andy's health. When he was sick he watched him, consulted physicians about him, and "he seemed to feel differently towards Andy than to any one else that was around him."

But to resume the interview at the decedent's room on the night following the one when the box was brought down: Talbott, the plaintiff herein, was there in obedience to the judge's request. Andy came in later. Judge Davis soon came up from downstairs, and joined them. Talbott was the only witness who could testify to the facts constituting the alleged gift. Talbott was a friend of the deceased and of Andy. He had been intimately acquainted in business, and other ways of life, with Judge Davis, for eighteen or twenty years; was an officer of the bank before and after decedent's death, and interested more or less in certain business ventures in which Andy was interested. This is Talbott's account: The three sat about a little table or desk in the middle of the room. Upon this desk were pen and ink. The decedent had the key and unlocked the box,—an ordinary black tin box. He pulled the papers out altogether, and put them on the table. He looked around for a while, and finally said: "Where is all of this? This isn't all. There is something that is not here." "It appeared" said Talbott, "that he got them all pulled out together, and did not get them all." Andy said that he guessed they were all there, and, after figuring the number of bank-stock certificates, he told his uncle they were all there. "Well, now," said the judge, "there is fifty shares in the directors' hands." Thereupon he enumerated the directors, and it appeared as if one (Hauser) had never executed any paper to show how he held the stock evidently standing in his (Hauser's) name. The judge then told Andy to write to Hauser, and see that he signed a contract, and to do it right away. Both the judge and Andy found the stock all right then, and the 950 shares were accounted for in several (4) certificates. Andy, after counting the stock up, and showing his uncle what there was of it, passed the certificates over to Judge Davis. The judge took them, and passed them back to Andy, saying: "I have always intended that for you; you take that," or, as the witness said, in response to another question by his counsel, asking him what Judge Davis said. "I have always intended that for you, and I want you to take it." Andy took the stock, and put it in his pocket. The witness Talbott described his feelings as follows: "Well, Andy took it, and I sat there, and it was a kind of a surprise to me. I didn't expect anything of that kind. I didn't know what he did. I supposed he had his business or maybe he would fix his business, in a different way; but he did that, and he said. 'I always intended to do that, and now I will do it.'" Talbott and Andy then commenced talking to Judge Davis, and telling him that they did not think he was so ill as he might think. To this the decedent replied: "Well, I am an old man, and there is no telling. I can't stand what I used to stand. I don't think I can get over this disease. I can't stand it. I am too old. I can't expect it." The witness Talbott, when asked what Judge Davis said in reference to his expectation of recovery or not, answered that the judge said: "You might think it, but I don't. I only hope it will be so, but I don't think it." Thereupon Andy and Talbott told him that they thought he would recover if he would go down there (meaning the Puget sound country), and give his business up, and not be bothered about it, but the judge said he "didn't think it;" he was "going to try it, any way." "I will get ready, and go in the morning," said Judge Davis. The interview seems then to have terminated.

The certificates of stock had no written or printed assignments indorsed upon them, of any kind. The delivery was unaccompanied by any writing at the time. Andy took the box away with him to the bank, the four certificates of stock being in his pocket at the time they left Judge Davis' rooms. Upon the next day, in company with John A. Davis, his brother, the decedent left Butte for Tacoma, in the state of Washington.

On January 14, 1890, a trifle over a fortnight after the judge had gone west, the annual meeting of the stockholders of the bank was held. The minutes of the meeting show that at that meeting John E. Davis, a brother of the defendant, under a proxy signed by Judge Davis, represented and voted the stock in question, and Judge Davis was one of the directors, and president, chosen at that meeting. The proxy bears date December 24, 1889. It therefore antedates the interview just detailed as of December 27 or 28, 1889. The proxy is in the usual form, giving authority, "for me and in my name, to vote 950 shares of the stock of the First National Bank of Butte, owned by me, and standing in my name on the books of said bank, at the annual meeting of the stockholders thereof to be held for the election of directors on the 14th day of January, A. D. 1890, pursuant to law." John E. Davis testified that he voted the stock at that meeting under the proxy for Judge Davis for president; that the proxy was given to him by Andy at the bank, at the meeting of the stockholders; it was the first time he had ever seen it. The witness said that the body of the proxy was in the handwriting of Andy. As the witness's name was inserted in a different ink, the proxy was probably in blank when signed. Witness said that he had never had any conversation with Judge Davis in regard to this proxy, or any direction from him as to what officers and directors he should vote for under it; that he voted the way Andy told him, and after he voted he handed the proxy back to Andy. Judge Davis continued to be president of the bank until his death. So far as the testimony shows, he had no knowledge of said election of himself as president, or of his holding said position, and never did any act as president of said bank from the time he handed the certificates to Andy.

In the early part of February, 1890, Judge Davis returned from his second trip to the west coast. He failed considerably in health during his absence. He talked very low to those whom he met upon his arrival, and was feeble and very ill. Judge Knowles and Andy went with him to his room that night. He said to Judge Knowles, "I want to see you to-morrow." The next day Judge Knowles called. He found Judge Davis's physical condition bad. Continuing, Judge Knowles said: "He had lost ground since I had seen him. . . . At this time when he went up to Tacoma, and some time before that, he was all the time trying to straighten up his affairs, as he claimed, and fix up everything in the bank. He would go into the bank, and take out the bills payable to the bank, and look over them and examine them all, and those he did not think were just right he wanted them fixed up. He wanted everything fixed up, he said. That was before he went to Tacoma, and afterwards. He did not state to me for what reason he wanted them fixed up. You must remember that Judge Davis was a remarkably reticent and secretive man about himself and his affairs. He was a very good talker about other people's affairs, but he was a very secretive man about his own affairs and about himself. . . . Well, he was accustomed to talk along the last about Andy, as he always called him,—his business capacity, and in a very characteristic way. He would pump me as to my opinion about him, and then he would compare him to himself. He would say, 'Now I was just a little fellow, just like Andy, and he will come out all right.' . . . As to his affection, I think that Andy is the only person that I ever knew Judge Davis to exhibit any particular warmth or affection towards. He was a man that had few friendships, and Andy was one of his particular favorites. If he was sick, he was always uneasy. He was sick in the bank here once. He had a room in the bank, and the judge would go in and look at him, and he would not say anything particular to him, but he would rush right off and see the doctor, and ask him about what he thought of Andy, and ask if he was very sick, or something of that kind; and he seemed to feel differently towards Andy than to any one else that was around him. . . . Judge Davis was quite sick, and I had gone in there and talked with him about his trip and his health, and he said, 'I wish to make some presents.' He went on and stated that he wanted to know if I thought he was sound enough in mind to make these presents, and he had a long talk about any probability about his going insane, and I went on and discussed with him what I had read upon these subjects of insanity and brain diseases. The conversation was probably an hour long, and in this conversation about the presents he first said that he wished to give $10,000 to the Public Library of Butte. Andy wanted him to, and he understood that Charlie Larabie had given $10,000 and he wanted to give $10,000 to meet that. Then he said there was a lady here whose husband had helped him considerably, and he wanted to make her a present, though he said he had paid him for everything he had done that he asked, but he wanted to make her a present. He said something about W. E. Wehrspau's little girl, but exactly what was said about that I don't remember. Then he said there were two persons in the states that he wanted to make presents to, and in this conversation he said, 'Andy is to have the bank,' or 'control the bank.' I don't know which now, or he might have said both. That was all that was said particularly about Andy in that conversation. That is as far as that matter is concerned. The balance of it led up to a legal matter. The interview was to be renewed. He was not to attend to any business, or go up to the bank, or anything of that kind; and in three days from that time I was to be there, and we would straighten up his affairs." This question was then asked Judge Knowles: "In this conversation with reference to Andy, did he say that he wanted to give the bank to Andy?" Judge Knowles answer was: "He did not. He said, 'Andy is to control the bank,' or 'to have the bank;' and I think he may have said both, because this conversation was fully an hour long, and I don't know but more." On the cross-examination of Judge Knowles the following testimony was given:

Q. This conversation that you refer to, in which he spoke of giving Mrs. Wehrspau's daughter something, and also to the library $10,000, and also something to the lady here, and also that Andy was to have the bank, or to control the bank, was after his return from Tacoma, was it?

A. The last time; yes. It was his last trip to Tacoma.

Q. I believe you say that it was understood that you were to return within a few days, and fix up these matters for him?

A. No; it was not to fix up these gifts, exactly. The return was with a view of writing a will, and fixing everything in that way.

On his redirect examination, Judge Knowles continued as follows: "My object for returning then was to draw a will. That was the legal matter that came up. The other matter was my opinion as to his physical condition and capacity to make these presents that he was going to make." Thereupon the judge of the court asked Judge Knowles whether the statements made by Judge Davis to him concerning Andy and the bank were in the course of professional employment by Judge Davis. Judge Knowles replied that he did not consider it a professional matter, but a personal one, and that Judge Davis's consultation in relation to these gifts was in a friendly way. Judge Knowles states that he was anxious that Judge Davis should fix up his matters by a will at that time, and the conversation led finally up to that proposition; but Judge Davis did not ask Judge Knowles about a will, or making any will, but he spoke to him about making these presents, and whether he (Judge Knowles) thought that he (the decedent) was mentally capable of making these gifts. At the expiration of three days, Judge Knowles called again. He found Judge Davis insane. His reason never returned to him, and he died of his ailment on March 11th thereafter.

Shortly after Judge Davis died, about April 19, 1890, on a hearing in reference to the inventory, or concerning the amount of property to come into his hands as special administrator of the estate of the deceased, the plaintiff herein, Talbott, was a witness. At that hearing Talbott, among other things, not material to be reiterated, testified substantially that Judge Davis gave Andy the stock; that the decedent looked the stock over, and gave it to Andy, and said he did not know whether he would ever come back or not,—there might be an accident on the railroad; that he (Talbott) and Andy told decedent they thought he would come back, and assured him that he would live ten or fifteen years; that decedent had said the train might jump the track and kill him, and "If I don't come back, or anything happens. I want you to have that." Upon the trial of this case Talbott was cross-examined concerning his former testimony:

Q. Is that your language? (As used on the former trial).

A. Well, that is about the sum and substance of it,—that he wanted him to have the stock.

Talbott further said upon this trial, upon cross-examination, that at the former hearing he had detailed, he thought, about what transpired, and that he had testified that Judge Davis was going to the coast, saying he was going down to see if it wouldn't do him good again; it was the best place he had found in all his travels. He said that, if he detailed anything different upon the trial of this cause from what he had said upon the first hearing, "it cannot be much different, because it is all in the same meaning,—the same idea. I cannot see where it would make any difference, particularly. I gave the language as near as I could,—to the best of my knowledge and judgment. On redirect examination, the witness was asked whether, on the former examination, he had stated everything. He replied:

No, sir; I didn't state everything.

Q. Have you, upon this examination, stated everything that occurred as well as you could remember?

A. I think so; everything that would be connected with the case. There were little things came up there,—talking about different things,—but nothing about that gift or anything.

Q. You stated in your former examination, as read to you, that Judge Davis said that something might happen to him,—the train might run off the track. How did he come to make that remark?

A. The reason was that we told him, you know, that we didn't think,—tried to brace him up and make him think that he was not so bad off; you know; and then it was that he said the train might jump the track, and he get killed in that way. He said, "You are taking chances all the time when you are on a train," or something to that effect. That was how that came about.

The witness then said that he had testified upon the first hearing without knowing that he was to be called upon, and without having given any particular thought to the matter. Thereupon this question was put to him by respondents' counsel:

If there is any difference in the statement that you gave in your testimony before and that you have given now, which would you say is correct?

A. Well, I think that the statement I gave to-day is as near correct as I could give it, then or any other time. I don't see how I could better it any. There might be a word here and there that would mean a little different; but at the same time it all means the same to me, when I come to put it all together.

Here was the recross-examination:

Q. There may be, you say,—have been,—some things transpired that you did not testify to on the former trial; but what facts you did testify to on the former trial are correct, are they not,—the facts?

A. Well, I should say that they were; yes, sir.

Q. While you might not have remembered some things that you testify to now, what you did testify to then is correct?

A. Yes, sir.

The by-laws of the bank are made part of the case. So far as material, they provide that the regular annual meetings of the stockholders for the election of directors should be held on the second Tuesday in January of each year. The directors-elect were required to meet for organization, upon notification given by the cashier, within one week from the time of their election, and should do no business whatever prior to qualifying by taking the oath of office, as required by law. The president was to hold his office for the current year, and was to be elected by the board of directors. By-laws Nos. 21, 22, and 23 provide as follows: "(21) The stock of this bank shall be assignable and transferable only on the books of this bank, subject to the restrictions and provisions of the banking laws, and transfer book shall be provided, in which all assignments and transfers of stock shall be made. No transfer of stock shall be made without the consent of the board of directors, by any stockholder who shall be liable, either as principal, debtor, or otherwise. (22) Transfers of stock shall not be suspended preparatory to the declaration of dividends, and, unless an agreement to the contrary shall be expressed in the assignments, dividends shall be paid to the stockholders in whose name the stock stands at the date of the declaration of the dividends. (23) Certificates of stock, signed by the president and cashier, shall be issued to stockholders, and the certificates shall state upon the face thereof that the stock is transferable only on the books of the bank."

It also appears that on December 9, 1889, the regular meeting of the stockholders was called to be held at the office of the bank on Tuesday, January 14, 1890. This call was signed by Andrew J. Davis, Jr., respondent herein, as cashier. Pursuant to this call a meeting was held, as the following extract of the minutes will show:

Present: Andrew J. Davis, by proxy to J. E. Davis, Hiram Knowles, and A. J. Davis, Jr. On motion, Hiram Knowles was chosen chairman, and Andrew J. Davis, Jr., secretary. On motion duly carried, it was resolved to proceed to the election of directors, and Hiram Knowles and John E. Davis were chosen judges of the election, who announced the following directors duly elected, receiving 970 votes each: Andrew J. Davis, Hiram Knowles, S. T. Hauser, W. W. Dixon, James A. Talbott, A. J. Davis, Jr. The meeting then adjourned.

Andrew J. Davis, Jr., Secretary.

Attest: Hiram Knowles, Chairman.

W. C. Darnold, a witness for the defendant, testified that he was well acquainted with the decedent, having been in his employ for three years; that, after the return of Judge Davis from Tacoma the last time, he was out of employment, and being unfriendly to Andy, he called upon Judge Davis himself, to solicit his friendly offices to obtain a situation, somewhere between the 1st and the 6th of February, 1890, and that Judge Davis then told him that he had given the bank stock to Andy, and had not any control over it, and that he could not do anything, but that when he got up he would help him; that at that time Judge Davis was very low, could only speak two or three words, and would keep quiet for a moment or two, and then speak again. Upon cross-examination Darnold said that nobody was paying him to remain in Butte, or to testify as he did; that he was out of employment at the time, and was living with Mr. J. R. Boyce, Jr.; that he had never mentioned to Mr. or Mrs. Boyce what he had heard Judge Davis say, and he had no recollection of having made any statement to the Boyces that his testimony in this case would be a "clincher." J. R. Boyce, Jr., referred to in the testimony of Darnold, was called on the part of the plaintiff, and testified in substance that Darnold was working for J. R. Boyce, Jr., & Co., as a bookkeeper, until about the 1st of March, 1890; that he had heard Darnold say that Judge Davis said in 1887 that he intended the bank for Andy; that about two weeks before the trial of this case he heard Darnold say that he would testify herein, and would be the last witness; and that, although he did not state what he was going to testify to, yet he had given the witness to understand that all he (Darnold) knew about the case was what Judge Davis had told him in 1887. Mr. Boyce did not produce any books to verify his statement that Darnold left his employ about March 1, 1890, and his testimony concerning that point was from recollection, although the books were at Boyce's house at the time of the trial.

The court found the issues in favor of the defendant Andrew J. Davis, Jr., and rendered a decree in accordance with the prayer of his answer, adjudging him to be the owner of all the shares of stock described in the complaint, and the certificates thereof, and entitled to have the same transferred to him on the books of the bank; directing the First National Bank of Butte, defendant, to make such transfer, and to issue to said Andrew J. Davis new and proper certificates therefor.

A motion for new trial was made, based upon assigned errors in admitting evidence of decedent's estimate of Andy's business qualifications, and in admitting the testimony of John E. Davis that Andy directed him to cast the 950 shares of stock for the alleged donee for director, for the purpose of showing the exercise of dominion and control over the stock by Andy in the absence, and without the knowledge, of the decedent. Nearly all the other errors assigned are involved in the legal propositions discussed in the opinion. One ground, however, of motion for new trial, was newly discovered evidence. J. R. Boyce, Jr., who had been a witness, made an affidavit to the effect that Darnold had stated to him on or about July 1, 1894, that he had never had a conversation with Judge Davis on the subject of Andy's becoming the owner of the bank since 1886 or thereabouts, and that the conversation which Darnold had testified to as having occurred in February, 1890, was not true; that on July 11, 1894, Darnold asked the witness to go with him to see Mr. Stapleton, and that there, in the presence of Mr. Stapleton, Darnold said that his former statements on the trial of this case were not true. One John H. Curtis also filed an affidavit to the effect that about July 10, 1894, he had heard Darnold make a statement to Boyce that he (Darnold) had made a demand upon Mr. Davis, respondent, for $10,000, which would enable him to go into business in Ohio, and that if Davis did not give it he intended to go to the attorneys and tell them that he misrepresented his statements on the witness stand. As counter affidavits, the respondent Andrew J. Davis filed the statements of W. I. Lippincott, Guy X. Piatt, and himself. It appears by these statements that there was a controversy pending between the bank and J. R. Boyce, Jr., in which Boyce claimed that Judge Davis, deceased, was a partner in business with him, and attributed a suit which had been brought by the bank against the firm of Jas. R. Boyce, Jr., & Co. to the enmity of respondent Davis. Respondent Davis himself stated in his affidavit: That he had caused an attachment to be levied in behalf of the bank on the stock and merchandise of said J. R. Boyce, Jr., & Co., and from that time Boyce had entertained unfriendly feelings towards him. That, since the trial of this suit in the district court, Boyce had solicited him to join in a scheme to buy up the claims against the firm of Boyce & Co., jointly with him, and together they would prove that A. J. Davis, the deceased, had been a partner in business with Boyce, and thus the amounts of said claims could be collected. Davis refused to enter into this arrangement. That on Friday, July 20, 1894, Boyce told Davis that he had evidence in his (Boyce's) pocket that would "upset his case;" that the other side wanted said evidence, but he would not let them have it if he (Davis) would agree to go in with him to buy up the claims of the creditors of said Boyce & Co., and then hold the Davis estate for them. That Boyce gave him until noon of the next day to decide what to do, giving him to understand that, if he did not go into the arrangement he proposed, he would use the evidence which he claimed to have against him. That upon the next day respondent Davis told him he would have nothing to do with the arrangement he proposed. Darnold himself filed no counter affidavit. It is unnecessary to recapitulate more fully the terms of the several affidavits used on motion for new trial. The affidavit of Mr. Wellcome was filed too late to be considered. The motion for new trial was overruled, and from the order overruling the same, and from the judgment, the plaintiff appeals.

Messrs. Toole & Wallace, Sanders & Sanders, and McConnell, Clayberg, & Gunn, for appellant:

In the civil law a donatio mortis causa is defined by Justinian to be "that which is made to meet the case of death."

Sanders' Institutes of Justinian, p. 147.

In Swinburne on Wills, page 22, we find one where the giver, not terrified with the fear of any present peril, but moved with a general consideration of man's mortality, giveth anything. Another when the giver, being moved with imminent danger, doth so give that straightway it is made his to whom it was given.

Roper repudiates that class, but in the light of the decision of the United States Supreme Court (Basket v. Hassell, 107 U. S. 602, 27 L. ed. 500), it must be taken as the correct one, inasmuch as it is decided there, and sustained by authorities, that a gift mortis causa is made upon conditions subsequent, not upon conditions precedent, whereas the third definition of Swinburne, approved by Roper, is clearly upon conditions precedent.

This kind of a gift is in derogation of the common-law procedure, and opposed to the statute of frauds regulating a testamentary disposition of property; hence, in order to be valid it must be accomplished strictly in accordance with the rules laid down regarding it.

Comer v. Comer, 120 Ill. 420; Haus v. Palmer, 21 Pa. 296; Michener v. Dale, 23 Pa. 59.

All that saves it from coming within the statute of frauds is that no control or dominion is left in the donor, and that the title passes out and into the donee. Should this not be done, it would be in the nature of a testamentary disposition, and anything approaching a testamentary disposition, disguised under this form, is absolutely ineffectual.

Sexton*, 55 Barb. 251; Ridden v. Thrall, 125 N. Y. 572, 11 L. R. A. 684; Drew v. Hagerty, 81 Me. 231, 3 L. R. A. 230; 3 Redf. Wills, 344, 348, 349.

The state of Montana has adopted the common law.

The common law in reference to pledges, gifts inter vivos, gifts causa mortis, and the like, is of a general nature, and as applicable here as it is in England.

We start, then, with the common law, as applied to gifts causa mortis, as the law of this state, without the change or modification, by any "special enactment."

In Ward v. Turner, 2 Ves. Sr. 431 (1752), there was an attempt to give South Sea annuities by a mere delivery of the receipt for them, issued by the company. This was held invalid as a gift.

In the case of West v. West, 9 Ir. L. Rep. 121, there was a gift by deed, but no transfer was made on the books of the company. The court was inclined to think that there was no gift.

A transfer on the books of the company is required to make a gift perfect.

Moore v. Moore, L. R. 18 Eq. 474, 43 L. J. Ch. 617, 22 Week. Rep. 729, 30 L. T. N. S. 752; Dillon v. Coppin, 4 Myl. & C. 647, 9 L. J. Ch. N. S. 87, 4 Jur. 427.

Schouler on Personal Property, ed. 1876, pp. 160, 161, says: "In view of the requirements of a transfer on the books of the company, the courts in England and some parts of this country are disinclined to sustain gifts of stock upon a mere delivery of the certificate to the donee without pursuing the other legal formalities of a transfer."

Moore v. Moore, supra; Pennington v. Gittings, 2 Gill & J. 208.

Nor according to the latest New Jersey decisions can there be a valid gift causa mortis of stock privileges, the price not being payable nor the stock issuable till after the donor's death.

Egerton v. Egerton, 17 N. J. Eq. 419.

But in New York a looser rule prevails.

Grymes v. Hone, 49 N. Y. 17, 10 Am. Rep. 313.

It is the English doctrine that, where one gives shares, the gift is not perfected until the transfer is made; and the death of the donor meantime prevents his donation from taking effect.

Lambert v. Overton, 13 Week. Rep. 227; Pennington v. Gittings, supra.

An absolute gift requires a renunciation by the donor, and an acquisition by the donee, of all interest in and title to the subject of the gift.

Curry v. Powers, 70 N. Y. 212, 26 Am. Rep. 577 (1877); Beaver v. Beaver, 117 N. Y. 411, 6 L. R. A. 403; Michener v. Dale, 23 Pa. 59.

At common law it is very clear, from the general current of authorities, that delivery is essential to give effect to a gift.

The Maryland cases subsequent to Pennington v. Gittings, supra, of Conser v. Snowden, 54 Md. 175, 39 Am. Rep. 368 (1880), and Baltimore Retort & Fire Brick Co. v. Mali, 65 Md. 98, 57 Am. Rep. 304 (1885), continue the doctrine as there laid down.

In South Carolina to constitute a valid gift, either inter vivos or causa mortis, the donee must have an immediate right to the dominion of the chattel, in the latter case defeasible on the recovery of the donor.

Hall v. Howard, Rice, L. 310, 38 Am. Dec. 115 (1839).

So in Maine (Hatch v. Atkinson, 56 Me. 324, 96 Am. Dec. 464 (1868)), and Massachusetts (Morse v. Meaton, 152 Mass. 5 (1890); McWiltie v. Van Vacter, 35 Miss. 428, 72 Am. Dec. 127 (1858)).

Actual delivery is necessary, and if it will not complete a gift inter vivos it will not create a gift causa mortis.

3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1149, note 3.

Delivery must be sufficient to pass title.

Gilmore v. Whitesides, Dud. Eq. 14, 81 Am. Dec. 563; M'Dowell v. Murdock, 1 Nott & M'C. 287, 9 Am. Dec. 684; Chevallier v. Wilson, 1 Tex. 161; Dickeschied v. Exchange Bank, 28 W. S. 602, 27 L. ed. 500.

Stock not being capable of manual delivery, the rules provided for its transmutation must prevail, as it constitutes constructive delivery.

A gift causa mortis of corporeal chattels cannot be founded on words of permission to take, or even a bestowal on condition of death, if unaccompanied by acts which go to divest the owner of control and dominion. Even a manifest intention requires actual delivery to give effect to the donor's purpose.

Schouler, Pers. Prop. ed. 1876, p. 156.

Possession, to render a gift valid, must be of such a character as to indicate an abandonment of dominion by the former owner, and its acquisition by the possessor.

The donor is presumed to have intended the legitimate consequences of his act, i. e., to retain dominion and control of the stock. The law always in such case presumes knowledge of its requirements by both donor and donee.

On the contrary, the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Basket v. Hassell, 107 U. S. 602, 27 L. ed. 500, defines a gift causa mortis as dependent upon conditions subsequent.

Whatever view may be taken of the subject, the facts in evidence constitute a valid gift causa mortis of the bank stock in question. All of the elements essential to such a gift are shown by the evidence to have been present in this case.

Whether the circumstances of expected death are sufficient is mainly a question of fact.

Mr. B. P. Carpenter also for respondents.

Hunt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

As is often, perhaps generally, the case in suits where property is claimed as a donatio causa mortis, the court is not seriously embarrassed by conflicts in the testimony. When the idea pervades the mind that death is certainly close at hand, and that it is a fitting time to act in relation to property affairs, with a view to their disposition in case of death, a reflecting sense of the occasion whereon they may act bids men seek the unobtrusive confidence and privacy of close friendships, trusted counsel, or strong ties of consanguinity. It therefore happens that our duty in judicially considering this case is not made so difficult by deciding which of various accounts of the transaction is true, as to correctly weigh what was said, and then to ascertain what are the correct legal principles to control, and apply them to the facts as they stand, without material contradiction or dispute. Now (1) what was the intention of Judge Davis? What is the evidence in point of fact? How strong is it, and of what weight? And (2) to what legal results must that evidence lead us?

Here was a rich old man, who felt that he and his wealth must soon be parted. With nearly seventy years of busy life behind him, his time to lay down its cares had come. Ill health and disease were in him, and he knew it. Premonitions of death, well-founded apprehensions that he was too old to recover, bade him adjust his business. With no family ties to make his life less within himself, reticent of speech concerning his own affairs, this old millionaire evinced but one genuine attachment in the ebb of his life. To his namesake and his nephew his heart went out in quiet, undemonstrative solicitude, as it did to no one else on earth. Business confidence, accompanied, no doubt, by a disposition, natural to one in Judge Davis's situation, yearning for some one in whom his affections might center, prompted him to select Andy, of all others, to uphold his name, and perpetuate the particular pride of his business career,—the First National Bank of Butte. "Andy will have the bank some day. Thus it will remain in the Davis family. Thus it will remain under Davis's management. I will let it form no part of my estate. Bring me my box, and let one trusted friend witness my contemplated act." There we observe method. There we find unreserved indications of a fixed plan to give the bank to Andy, and mark intelligent preparations to execute the plan. There, too, was the fast-declining health, and the expectation of death soon to come from disease already upon him. Alone in his bedroom with his nephew and friend, the mind of the decedent still bent on the plan already instituted. First, the exact verification of the number of certificates of shares. Then, without delay, with his own hand, a tradition of the certificates to his nephew. "I have always intended that for you and now I will do it." There was the act which proved the sincerity of the intention to give. There was the execution of the plan in view when the box was ordered brought down. There was the proof that the bank was not intended to be part of the estate, and there, withal, was the hovering apprehension of death moving the donor to execute his plan without delay. Andy took the stock and put it in his pocket in his uncle's presence. There was an acceptance of the gift. The scene, at night; the delivery itself, upon the eve of departure to fight against the inevitable; the words; the enfeebled health and age of Judge Davis; the magnitude of the gift,—all naturally suggested to his two listeners that he anticipated death very soon. Straightway his nephew and friend, in a spirit of hopefulness and sympathy incident to such solemn occasions, told him they did not think him so ill. "The train may jump the track and kill me. . . . If I don't come back, or anything happens, I want you to have that. . . . I am an old man, and there is no telling. . . . I don't think I can get over this disease. I can't stand it. . . . I can't expect it. . . . I only hope it will be so, but I don't think it."

There were the serious words of a very sick man, who believed that death was close at hand. The last expressions were born of that hope which is in the mind of nearly every man until the last vital spark is extinguished. Then the departure for Tacoma. In that act we find an additional reason for the previous conduct of the donor. He was going away with, at most, a faint hope of recovery, and realized that he might never see Andy again. The opportunity was ripe for the execution of his long-announced plan. "Now, take it." He believed the bank was severed from any estate he might leave. Andy had the bank, he thought; and it would forever remain in the Davis name, and in the Davis management. The human object of his affection had been considered in the manner he had said he would regard him. All other material affairs might rest upon the possibility of future action. So far as Judge Davis was concerned, the purpose towards which his thoughts were directed was accomplished. He believed on that night that his plan was consummated.

The appellant would break the force of all these facts and circumstances by arguing that the testimony discloses an intention on the part of the decedent, when he died, to give Andy the bank stock. He urges that decedent knew the by-laws of the bank and the national banking laws, which said that no transfer of stock could be made, except by the assignment thereof and transfer upon the books, and that, if he intended to divest himself of his title, he would have used the pen and ink so close at hand. But the by-laws did not require any indorsement or assignment or power of attorney, in writing or otherwise, upon the certificates of the stock, or elsewhere, to transfer them, but only an assignment or transfer on the transfer book of the bank. There was no provision that even this assignment or transfer must be made by the stockholder or his attorney. The certificates stated on their face that the stock was transferable only by the holder or his attorney on the books of the bank on the surrender of the certificates. There was no assignment or power of attorney on the back of the certificates given to Andy. The by-laws required no blank for such a purpose. To make the transfer on the books of the bank would have required the presence of the transfer books and a surrender of the certificates; but the books were not at hand. The mind of the donor was upon one essential feature, as alone indispensable to his purpose,—the actual surrender of the certificates themselves. Thus would he part with the representatives of his ownership. This, he thought, was the all and only important act of his intended gift. And this he did.

Next, as to the words spoken in the decedent's room. The appellant would do away with our view by quoting the testimony of Talbott, given on a former hearing. We agree with the learned counsel for the appellant that the statements of Talbott on the former hearing ought to be considered with those given upon the trial of this suit; but in considering them we bear in mind that there is no contention or insinuation by the appellant that Talbott has testified falsely. The lower court must have believed that, in his testimony, he tried to hold hard to the truth; and we shall treat his several statements as complementary of one another. The salient points are conspicuously and uniformly brought out,—namely, the actual and perilous sickness of Judge Davis, and the actual and manual delivery of the certificates to Andy by way of gift. The assurances were then made by Talbott and Andy to Judge Davis that he was not so ill as he thought himself. Thereupon Judge Davis, not wishing to dwell upon so painful a subject as death, and to parry further reference to his physical condition, expressed the possibility of being killed in a railroad accident, and added, "If I don't come back, or anything happens to me I want you to have that." Then followed the further statements by Judge Davis to the effect that he could not expect to recover from his disease. This must have been the exact situation at the interview, for Talbott expressly says the way that Judge Davis came to make the remark about the train jumping the track and killing him was because he and Andy tried to "brace him up, make him think he was not so bad off, you know," and after that remark Judge Davis said the train might jump the track. This statement of Talbott's, that the remarks of Judge Davis were not made until after the tradition of the certificates themselves, is of importance, and greatly strengthens our opinion that there were no qualifications to the gift, other than those inherent in all gifts causa mortis, and that the donor intended none other to be attached. It must never be forgotten that, just before the judge made any remarks, he had delivered the certificates, without any words of qualification, and this act properly aids us in interpreting the meaning of the donor in his subsequent words. Thornton, Gifts, p. 122. The stock certificates had been delivered. The intention of Judge Davis was executed. If Andy and Talbott had prepared to leave the room at once, would Judge Davis have said anything more about the gift? We think not. Or if, remaining, they had made no reference whatsoever, after the tradition, to his physical condition, is it not reasonable to say that no other word would have been spoken on the subject of the gift by the donor himself? We think so. The very fact that the statements were not called out except by way of response to the remarks of Andy and Talbott, in the light of what Judge Davis had done before, makes them but explanations of the reason why the donor had given the certificates to his nephew at that particular time. This construction of the remarks of Judge Davis, after the certificates had been delivered, is not only consistent with the prior acts and statements of the donor at the moment of the delivery and gift itself, but is in strict accord with his intention, as manifested by repeated prior declarations to friends. But, if we are in error in that reasoning, let us follow the theory of appellant's counsel, and consider all the acts and the conversation together, as forming essential and inseparable parts of the acts of delivery. To proceed, then: Suppose the donor had said, at the time he handed the certificates over, "I always intended that for you. I want you to take it," and then added, "If I don't come back I want you to have that. I am an old man and cannot expect to recover,"—then appellant's argument that the condition of death while away at Tacoma was attached to the gift would have been of force, and a return might, ipso facto, have operated as a revocation of the gift. We here remark that we attach no significance to any fear on the decedent's part of being killed by a railroad accident. That idea is, in our judgment, incompatible with the evidence of every act and word and thought of the donor at the time of the delivery of the certificates. Death from his illness was the only current of his thoughts.

But the foregoing line of reasoning cannot be pursued without departure from appellant's theory, because it eliminates another and material part of the statement of the decedent, namely, the alternative condition, "or if anything happens, I want you to have that." Let us, therefore, take up this further qualification, and, by adding it on, we have these words: "I have always intended that for you, and I want you to take it. If I do not come back, or anything happens, I want you to have that. I am an old man, and cannot expect to recover." Considered with the act of delivery of the certificates, we find that the gift was not limited to the event of death on his trip, only, but comprehended death at any time in the near future.

Now, if we put the several whole sentences together, and connect them exactly with the delivery, we have this condition of testimony:

Judge Davis: "I have always intended that for you, now take it." The certificates are handed over.

Talbott: "You are not so bad off as you think."

Judge Davis: "I don't know whether I will ever come back or not. There may be an accident on the railroad. If I don't come back, or anything happens, I want you to have that. I am an old man, and there is no telling. I can't stand what I used to.

I don't think I can get over this disease. I can't stand it. I am too old. I can't expect it."

Talbott: "We think you will come back, and that you will live ten or fifteen years."

There we have one portion of the sentence, "If I don't come back, or anything happens," imposing conditions of death before a return from Tacoma, and the succeeding and last portion expressly without conditions whatsoever pertaining to the particular journey about to be begun. Here the argument of appellant must be that the qualification or limitation placed upon the first portion of the sentence governs the latter as well. If this be correct, we render the latter portion of the sentence, namely, the words, "or if anything happens I want you to have that," entirely superfluous and meaningless. They are ignored. But, if they were meaningless, why did the donor express them? Surely, if everything said is part of the gift, no construction can be accurate which would omit to give some effect to these latter words, as well as to all others. The only way to do so is to interpret the whole sentence by the light of all else done and said, before and afterwards. Doing this, the donor said: "Take this stock. I have always intended to give it to you, and now I will do it. I believe I am a dying man. I have but little hope of recovery. If I do not live to come back, or if I die soon, then this stock is absolutely yours."

We cannot say by which process of reasoning the district court was moved to adopt its primary conclusion that Judge Davis intended a gift causa mortis, at the interview on the night before his departure for Tacoma. The first view, in our opinion, is correct, and we adopt it; but both analysis of all that was said and done lead to the same logical deduction. Each is built upon the firm and unshaken evidential foundation of an oft-repeated intent of the donor to give the bank, some day, to Andy, and upon that other and most convincing act, the manual delivery of the certificates by Judge Davis while in a condition of health which clearly evinced his apprehension of speedy death. We cannot find, in our consideration of the case up to this point, substantial support for the argument that, by any words or acts of the donor, prior to his departure for Tacoma, he intended the gift to be dependent only upon his failure to return to Butte; for, no matter what refinements may be given to the language of the donor, no force of speech at this time can overcome the fact that the donor, sagacious and close man that he was, parted with the certificates. Probably, too, Talbott's language was not, at the first hearing (which was not a trial of the ownership of the stock), precise in its details of the occurrence, for he says that he does not see any substantial difference between what he said at that time and upon the trial of this case. But, assuming that what he said on each trial was an exact statement, we certainly cannot now say that the district court was not warranted in its conclusion that the donor intended to give the stock to the donee at the time of the delivery thereof. The finding, therefore, to that effect, must be sustained, unless subsequent events, by themselves or in connection with preceding affairs, overthrow the finding, or the law will not permit it to stand.

The appellant opens his exhaustive argument with references to the early English text-writers and their definitions of gifts causa mortis. We will therefore go further back than he does, and briefly examine the law, to determine whether his primary inferences are sound. If we revert to the Institutes of Justinian, published A. D. 529 (Imperatoris Justiniani Institutiones, by J. B. Moyle), we find the first definition of the essential conditions of a donatio mortis causa, as a primary source of the meaning adopted in the common-law reports of England, and in the decisions of many of our own most learned courts. Omitting the Latin text, and accepting the translation of Professor Hammond (Sandars' Justinian, p. 218), we find: "A donation mortis causa is that which is made to meet the case of death, as when anything is given upon condition that, if any fatal accident befalls the donor, the person to whom it is given shall have it as his own; but, if the donor should survive, or if he should repent of having made the gift, or if the person to whom it has been given should die before the donor, then the donor shall receive back the thing given. These donations mortis causa are now placed exactly on the footing of legacies. It was much doubted by the jurists whether they ought to be considered as a gift or as a legacy, partaking as they did, in some respects, of the nature of both; and some were of opinion that they belonged to the one head, and others that they belonged to the other. We have decided, by a constitution, that they shall be in almost every respect reckoned among legacies, and shall be made in accordance with the forms our Constitution provides. In short, it is a donation mortis causa when the donor wishes that the thing given should belong to himself rather than to the person to whom he gives it, and to that person rather than to his own heir." The original text adds a line illustrating gifts causa mortis by reference to the Odyssey of Homer, where Telemachus makes presents to Pireus if he be killed. Sandars then proceeds to elaborate the text as follows: "There are two essential conditions of a donatio mortis causa: It must be made with a view of meeting the case of death; it must be made to take effect only if death occurs, and so as to be revocable at any time previous, and to fail if the recipient died before the giver. The donor might, however, at his pleasure, alter the character of the gift, making it irrevocable, but it was always dependent on the recipient outliving the donor. . . . It might be made conditional upon death in two ways. The donor might say, 'I hand you over my horse, but the gift is only to be complete if I die in this enterprise.' Or he might say, 'I give you my horse. If I survive this enterprise you are to give it back to me.' In the latter method, the delivery of the thing is made at once, subject to a conditional redelivery. In the former the delivery is made conditional. . . . If the gift was made in the first of the two ways above mentioned, although there was delivery, yet the thing was only acquired on the death of the donor, and, the donor not having ceased to be dominus, could therefore, if he revoked the gift, bring a real action to reclaim the thing handed over. If the gift was made in the second way, the whole property passed at once by the tradition to the recipient; and as, in the older and stricter law, the dominium passed absolutely when it passed at all, the property in the thing could not revert to the donor merely by the condition having been accomplished. He would only have a personal action against the recipient to compel him to give the value of the thing, if he did not choose to give back the thing itself. The later jurists seem, however, to consider that the dominium reverted ipso jure, and that the donor could bring a real action for the thing itself." Page 219. In these definitions it is to be observed that the distinction between conditions precedent and subsequent is not as closely drawn, as the test of whether the gift may be upheld, as by some modern authorities. Such gifts were regarded as standing "midway between legacies and gifts inter vivos. In that it consists in a present act of bounty, it differs from a legacy, which confers no right whatever on the legatee until the testator is dead, and his heir has accepted the inheritance. Here if the donee outlives the donor, the thing given never goes to the heirs at all. It differs from the latter in being absolutely perfected only by the donor's decease. The gift may be made so conditional on that event that the property in the gift does not pass to the donee until its occurrence. In the meanwhile he has only its use and enjoyment. Or the property may pass at once, subject to the understanding that it is to revert to the donor in case of his proving the better life." Moyle's Comments on Justinian's Definitions, p. 222, note 1.

Inasmuch as the appellant founds his discussion of the description and nature of donationes causa mortis upon Swinburne, who wrote in the latter part of the sixteenth century upon the Civil Law, we give that commentator's definition: "One, when the giver is not terrified with fear of any present peril but moved with a general consideration of man's mortality, giveth anything. Another, when the giver being moved with imminent danger, doth so give, that straightways it is made his to whom it is given. The third is when any being in peril of death doth give something, but not so that it shall presently be his that received it, but in case the giver do die." Swinburne, Willa, Powell's ed. 1803. The earliest decisions, next after Swinburne's text, to which we have accessible reference, begin with Drury v. Smith, 1 P. Wms. 405, where Lord Cowper, in 1717, held that, where a testator, in his last sickness, made a gift, and the possession was transmuted to his nephew, it must be upheld, because "he might in his lifetime, after the making of his will, give away any part of his estate absolutely, and by the same reason might, notwithstanding the will, give away any part thereof conditionally, and this gift being so fully proved," was held to be a donatio mortis causa. That a delivery has always been held necessary in England is also sustained by Lawson v. Lawson, Id. 441, where a gift was made by a husband, in his last sickness, to his wife of a purse with money in it. Miller v. Miller, 3 P. Wms. 356. Just before death the testator called to his servant to reach him his pocket-book, took thereout two bank notes for £300 each, and another note for £100, being a cash note, or payable to bearer, all of which notes he ordered his servant to deliver to his wife, who was present. Afterwards the testator, by word of mouth, gave her his coach and horses. The gift of the £600 notes was sustained upon the ground that the party was in his last sickness, and that they were delivered. The next case, and what may be termed a leading one in England, was Lord Hardwicke's opinion, in 1752, in Ward v. Turner, 2 Ves. Sr. 431. It cited the last two cases just above referred to, sustaining the doctrine that there must be an actual delivery. The deductions from the discussion in that case are well summed up by an English writer (Shearwood) in an Elementary Outline of the Principles of Equity. He says that Lord Hardwicke decided that a gift of this description, in order to be valid, must be made: (1) In such a state of illness or expectation of death as would warrant a supposition that the gift was made in contemplation of that event. (2) On condition that it is to become absolute only upon the event of the donor's death. It follows from this that it is a gift revocable during the donor's lifetime. (3) There must be actual delivery.

Advancing, next, to the time of Blackstone, that commentator treats this species of gift as "another deathbed disposition of property," and thus defines it: "And that is, when a person, in his last sickness, apprehending his dissolution near, delivers or causes to be delivered to another the possession of any personal goods, under which have been included bonds and bills drawn by the deceased upon his banker, to keep in case of his decease. This gift, if the donor dies, needs not the assent of his executor; yet it shall not prevail against creditors, and is accompanied with this implied trust, that, if the donor lives, the property thereof shall revert to himself, being only given in contemplation of death, or causa mortis. This method of donation might have subsisted in a state of nature, being always accompanied with delivery of actual possession, and so far differs from a testamentary disposition; but seems to have been handed to us from the civil lawyers, who themselves borrowed it from the Greeks." Ham. Bl. Com. p. 771. In Tate v. Hilbert, 2 Ves. Jr. 111, Lord Loughborough, in 1793, discussed the delivery essential to sustain a donatio mortis causa, and disapproves of the definitions of Swinburne heretofore referred to. He treats them as only references to different texts of the civil law, and says that Swinburne, in his definitions, "is coupling the description of a legacy with a very short text of the civil law, and there is a perplexity in it." He further says that the first two definitions, of Swinburne the second of which the appellant in this case relies upon, are clearly mere donations. He then discusses the books of Justinian, and says that Swinburne ought to have looked a little further, and he would have found a history by Justinian of the contests upon the subject of gifts. The exact text from Justinian, from which Professor Hammond has worked his translation, as given above, is quoted in full by Lord Loughborough, who thus approves: "There it is clearly and correctly defined, that it had in effect the nature of a legacy, was liable to debts, and that it was only a gift upon survivorship; and the danger of suffering these gifts to be taken loosely occasioned, at the same time with the passage I have read, an ordinance by the Emperor, that it should be in writing, with five witnesses." He then refers to Ward v. Turner, and concurs with the reasoning that there must be some delivery of the property. We cite this case, having had access to the same and studied it with much care, to demonstrate that that portion of Swinburne's definition upon which the appellant relies has not met with approval by the most learned judges in England since Swinburne wrote. Powell in his comments and annotations to Swinburne's text also says: "The two first instances . . . are simple gifts, the latter only applies to the donatio causa mortis and is better described or defined in lege 27, and in Justin. Inst. title 7, De donationibus." See note to Powell's Swinburne, Wills. p. 54, pt. 1. Roper on Legacies approves of the criticisms of Swinburne by Loughborough in Tate v. Hilbert, and unequivocally states in his text that "it appears, upon consideration of the before-mentioned definitions (Swinburne's), that the third alone is the proper donatio mortis causa; the other two being nothing else than pure irrevocable gifts inter vivos." 1 Roper, Legacies, chap. 1. Other English writers have followed Justinian's definition, with the qualification, recognized by Lord Hardwicke in Ward v. Turner, that a delivery was essential. Spence on Equitable Jurisdiction, in 1846, called a donatio causa mortis a disposition of property "when a person in his sickness, apprehending his dissolution near, delivers or causes to be delivered, any personal goods or chattels to another, or puts the physical means of dominion over them into his power, to keep them for himself or for some one else, in case of the donor's decease. . . . In the event of the donor recovering, the property reverts to him. If the donor die, the property belongs to the donee without the assent of the executor, though not as against creditors." 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. p. 196. Wms. Exrs. (page 887, chap. 2, § 4) briefly summarizes the attributes of a donatio mortis causa as follows: "First, the gift must be with a view to the donor's death; second, it must be conditioned to take effect only on the death of the donor by his existing disorder; third, there must be a delivery of the subject of the donation."

In America, commentators, in their definitions, have followed in the line of the mother country. Kent says that such gifts are conditional, like legacies, and it is essential to them that the donor make them in his last illness, or in contemplation and in expectation of death, and that there must be a delivery. A gift inter vivos was irrevocable; but a gift causa mortis was conditional and revocable. 2 Kent, Com. p. 444. Judge Story says such a gift is properly "a gift of personal property, by a party who is in peril of death, upon condition that it shall presently belong to the donee in case the donor shall die, but not otherwise. To give it effect there must be a delivery of it by the donor, and it is subject to be defeated by his subsequent personal revocation, or by his recovery or escape from the impending peril of death. If no event happens which revokes it, the title of the donee is deemed to be directly derived from the donor in his lifetime, and therefore in no sense is it a testamentary act." Story, Eq. Jur. § 606. The supreme court of Connecticut, many years ago, defined these gifts as follows: "That species of donation is derived wholly from the civil law, and is where a person, in his last sickness, apprehending his dissolution near, delivers to another personal property, under which have been included bonds payable to the donor and bank bills, to keep in case of the donor's death. Three requisites are necessary to constitute a gift of this sort.

(1) It must be made by the donor, in contemplation of the conceived approach of death. (2) It must be given to take effect only in case the donor dies. (3) And there must be a delivery of the subject of the donation. It is essential that the condition of its not passing while the donor lives be included otherwise it will be a donation of another kind, namely, a donatio inter vivos. It differs from the latter in several respects, in which it resembles a legacy. It is ambulatory, incomplete, and revocable during the donor's life. The revocation may be effected, either by the recovery of the donor from his disorder, or by taking back the possession of the property. It can be made to the wife of the donor. On the other hand, it differs from a legacy in several particulars. The claim need not be proved in a court of probate. The title of the donee becomes, by relation, complete and absolute from the time of the delivery. No consent or other act, on the part of the executor or administrator, is necessary to perfect the title of the donee. It is a claim against the executor; a legacy is a claim from the executor." Raymond v. Sellick, 10 Conn. 484. Without reviewing in detail the definitions of many more American writers, we find that the general requirements, as laid down by Williams on Executors, succinctly state the law. Of modern American commentators, certainly none are more perspicuous or intelligible in their definitions than Pomeroy, who sums up the discussion in the following words: "A gift absolute in form made by the donor in anticipation of his speedy death, and intended to take effect and operate as a transfer of the title upon, and only upon, the happening of the donor's death. Between the time when the gift is made and the article donated is delivered, and the time when the donor dies, the donation is wholly inchoate and conditional; the property remains in the donor awaiting the time of his death and passes to the donee when the death, in anticipation of which the gift was made, happens, unless the donation has in the meantime been revoked by the donor; the donee thus becomes a trustee for the donor with respect to the article delivered into his possession until the gift is made perfect by the donor's death. The gift must be absolute, with the exception of the condition, inherent in its nature, depending upon the donor's death, as above described, and a delivery of the article donated is a necessary element; but it is subject to revocation by the act of the donor prior to death, and is completely revoked by the donor's recovery from the sickness or escape from the danger in view of which it was made." 8 Pom. Eq. Jur. 2d ed. § 1146. See also 2 Beach, Mod. Eq. Jur. § 1061; Grymes v. Hone, 49 N. Y. 21, 10 Am. Rep. 313; Michener v. Dale, 23 Pa. 63; Story, Eq. Jur. pp. 599, 604; 2 Schouler, Pers. Prop. §§ 135, 188; Thornton, Gifts, § 21; Crosswell, Exrs. & Admsrs. § 620.

In Basket v. Hassell, 107 U. S. 602, 27 L. ed. 500, relied upon by the appellant, it was said "that a donatio causa mortis must be completely executed, precisely as required in the case of gifts inter vivos, subject to be divested by the happening of any of the conditions subsequent,—that is, upon actual revocation by the donor, or by the donor's surviving the apprehended peril, or outliving the donee," etc. "On the other hand, if the gift does not take effect as an executed and complete transfer to the donee of possession and title, either legal or equitable, during the life of the donor, it is a testamentary disposition," etc.

Reverting to the appellant's theory of the evidence in this case, if this definition of Justice Matthews was meant to exactly conform with Swinburne's second definition and rejects all gifts where a donor with intent to make a gift causa mortis, delivers the property, and surrenders the possession and control of the subject-matter of the gift, with a statement, such as the donor used in this case, to the effect that, if he died, he wanted the donee to have the property delivered, then there has been a contraction of the generally accepted common-law rule that a gift causa mortis could be made by present delivery, yet conditioned upon the death of the donor. But it was not so decided upon the facts of that case, and we doubt whether the definition quoted conflicts with Pomeroy's, when the words used are measured by their strict applicability to the whole subject, and its nature, under consideration, and the inherent qualifications inseparably attached to all gifts causa mortis. We believe we are accurate in this last comment upon the opinion of Justice Matthews. We have examined the particular case upon which the reasoning of that opinion is laid,—a decision of the supreme court of Tennessee, made in 1867. Gass v. Simpson, 4 Coldw. 288. The Tennessee case was this: The decedent was obliged to leave Tennessee to avoid the operations of the Rebel conscription laws, and went to Kentucky, where he died, at Louisville, in 1863. Before leaving Tennessee, in 1862, he placed in the hands of Mary Simpson some gold and paper money, together with notes, receipts, etc., and stated to her at the time, "If he never returned, he wanted it all to be given to her son, George M. Simpson," who was at that time a minor; and on the day he left he stated to others that, if he never returned he wanted "little George" to have what he had left in respondent's hands. The defendants contended that the facts constituted a valid donatio causa mortis of all the effects and money. The court, by Justice Hawkins, after taking up the definition of Swinburne, speaks of the contest which arose at an early day as to the real nature of gifts causa mortis, and expressly recognized that a gift causa mortis is a conditional gift, dependent upon the contingency of expected death, which need not be expressed or specified by the donor; and, after applying this principle to the facts in the case, it was held that a valid donation causa mortis existed in favor of George Simpson. A part of this discussion of the supreme court of Tennessee is quoted verbatim by Justice Matthews as the foundation for his subsequent deductions. After taking up another part of the opinion, to the effect that delivery was essential, he says that "a view of the entire passage leaves no room to doubt its meaning, that a donatio mortis causa must be completely executed, precisely as required in the case of gifts inter vivos, subject to be divested by the happening of any of the conditions subsequent,—that is, upon actual revocation by the donor, or by the donor's surviving the apprehended peril or outliving the donee, or by the occurrence of a deficiency of assets necessary to pay the debts of the deceased donor. These conditions are the only qualifications that distinguish gifts mortis causa and inter vivos. On the other hand, if the gift does not take effect as an executed and complete transfer to the donee of possession and title, either legal or equitable, during the life of the donor, it is a testamentary disposition, good only if made and proved as a will." A close scrutiny of Justice Matthews' deductions would seem, therefore, to demonstrate that he did not mean to disaffirm the general doctrine as it was enunciated by the supreme court of Tennessee. Indeed, he expressly affirms their meaning. But, if the appellant is correct, in this case, in his interpretation of the definition of Justice Matthews, that distinguished jurist has laid down a rule which, if it had been applied to the very case whence it was deduced, could not have coincided with the principles announced therein or with the conclusion reached by the Tennessee court. We therefore cannot believe that the United States Supreme Court intended to say that a gift made in apprehension of death, and where the donor delivered the property to the donee with an expression to the effect that the property was to belong to the donee if he (the donor) should die, could not be sustained. The leading English cases and the civil law are not very exhaustively examined, in the opinion of Justice Matthews. He seems to have founded his opinion as to what delivery would sustain the gift largely upon the summarized law of the Tennessee case; but, by his elaboration of the doctrine of the Tennessee case, although he affirmed the law thereof, nevertheless, he has apparently laid down a doctrine often invoked and interpreted to defeat gifts causa mortis, where exactly such conditions were expressed by the donor as the appellant contends were imposed by Judge Davis in this case, and which would appear, under the weight of authority, including the Tennessee decision, to but merely express the condition which is annexed by law to every donation causa mortis. For, no matter whether the gift is made upon death or nonrevocation as a condition precedent or subsequent, upon either condition an absolute and indefeasible title comes to the donee only upon the donor's death. It must be absolute in form by the donor while living. It cannot be absolute in fact until his death. The supreme court of Arkansas, in Hatcher v. Buford (1895) 60 Ark. 169, 27 L. R. A. 507, referred to Basket v. Hassell upon this point, and declined to follow the usually accepted interpretation of it. Its apparent doctrine is also ably discussed in Travis on Sales, where the author speaks of the "mistake" made by the supreme court. Travis, Sales, pp. 69 et seq.

But, however interesting it might be to enter upon a comparison of the various decisions, to determine whether the appellant's interpretation of Basket v. Hassell is correct or not upon the question of delivery, and to consider the divergencies of opinion, we refrain from so doing, because, under our view of the facts of this case, the gift herein was delivered within the rule of the letter of the definition of that case as appellant would apply it. The facts of the case at bar so clearly demonstrate that the delivery of the certificates was made by Judge Davis in contemplation of speedy death from his disease, that it is unnecessary to dwell on that feature of the case. The prolonged and dangerous illness of the donor, his age, and the circumstances of the delivery fully show the expectation of Judge Davis to die shortly from the ailment from which he was then suffering. His trip to Puget sound was but a desperate fight for life, or to prolong the life which he felt he must soon lose. The argument that he apprehended death from a railway accident, as said before, is not well founded, in our judgment. But, if it were it could not avail appellant, because the decedent also apprehended death from his disease, and, inasmuch as he failed in health and died soon of such apprehended disease, which was the particular cause of death with especial reference to which the delivery was made, it matters not that he may also have feared death from other and insufficient causes. "The rule is that the donor must not recover from the disease from which he then apprehended death. If he recovers, the gift is void; if he does not recover, and the gift is not revoked, it becomes effectual." Ridden v. Thrall, 125 N. Y. 572, 11 L. R. A. 684; Gourley v. Linsenbigler, 51 Pa. 345;

Linsendigler v. Gourley, 56 Pa. 166, 94 Am. Dec. 51; Craig v. Kittredge, 46 N. H. 57; Thornton, Gifts, §§ 23 et seq.; Williams v. Guile, 117 N. Y. 343, 6 L. R. A. 366.

Next, as to the important question of the effect of the delivery of the certificates of stock. We start with a delivery, and acceptance of the certificates at the time of the delivery, and the intention on Judge Davis's part to make a complete gift. But we have this question: The subject of the gift was bank stock, shares in a national bank, or the certificates thereof, without indorsement or assignment in writing, and without transfer on the books of the company. Can national bank stock be so transferred, and thus be made the subject of a valid gift causa mortis? The appellant asks a negative reply, and, in an argument displaying great research and learning, bases his request upon the common law and cases construed by him to be within the reasoning of the English adjudications. And here, again, is a divergence of opinion between learned writers. Some years back the common law of England, so far as the same was applicable and of a general nature, and not in conflict with special enactments of the territory, was declared to be the law, and was to be considered of full force. But to determine what the common law is, are we to disregard the expositions by judicial authorities of our own country upon the common law? Clearly not. "No one," said Justice McLean, in Wheaton v. Peters, 33 U. S. 8 Pet. 659, 8 L. ed. 1080, "will contend, that the common law, as it existed in England, has ever been in force, in all its provisions, in any state in this Union. It was adopted, so far only as its principles were suited to the condition of the colonies; and from this circumstance we see, what is common law in one state, is not so considered in another. The judicial decisions, the usages and customs of the respective states, must determine how far the common law has been introduced and sanctioned in each."

Upon this question we quote from Chief Justice Shaw in Com. v. York, 9 Met. 93, 43 Am. Dec. 373, who thus wrote of the adoption of the rules and principles of the common law of England in their applicability to our conditions: "As this is an unwritten law, we must seek for the evidence of it in judicial records, precedents, and decisions, and those digests, treatises, and commentaries, of learned and experienced men, which have acquired respect and confidence by long usage and general consent. If we consult English decisions made since the Revolution, it is not because they have any binding force as rules, but because they are expositions of the rules and principles of the common law, by men of great experience and judgment in the knowledge and application of the same laws which we are seeking to expound. And if we read the digests and treatises of reputable authors, published since we ceased to be English subjects, it is because they contain the authentic records of the precedents and judicial proceedings, which furnish the evidence of the common law. In like manner, the decisions of courts of other states, having the same common origin, and deriving their laws from the same common source, are valuable and useful in enabling us the more clearly to understand, and the more fitly to apply the rules and principles of our own authoritative code of laws." The appellant relies at once upon Lord Hardwicke's opinion in Ward v. Turner. Although some cases and writers do not regard that case as positively deciding that choses in action, such as stocks, cannot be effectually delivered as a gift causa mortis without transfer of the legal property, yet it is generally cited to that holding. The property there delivered was receipts for South Sea annuities. We quote, in part, from the chancellor's opinion: "Nor does it appear to me, by proof, that possession of these three receipts continued with Mosely from the time they were given, in February, to the time of Fly's death; for there is a witness who speaks, that, in some short time before his death, Fly showed him these receipts, and said he intended them for his uncle Mosely. Therefore, I am of opinion, it would be most dangerous to allow this donation mortis causa, from parol proof of delivery of such receipts, which are not regarded or taken care of after acceptance; and if these annuities are called choses in action, there is less reason to allow of it in this case than in any other chose in action, because stocks and annuities are capable of a transfer of the legal property by act of Parliament, which might be done easily; and if the intestate had such an aversion to make a will as supposed, he might have transferred to Mosely; consequently, this is merely legatory, and amounts to a nuncupative will, and contrary to the statute of frauds, and will introduce a greater breach on that law than was ever yet made; for if you take away the necessity of delivery of the thing given, it remains merely nuncupative." Ward v. Turner, 1 White & T. Lead. Cas. in Eq. 1217.

After the decision of Ward v. Turner, throughout the various cases we find distinctions as to the extent to which Lord Hardwicke meant to go concerning the delivery of choses in action. There is a review of the history of these decisions in 1 Roper on Legacies, pp. 10, 11, et seq. But, in 1827, Lord Eldon, under whose judgments have been recognized the expansion of those principles of equity which were matured in the time of Lord Hardwicke, cleared up much of the doubt which had existed before his time, and advanced to the point of construction upon which has been, to a great degree, founded the further expansions of our American courts. Duffield v. Elwes, 1 Sim. & Stu. 243, was an action where the defendant was possessed of a bond for a certain sum of money, and had also a mortgage, created by a deed of even date with the bond, to secure the sum mentioned in the bond, and he had another mortgage for a large sum. The second mortgage was dated November 3, 1820. It recited that £30,000 had been advanced upon mortgage by Sir Sandys to the prior mortgagees, and further secured by a bond, and a judgment recovered, and that the mortgagees had called in the money. It was witnessed, in consideration of the £30,000 advanced by Elwes to Sandys to pay off the mortgage, that the money and judgment were assigned, and certain premises were also conveyed by mortgage from Sandys to Elwes, to secure the £30,000. Elwes, when on his deathbed, and unable to write, declared that he gave the bond and mortgage, and the money secured by them, to his daughter, Mrs. Duffield. At the desire of Elwes they were delivered into the hands of Mrs. Duffield. The vice chancellor decided that the gift was not complete, because the delivery was not complete as a gift inter vivos. But, in the House of Lords, Lord Eldon, after citing the authorities, observed: "Lord Hardwicke is clearly of opinion that the delivery of a bond as a specialty would do; and if, then, the debt is well given by the delivery of the bond, the next question is, What are we to do with the other securities which are, or not, delivered over? In the present case the bond, the assignment, the covenant, and all the deeds are delivered over in such a manner that the representatives of the donor could not get at them; and the question is, whether, considering the difference between an absolute estate in land and a mortgage, the same principle does not apply in the case of a mortgage as in the case of a bond. Upon the whole, then, I am of opinion, that the delivery of these securities is a good donatio mortis causa, as raising a trust by operation of law, and that, as so raising a trust by operation of law, they are not within the provisions of the statute of frauds." Roper, Legacies, p. 19.

This celebrated case of Duffield v. Elwes is regarded as the turning point in the English law of property susceptible of delivery, and Lord Hardwicke's distinction between "the delivery of property and the delivery of its evidence has assuredly lost its point." 2 Schouler, Pers. Prop. p. 115. Hewitt v. Kaye (1868) L. R. 6 Eq. 198, recognizes the principle that "when a man on his deathbed gives to another an instrument, such as a bond or promissory note, or an I. O. U., he gives a chose in action and the delivery of the instrument confers upon the donee all the rights to the chose in action arising out of the instrument." The court approved of the doctrine laid down in Amis v. Witt, 33 Beav. 619.

The last English case that we have been able to find is Robson v. Hamilton [1891] 2 Ch. 559. Joseph Robson bequeathed and gave to his nephew Joseph Robson his old mahogany desk, "with the contents thereof," and made other dispositions of his other property. The desk was found to contain notes, bankers' deposit receipts, and undorsed checks to the order of the testator. The court sustained the gift of the desk with its contents, except the key to a tin box, and adverted upon the disadvantage to men in making bequests of that kind, and then said: "But in this case, as I have said, I think that the words the testator has used are strong enough, and, properly construed, ought to be held to include all the choses in action. The choses in action, if any distinction is to be taken, are such as could have been given by the testator by mere delivery as a donatio mortis causa. In that case the indorsement of the executors would be required and in this case the indorsement of the executors will also be required. This last expression from the court of appeals of England is evidence of the development of the law in that country upon the subject of gifts causa mortis. It is only cited as an instance of the growth of the doctrine permitting gifts of choses in action. Chancellor Kent, about the same time that Lord Eldon decided Duffield v. Elwes, wrote that the distinction made by Lord Hardwicke between bonds and bills of exchange, promissory notes, and other choses in action, "seems now to be exploded in this country, and they are all considered proper subjects of a valid donatio causa mortis as well as inter vivos." 2 Kent, Com. 448. One of the earliest explosions was in Wells v. Tucker, 3 Binn. 366, when, in 1811, it was decided that where a bond was delivered by the donor in his last illness to his wife, for the use of a third person, it was a good donatio causa mortis. See also 2 Barbour, Rights of Persons & Property, p. 632. Shaw, Ch. J., followed the doctrine of Kent in Parish v. Stone, 14 Pick. 198, 25 Am. Dec. 378, and Sessions v. Moseley, 4 Cush. 87. The principle has also been recognized by English text-writers. Williams on Executors says bank notes may be the subject of a donatio mortis causa, because the property is transferred by the delivery; and, on the same principles, all negotiable instruments which require nothing more than delivery to pass to the donee the money secured by them may be the subjects of donations mortis causa. 1 Wms. Exrs. p. 829; Roper, Legacies, p. 18, and cases cited. Story, when he wrote in 1835, doubted the soundness of the doctrine of Ward v. Turner, to the effect that a promissory note or bill of exchange not payable to bearer, or indorsed in blank, cannot take effect as a donatio mortis causa, inasmuch as no property therein could pass by the delivery of the instrument, and boldly said that the doctrine no longer prevails, that, where a delivery will not execute a complete gift inter vivos, it cannot create a donatio mortis causa, because it would not prevent the property from vesting in the executor; and as a court of equity will not, inter vivos, compel a party to complete his gift, so it will not compel the executor to complete the gift of his testator. On the contrary, the doctrine now established by the highest authority is that courts of equity do not consider the interest as completely vested in the donee, but treat the delivery of the instrument as creating a trust for the donee to be enforced in equity." Story, Eq. Jur. 604.

It being clear now that, under the progress of administration of principles of equity, gifts causa mortis may be made of incorporeal as well as corporeal chattels, and of choses in action generally, we must examine the class of property in this case,—namely, national bank shares,—and observe whether or not they are to be treated as upon any different plane from that occupied by shares of stock generally. As will be seen by the statement of the facts, the certificates delivered to Andy were issued in the donor's name, and each certificate contained the words "transferable only by him or his attorney on the books of the bank on the surrender of this certificate." The by-laws of the bank also required a transfer on the books. The Revised Statutes of the United States (§ 5189) provide as follows: "The capital stock of each association shall be divided into shares of one hundred dollars each, and be deemed personal property, and transferred on the books of the association in such manner as may be prescribed by the by-laws or articles of association. Every person becoming a shareholder by such transfer shall in proportion to his shares, succeed to all the rights and liabilities of the prior holder of such shares." No writing having passed at all between the parties, donor and donee, and no transfer on the books having been made, we must look at the principles and authorities bearing upon the direct point involved.

It was held in Slaymaker v. Bank of Gettysburg, 10 Pa. 373, that shares of stock are, in commercial usages, regarded as choses in action, and the certificates are evidence of the title of the holder to them. Now, a chose in action is incorporeal and incapable of delivery except by symbol. We grant that it is essential to the validity of a gift that it should be executed, but, where the nature of the property given is incapable of manual delivery, a delivery of the symbol which represents it is the only way to execute the gift. Things incorporeal, says Schouler, in a learned review of gifts causa mortis, were not contemplated by the earlier English jurists at all, but when, in the commercial world, bills and notes acquired a standing before the courts, "delivery of the writing, with or without indorsement, became the rule of transfer." Equitable assignments are now thoroughly recognized in the law, and, as a consequence, gifts that would have failed long ago in England because of imperfect delivery may be now upheld by the aid of a gift of equity. 2 Schouler, Pers. Prop. §§ 72 et seq.; Thornton, Gifts, §§ 273 et seq. In Grover v. Grover (1837) 24 Pick. 261, 35 Am. Dec. 319, it was decided that a valid gift could be made inter vivos of a promissory note payable to the order of the donor, without indorsement by him or other writing. The English cases referred to heretofore are cited in the opinion of the court, and Lord Hardwicke's opinions referred to in the following language: "The leading case on this point is that of Miller v. Miller, 3 P. Wms. 856, in which it was held that the gift of a note, being a mere chose in action, could not take effect as a donation mortis causa, because no property therein could pass by delivery, and an action thereon must be sued in the name of the executor. But in Snellgrove v. Baily, 3 Atk. 214, Lord Hardwicke decided that the gift and delivery over of a bond were good as a donation mortis causa, on the ground that an equitable assignment of the bond was sufficient. It seems to be very difficult to reconcile these two cases.

The distinction suggested by Lord Hardwicke in the case of Ward v. Turner, 2 Ves. Sr. 431, in which he adheres to the decision in Snellgrove v. Baily, is technical, and, to my mind, unsatisfactory, and certainly has no application to our laws, which place bonds and other securities on the same footing. We cannot, therefore, adopt both decisions without manifest inconsistency; and we think, for the reasons already stated, that the decision in Snellgrove v. Baily is supported by the better reasons, and is more conformable to general principles and the modern decisions in respect to equitable assignments. We are therefore of the opinion that the gift of the note of hand in question is valid." In Camp's Appeal (1869) 36 Conn. 88, 4 Am. Rep. 39, it was decided that choses in action, the title to which passes by delivery, may be the subject of a gift, as well as any other species of property, and the court said: "Whatever may be said or thought of the propriety of the law, it is well settled by the modern authorities that choses in action not negotiable, and negotiable paper not indorsed, may be the subject of a gift, and that a delivery which vests in the donee the equitable title is sufficient without a complete transfer of the legal title. In this respect a title by gift is not distinguishable from a title by purchase for a valuable consideration, and, when the claims of creditors do not interfere to affect its validity, such a title will be recognized and protected in the same manner and to the same extent as a title by sale." In Tillinghast v. Wheaton, 8 R. I. 536, 5 Am. Rep. 621, the delivery of a savings bank pass book containing entries by the officers of the bank of the amounts deposited by a deceased's wife, with a parol gift of the same by her husband on his deathbed, was a good gift causa mortis of the money deposited in the bank. The court there said that in the more recent English decisions the strictness of the ancient rule was relaxed, and the gift was sustained. The courts of Kentucky (Stephenson v. King, 81 Ky. 425, 50 Am. Rep. 173) have recently followed the modern doctrine. A Mrs. Stephenson selected John King as her agent, and when she died King had in his possession a note and some county bonds, the bonds payable to bearer, and the note indorsed in blank. On the day before Mrs. Stephenson died she told her mother that she gave her property to her, and she delivered a paper to her mother, telling her that this paper was to show the property she had at Louisville, and to get her money on the paper. The paper was the letter from the agent, King, containing a statement of the property in his possession belonging to Mrs. Stephenson. The contention was in part in that case that, in order to make such a gift of a note or bond, it must be delivered by passing manually from the possession of the one to the other; but the court held that the delivery required "must be according to the nature of the thing, and usually that means according to the physical nature of the thing to be delivered. . . . Now, will it be insisted, under the more modern authorities, that an actual delivery of the chose in action to the donee will not constitute a gift? We think not." The earlier cases are reviewed in this opinion, and the gift of the note and bonds was held to be good. In Hill v. Stevenson (1873) 63 Me. 364, 18 Am. Rep. 231, a delivery to a donee of a savings bank book, containing entries of deposits to the credit of the donor, with the intent to give the donee the deposits represented by the book, was held to be a good delivery, as vesting an equitable title in the donee without assignment. See also Druke v. Heiken, 61 Cal. 346, 44 Am. Rep. 553; Westerlo v. De Witt, 36 N. Y. 340, 93 Am. Dec. 517; 3 Redf. Wills, p. 336.

Although some writers of recent date disapprove of the doctrine which sustains gifts causa mortis of stock in a bank by mere manual delivery of the certificate, yet there is a recognition that such gifts made are upheld where a complete equitable title vests in the donee, and where the evidence shows that it was plainly the intent of the donor to make the gift. This principle is recognized in Grover v. Grover, heretofore cited; also in Bates v. Kempton, 7 Gray, 382, and in the following cases: Allerton v. Lang, 10 Bosw. 362; Penfield v. Thayer, 2 E. D. Smith, 305; and, indeed, it was thought it was recognized by Lord Hardwicke himself in Snellgrove v. Baily, criticised in Grover v. Grover. Pomeroy, after laying down the modern rule that all things in action "which consist of the promises or undertakings of third persons, not the donor himself, of which the legal or equitable title can pass by delivery, may be the subjects of a valid gift," says, in a note: "It is held in England that shares of stock are not capable of being the subject-matter of a valid donation, because no title can be transferred by delivery; no title can pass except by transfer on the company's own books. . . . Under the law of this country with respect to the title of the assignee before transfer is made on the company's books, there seems to be no reason why a certificate of stock may not be the subject of a valid gift, certainly if it has been indorsed in blank; but in my opinion such indorsement is not necessary." 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1148; 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 197. In Grymes v. Hone, 49 N. Y. 17, 10 Am. Rep. 313, the court sustained a gift causa mortis of bank stock, where there was no delivery of the certificate, and no transfer on the books, but an assignment in writing of the shares. It was held that delivery of the certificates without a transfer on the books of the bank would have made no more than an equitable title against the bank, but would have given a legal title as against the assignor, and that the representatives of the donor became trustees for the donee by operation of law to make the gift effectual. In Walsh v. Sexton, 55 Barb. 251, a woman, apprehending death, gave some certificates of stock in a railroad to her husband. The certificates, on their face, were transferable only by her or her attorney on the books of the company on surrender of the certificates. There was no transfer, and no power of attorney was signed. The gift was sustained upon the authority of Westerlo v. De Witt, 31 L. R. A.

36 N. Y. 345, 93 Am. Dec. 517. This latter case of Westerlo v. De Witt (1867) is generally cited, and bears closely upon the case at bar. The donor, apprehending speedy death, told the plaintiff to bring her a roll of paper from the pocket of one of her dresses. She took the roll, and gave it to the plaintiff. There was in the roll a certificate of deposit for $1,500. After the gift, the donee returned the parcel to the pocket of the dress, as directed by the donor before her death. The donor left a last will and testament, in which she bequeathed to the plaintiff the legacy of $1,000 and the dress in which the parcel was placed. The plaintiff doubted whether the certificate was intended for her. She was advised that she could not recover it in law. There were other facts and circumstances not necessary to here recapitulate. The court of appeals, by Hunt, J., sustained the gift, upon the ground that it was quite clear that in apprehension of death, or among the living, the gift of a mortgage or an indorsed note may be effected by a simple delivery of the security, and that Mrs. Clinton did not expect or intend to retain any control over the possession of the money or security after the date of the delivery. The security was placed upon the same footing as the money, and both were held to be susceptible of being presented as a gift by delivery. "It is impossible" said the court, "to apply any rule which would make this a valid gift as to the money, and invalid as to the certificate. They must stand or fall together." In Com. v. Crompton (1890) 137 Pa. 133, the donor there delivered a box containing a government bond and certificates of railroad stock, with the intent to give the securities to the defendant. The court passed upon the direct question of whether the failure to make a formal written transfer would defeat the purpose of the donor. It was treated as well settled that a valid gift of non-negotiable securities may be made by delivery of them to the donee, without assignment or indorsement in writing; and, to sustain that proposition, the court cited Wells v. Tucker, 3 Binn. 366, and Lacey v. Lacey, 7 Pa. 251, 47 Am. Dec. 513. "The shares of stock are choses in action, and the certificates evidence of the title to them. Why may not a delivery of certificates, coupled with words of absolute and present gift, invest the donee with an equitable title to the stock, which the donor or a volunteer cannot successfully assail. A stockholder may clothe another with the complete equitable title to his stock, without compliance with the forms printed by the corporation." In Cook v. Lum, 55 N. J. L. 373, it is recognized that things in action may be given by a surrender to the donee of the donor's voucher of right or title, although the gift was in that case, on the facts, held invalid. So does Tiedeman on Equity Jurisprudence (§ 359) uphold gifts of choses in action. Brantley, Pers. Prop. § 208, citing Pomeroy's opinion in his note. Lowell on Transfers (§§ 43, 109) lays down the rule that "a certificate is a muniment of title, and a delivery of the certificates, like a delivery of the title deeds in England, may be evidence of an intention to transfer the property they represent; and, on the same principle, the delivery of a certificate of stock may be a good donatio causa mortis, although no transfer of the stock is executed." Reed v. Cope-land, 50 Conn. 472, 47 Am. Rep. 663. Promissory notes, with or without indorsements, if delivered, may be good gifts causa mortis. Croswell, Exrs. & Admrs. § 621; Vandor v. Roach, 73 Cal. 614. The delivery of the certificates being intended as a gift of the stock, the donor did all that was required to pass an ownership, especially as there was no blank assignment on the back, and no attorney present to draw one. The authorities above cited permit the circumstances surrounding the actors to be considered. Thomas v. Lewis, 89 Va. 1, 18 L. R. A. 170.

The view that a delivery of the shares to Andy without writing or transfer on the books is good is also in direct harmony with Basket v. Hassell, supra, where it was regarded as unquestionable that a delivery of the certificate of deposit involved therein to the donee, without an indorsement, would have transferred the whole title and interest of the donor in the fund represented by it, and might have been valid as a donatio causa mortis. And we here observe that, as the doctrine of this oft-referred-to case seems, upon appellant's theory, to contract the common-law definitions of the character of the conditions attached to a delivery, yet upon this point—that choses in action may be given causa mortis—we find the same great tribunal that decided that case expanding the original English definitions so as to include not only choses in action generally, but those which, by delivery, concededly passed but an equitable title against all, except between the parties themselves. Thompson, in his Commentaries on Private Corporations, upholds a gift of stock by a delivery of the certificates, and cites Basket v. Hassell, supra, to sustain his text, and lays it down that, "in conformity with this doctrine, it has been often held that a valid gift of non-negotiable securities may be made by the delivery of them to the donee, without an assignment or indorsement in writing. This principle has been applied to notes, bonds, stocks, certificates of deposit, and life insurance policies. . . . So, also, it has been held that a valid gift (in view of death) of corporate stocks, may be made by a simple delivery of the certificates, with intent to transfer the stock; even though the certificates on their face are made 'transferable only by her or his attorney, on surrender of this certificate;' though, as already seen, a gift of shares may be executed by a transfer on the books without a deliver of the certificate." § 2390.

The argument that national bank shares stand upon a different footing is not tenable, for it was held in Johnston v. Laffin, 103 U. S. 800, 26 L. ed. 532, that, when a certificate of stock in a national bank was delivered (with a blank power of attorney indorsed as between the parties thereto), the title to the shares then passed; the right to the shares then vested in the purchaser. "The entry," said the court, "of the transaction on the books of the bank, where stock is sold, is required, not for the translation of the title, but for the protection of the parties and others dealing with the bank, and to enable it to know who are its stockholders, entitled to vote at their meetings and receiving dividends when declared. . . . Purchasers and creditors, in the absence of other knowledge, are only bound to look to the books of registry of the bank. But as between the parties to a sale, it is enough that the certificate is delivered with authority to the purchaser, or any one he may name, to transfer it on the books of the company, and the price is paid." And, again: "The transferability of shares in the national banks is not governed by different rules from those which are ordinarily applied to the transfer of shares in other corporate bodies." In McNeil v. Tenth Nat. Bank, 46 N. Y. 325, 7 Am. Rep. 341, the delivery of a certificate with the assignment and power indorsed was held to pass the entire title, legal and equitable, in the shares of a national bank, notwithstanding that, by the terms of the charter or by-laws, the stock was declared transferable only on its books. "Such by-laws," said the court, "do not incapacitate the shareholder from parting with his interest, and that his assignment, not on the books, passes the entire legal title to the stock, subject only to such liens as the corporation may have upon it, and except the right of voting at elections," etc. Judge Thompson, in his usual clear and vigorous style discusses the doctrine of distinguishing between the legal and equitable ownership of stock where the delivery of the certificate is had, and approves that part of the opinion of Judge Rapallo in the case last cited, and concludes with the following observations of his own: "So, the legal owner of shares in a corporation is the owner in whose name the shares stand on the books of the corporation, whereas the equitable owner is the one who, being the beneficiary,—that is the real owner,—is not registered as such on the corporate books, and who must, if the corporation refuses so to register him, go into a court of equity to compel them to do so. The real meaning is that his title is complete as against everybody but the corporation itself, and those who have a superior right to have the corporation make the transfer to them." Thomp. Corp. § 2393.

We are therefore of opinion that it was not indispensable to the validity of the transfer of the stock in question, by our statutes or the law generally, that there should have been any writing on the backs of the certificates, and that an equitable title passed to Andy. This equitable title gave Andy full right to the stock, and equity should afford him the means of obtaining the possession of that incorporeal subject of gift,—stock itself. The intent having existed in Judge Davis's mind to make the gift, and the stock certificates having been delivered, the legal title was complete between Andy and his uncle, subject always, of course, to revocation or to the inherent conditions in gifts causa mortis. We need not consider the attitude of third parties or creditors, because none have appeared in this case. The donee, therefore, having an equitable title and a legal right, may enforce that right by the aid of equity. Many of the cases heretofore cited are where courts have extended their aid to give effect to gifts causa mortis. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 607 et seq

Passing to the point of dominion and control, the authorities hold, without much conflict, in recent decisions, that the delivery of a chose in action as a gift must be such as to vest in the donee the equitable title, and to divest the donor of all present control and dominion, always, of course, upon the recognized condition in cases of a gift causa mortis; and that a delivery which does not confer upon the donee the present right to reduce the fund into possession, by enforcing the obligation, according to its terms, will not suffice. As we have seen, the intent of Judge Davis was complete in this case, and the delivery passed to the donee the equitable title. Thus did the gift possess the all-important qualities of depriving the donor of all control and dominion over the property; and thus was the right conferred upon Andy to have compelled a transfer on the books of the bank of the stock to him. Under our view of the testimony of the words spoken by Judge Davis subsequent to the gift, it is unnecessary to discuss whether or not there was any limitation or suspension of this right conferred upon Andy by the donor, although, as said, we doubt if there was other than the law implies in all gifts causa mortis. No writing was necessary, as said before, to perfect the delivery, but the omission of this ceremony does not lead to the conclusion that the transaction is invalidated, on the ground that, by its omission, the donor was deprived of the control and dominion. The donor had parted, and intended to part, with the muniments of title to the shares in the bank, and thus surrendered the certificates which were necessary to obtain a transfer on the books of the bank.

Did Judge Davis, however, exercise any dominion and control after the date of the gift? The facts and circumstances, as apparent by the statement preceding this opinion, show that his nephew voted 950 shares of stock for the decedent for director, at the regular stockholder's meeting, January 14, 1890.

The holder of this proxy never conversed with Judge Davis regarding the same. It was given to the holder by Andy, and the facts all go to show that from the time Judge Davis executed the proxy, which antedated the gift some three days, he never was at the bank or took any part in its management or affairs. At the time of the meeting, he was sick and away. Andy controlled the proxy entirely. It was necessary to hold the bank meeting, and, to do this, the stock in question had to be voted. As against the bank itself, the legal title to the stock was in Judge Davis, for by its books was it alone guided. Andy produced the proxy, and inserted his brother's name; and at the direction of Andy, as said before, the stock was voted. We cannot see how this proxy can be made to defeat the donor's intent, as evidenced by the words and delivery and surrender of the certificates to Andy after the date of the proxy. Possibly, when the proxy was signed by Judge Davis he had not made up his mind exactly what to do, or he might have contemplated postponing the execution of this gift; but it would be most unjust to hold that an act done under that proxy, without his knowledge or consent, should nullify all his acts and words sanely done just before he went to Tacoma. And, so far as Andy is concerned, he only did what any layman under such circumstances would have done; that is, assist to confer upon his dying uncle, during the rest of his life, the highest mark of affectionate regard then within his power to bestow. It has taken centuries for the most experienced and wise judges to determine that a donor of a gift causa mortis must divest himself, at the time of the gift, of all dominion and control of the article donated, and must place it wholly under the donee's power, and enable him, without further act on his (the donor's) part, to reduce it to his own manual possession; yet it is strenuously urged by the appellant in this case that because Andy did this one single act, made necessary, within a few weeks after his uncle's departure, it should be construed as so inconsistent with the surrender and control of the stock by his uncle, and of his own right of dominion and control over the same, as to deprive him of all his rights. It was the dominion of the donee which controlled the voting of the shares. Every presumption is that the donee accepted such a gift, and we cannot believe for a moment that this conduct of Andy at that bank meeting ought to overcome that presumption, when considered in relation to the intent of his uncle and the delivery of the evidence of the shares to him.

We have not considered Judge Knowles's testimony at the various points throughout this opinion where it might have been pertinent to do so. This omission, however, was due to our desire to avoid needless repetition, for we have regarded it in its application to the whole case. Without repeating it there, we find nothing in the interview between Judge Davis and Judge Knowles, about February 1st, which is not susceptible of reasonable interpretation favorable to Andy. Judge Knowles was not to return to see Judge Davis three days after his first visit with a view to make any testamentary disposition to Andy, for Judge Knowles expressly says that he was not to return "to fix up these gifts exactly," meaning thereby the gifts to Mrs. Wehrspau's daughter, and the Butte Library, and a lady, and two persons in the states. Judge Davis did not ask Judge Knowles about a will, and only referred to these particular gifts as gifts. He did say that Andy "is to control the bank, or have the bank, or both," which language is surely not unfavorable to the respondent in this case; and, indeed, there is reason in the argument that Judge Davis knew that he had given the stock to Andy, and, by his words, that he meant to exclude it from his estate proper. In doing so, he was but carrying out a statement he had made to that effect, long before, to many persons. That the testimony of these prior declarations was admissible is well sustained in reason and in decision. Moyer's Appeal, 77 Pa. 486; Thornton, Gifts, §§ 222, 234.

The length of this opinion prevents any more extended notices of the many cases cited by the appellant which have upheld contrary views of the law. Many of them turned upon the peculiar facts incident to the words of the gift; others are of a date when systems of commercial transactions between men were far less practical and convenient than in later years; while some adhere to the more ancient common law doctrines which refuse to recognize gifts causa mortis of shares until transfer is made on the books. The early Maryland decisions fully sustain appellant's position that a written transfer is necessary. Those cited to us, and others, are cited in Hinkley's Testamentary Law of Maryland (pp. 146 et seq.). The recent decisions of that state proceed upon stare decisis.

The court is asked to pass upon the "Federal question" involved in this case. To us it appears, however, that the main point involved is whether there has been a valid gift causa mortis. It being clear to us that the equitable title to the stock passed by the delivery of the certificates, no decision has been made upon that point other than by the common law generally; for we do not think the statutes of the United States attempt to regulate the transfer of such an equitable title. But, if there is a Federal question involved, it is this: Can an interest in the shares of a national bank be legally transferred by the owner thereof to a donee or purchaser, as a gift causa mortis, so as to confer the equitable title upon the donee or purchaser, without a written transfer of the shares on the books of the bank, or an indorsement on the backs of the certificates themselves? We answer that question affirmatively, in the light of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, that a transfer on the books of a national bank is not necessary to give to a donee or purchaser an equitable title to the shares. Cecil Nat. Bank v. Watertown Bank, 105 U. S. 220, 26 L. ed. 1041; First Nat. Bank v. Lanier, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 378, 20 L. ed. 175; Johnston v. Laffin, 103 U. S. 804, 26 L. ed. 534; Black v. Zacharie, 44 U. S. 3 How. 513, 11 L. ed. 704. Judge Brewer, as circuit judge, held in Kansas v. Bradley, 26 Fed. Rep. 289, that a proposition once decided by the Supreme Court of the United States is no longer to be treated as a Federal question. Nor do questions which involve the ownership of national bank shares always present Federal questions. Williams v. Weaver, 100 U. S. 547, 25 L. ed. 708; Le Sasser v. Kennedy, 123 U. S. 521, 31 L. ed. 262.

We see no error in admitting the testimony of John E. Davis. The defendant had the burden of proof upon him; and, as the legal title stood in the name of the decedent, it was proper to show that respondent controlled and directed the voting of the stock, although it was voted and stood in the decedent's name. Having been rejected as a witness himself, he was obliged to produce some proof to explain who exercised dominion in fact, and to rebut a presumption which might otherwise have arisen against him by the records of this bank meeting.

The testimony of Darnold, if entirely credible, would have rendered this case much simpler for discussion. We cannot tell what weight the district court gave to it. It is plausible and consistent in itself, and may have impressed the court as truthful. But we have considered its value as impaired by the omission of Darnold to deny Boyce's affidavits by counter affidavit. We regard Boyce's testimony on the trial as not weakening Darnold's statements. On the contrary, a reason for believing that Darnold told the truth is that Boyce failed to produce his books, which were at his house, he says, and thus to verify his statement that Darnold did not leave his (Boyce's) employ until some time after the alleged interview with Judge Davis in 1890. It was to appellant's interest to impeach Darnold, and Boyce was called for that purpose. To know whether Darnold was in search of employment when he says he called upon Judge Davis was of the highest importance from the standpoint of impeachment, but upon that point appellant wholly failed, although Boyce said he had the evidence in his own possession. Moreover, if the affidavit of respondent is true, Boyce was using Darnold's alleged statement of former perjury to coerce respondent into participation in a scheme to get money from the estate to pay Boyce's debts. Such a proposition, if it were really made, unfolds a brief chapter of moral obliquity on Boyce's part, well calculated to shake the truth of his entire affidavit.

There is nothing whatsoever in the motion for a new trial to show that Darnold would testify differently from the way he did, even if we assume that what he said upon the preceding trial was false. The rule is not to grant a new trial to get impeaching testimony. A prosecution for perjury would be appropriate. Hopcraft v. Kittredge, 162 Mass. 768. The same evidence produced on this trial, if the testimony of Darnold were excluded, would be abundantly sufficient to sustain the conclusion reached by the district court; and courts will not grant new trials where it is apparent from the record that the result would probably be the same. United States v. Biena (N. M.) 42 Pac. 70.

The findings made cover the issues involved in the pleadings, and are supported by the evidence. Our conclusion is that this gift must be sustained. We believe in adhering to the rule that, where a party claims by way of a donation causa mortis, he should make out a strong case. It is therefore the duty of the court to give particular heed to every fact and circumstance in the testimony, being very careful to avoid any conclusion not fully sustained by credible evidence. On the other hand, there is a cardinal principle never to be lost sight of, namely, that the law permits a man to make gifts in apprehension of his death; and if he has done so in due manner, while in full possession of his senses, and with deliberation and intent to bestow his personal property upon another, it would be a fearful injustice to nullify that intent, and take away the property from the person justly entitled thereto. The more we have studied this case, the stronger has grown our conclusion that Judge Davis deliberately gave the bank stock to his nephew, and never, by any word or deed, signified any desire whatsoever to revoke the gift. We can find no middle line to follow in applying the rule of equity to the facts. Either the gift was perfected as between the judge and Andy, and must be sustained or the entire case of respondents is conceived in an iniquitous conspiracy with the appellant to enrich himself at the expense of his dead uncle's estate. If there were a conspiracy, the very foundation of it must needs lie in the premise that Judge Davis never handed over to the respondent any certificates of the shares at all before he went to Tacoma. But the premise that he did deliver the certificates is not assailed by any one throughout this case, and, under the testimony, could not be considered for a moment. So that, when that assumed premise is removed, the whole hypothesis of dishonesty falls with it, and leaves standing by itself, as the correct reasoning and conclusion of the case, the gift of this fortune, which equity will uphold and enforce, as prayed for by the respondents. The judgment is affirmed.

Per Curiam: The record in this case was made up entirely with Talbott, as special administrator, as plaintiff, and the briefs so treat him. For that reason he has been called "plaintiff." At the argument of the case, by consent of counsel, John H. Leyson was substituted as plaintiff; Leyson having been appointed as administrator since the appeal in this case was taken.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

METROPOLITAN SAVINGS BANK of Baltimore et al., Appts.,
v.

James MURPHY et al., Admsrs. of Michael Murphy, Deceased.

(82 Md. 314.)

1. An entry of an account in a savings bank in the names of husband and wife, subject to the order of either and to survivorship on the death of either, made by a transfer of funds from a former account in the name of the husband alone but designating his wife as the person to whom payment should be made in the event of his absence or death, makes the new account entirely separate and distinct, so that the testamentary character of the old account will not inhere in the new one and make it admissible to probate.
2. A transfer of a savings bank account to a new account in the names of the former depositor and his wife, making it subject to the order of either and to survivorship on the death of either, partakes somewhat of the nature of an equitable assignment, and entitles the wife to the fund after the husband's death.

(January 8, 1896.)

A PPEAL by proponents from a decree of the Orphans' Court of Baltimore County refusing to probate an instrument claimed to be the last will and testament of Michael Murphy, deceased. Affirmed.

On July 8, 1873, Michael Murphy opened an account with the Metropolitan Savings Bank of Baltimore, and at the time named in writing on the books of the bank his wife, Ann Murphy, as the person to whom the funds should be paid in the event of his absence or death. In 1884 the legislature of Maryland passed an act, chap. 293, requiring certain formalities in the execution of a paper to make it a valid will, but provided by the second section "that this act shall not affect or be applicable in any wise to any will or bequest executed prior to the first day of August, 1884. On March 5, NOTE.—Joint accounts in savings banks.

The litigation over joint accounts in savings banks has arisen chiefly in regard to the right of one of the depositors to control the account after the others' death. And in the bulk of these cases the one attempting to control the deposit has not in fact furnished money for the account, but that form of account was adopted for the purpose of giving the claimant an interest in the money after the death of the real depositor. If the depositor retains control over the deposit until his death, such efforts are not generally successful.

The mere opening of an account in the name of the depositor and his sister "and the survivor of them, subject to the order of either," will not be sufficient to give her a title to the money. Taylor v. Henry, 48 Md. 550, 30 Am. Rep. 486.

In Dougherty v. Moore, 71 Md. 251, the account was in the name of husband and wife "and the survivor, subject to the order of either." Both died the same day, and a controversy arose between their respective administrators as to who had the title to the money, and it was held that although the wife had the right to draw the money, yet, the money being that of the husband, his administrator, and not her's, had the better right to it after the death of both.

A deposit in the name of the depositor and a third person will not transfer the title to the latter if the depositor keeps possession of the book until his death. Augusta Sav. Bank v. Fogg, 82 Me. 588.

An entry in the pass-book, of two names with the words "payable to either or survivor," is not sufficient to constitute a valid gift by the owner of the money to the other person, if the latter never had possession of the book and did not know of the deposit until after the death of the former. Noyes v. Institution for Sav. 164 Mass. 583.

An entry in the pass-book, "payable to self or wife," is not sufficient to vest the money in the wife after the husband's death if he retains control of his deposit at all times during his life. Towle v. Wood, 60 N. H. 434, 49 Am. Rep. 326.

A deposit in the name of the depositor or another, the latter never having had possession of the book, is presumptively the exclusive possession of the former. Re Ward's Estate, 2 Redf. 251.

Making out the pass-book in the joint names of husband and wife is evidence merely that the deposit should be drawn by either of the persons 1885, Murphy's pass-book having been filled up, it was surrendered and a new one issued to him with a number different from that upon the former book, because of a regulation of the bank requiring the number to correspond with the page upon which the account was kept in the ledger; the page of the ledger being changed at the same time that the change in the book was made. This account was in accordance with the custom of the savings banks in Baltimore, opened in the form of "Michael Murphy and Ann Murphy, subject to order of either the balance at the death of either to belong to the survivor." Michael Murphy died in 1888 and the bank paid the balance of the account left at that time to Ann Murphy and her executor. The next of kin of Michael Murphy took out letters of administration on his estate and demanded from the bank the fund remaining in the joint account at the time of Michael's death and the bank refused to pay and attempted to set up the original account which Murphy had opened as a testamentary act by which the title to the fund was transferred to his wife. The orphans' court stated that "although in our opinion the entry in question would operate as a will to convey personal property, having been executed prior to the act of 1884, chap. 293, and Michael Murphy having died March 2, 1888, yet, nevertheless, the money in question was otherwise disposed of by the entry of March 5, 1885, when Michael Murphy opened a new account in the names of Michael Murphy and Ann Murphy, his wife, subject to the order of either, the balance to be paid to the survivor.

"We therefore dismiss the petition."

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Bensinger & Calwell, Alfred Jenkins Shriver, and M. W. Offutt, for appellants:

The requisites of a will of personal property executed before August 1, 1884, when the act of 1884, chap. 293, which made the requisites of wills of personalty and realty the same, went into effect were: (1) the intention to dispose of property after death; (2) that this intention was reduced to writing during the decedent's lifetime; (3) that the writing be complete on its face, or that its imperfections be duly accounted for.

named, and does not prove ownership in either of the parties. Burke v. Slattery, 10 Misc. 754.

The opening of an account in the name of the depositor and a third person, with the understanding that during the depositor's lifetime the money shall be subject to her absolute control, and on her death it shall go to the third person for certain purposes, does not vest any title in the third person, but upon the death of the depositor the money will go to her administrator. Providence Inst. for Sav. v. Carpenter, 18 R. I. 287.

The opening of the account in the name of the depositor and her daughter will not be sufficient to perfect a gift to the daughter of the money remaining in the account at the death of the depositor. Re Bolin, 136 N. Y. 177.

A deposit in the name of a man and his wife, he retaining control of the pass-book at all times during his life, will not vest any title to the fund in her. Wortman v. Robinson, 44 Hun, 357; Schick v. Grote, 42 N. J. Eq. 354.

But there are a few cases in which a deposit in the joint names of two persons has by reason of the existing circumstances been held to inure to the benefit of the survivor.

If a pass-book is in the names of Michael and Mary Smith, "either to draw," upon the death of Michael the title vests in Mary. And upon the death of both the representative of either is entitled to draw, and the same is true of an account in the name of one or the other. Smith's Estate, 17 Abb. N. C. 78.

The opening of an account in the name of depositor or her sister, accompanied by a delivery of the pass-book, will vest the latter with the title to the funds upon the death of the depositor. Hannon v. Sheehan, 46 N. Y. S. R. 565.

If the account is in the name of the depositor and another, "order of either of them," the sending of the pass-book to the latter will perfect the title in her so that in case of the death of the depositor she may draw the money from the bank. Mack v. Mechanics' & F. Sav. Bank, 50 Hun, 477.

If money is deposited by a third person in the name of one person or another, or the survivor, the bank will perform its contract by paying it to either in the lifetime of both, or to the survivor. Ide v. Pierce, 134 Mass. 261.

A deposit in the name of one person or another, payable to either or the survivor of them, makes the deposit the joint property of both during their joint lives, and upon the death of one the title will vest immediately and absolutely in the survivor. Whitehead v. Smith, 19 R. I. —.

Money deposited by the husband in the joint names of himself and wife will inure to the benefit of both, and the whole will go to the survivor. Platt v. Grubb, 41 Hun, 447.

If both actually contribute money to the account, it seems that the survivor will not acquire title to the decedent's share.

If an account is opened in the names of one or another person, and contributions are made by both, the death of one will not terminate his interest, but his administrator may recover the portion of the fund which belongs to him. Mulcahey v. Emigrant Industrial Sav. Bank, 89 N. Y. 435, Reversing 62 How. Pr. 463, which held that the money went to the survivor.

An account in the name of the depositor, but containing the statement "subject to his order or the order of" another person named, does not make a joint account, but merely makes the latter the agent of the former to draw the money. Murray v. Cannon, 41 Md. 466.

In case of money deposited in the name of a third person with a memorandum that it may be paid to the depositor, parol evidence is admissible to show the intention in making the deposit. Northrop v. Hale, 72 Me. 275.

A parol agreement that the money shall not be paid to the one in whose name the account stands unless two other persons who were present when the deposit was made are present at the time of the attempted withdrawal, is not binding if such agreement is contrary to the rules contained in the pass-book. Riley v. Albany Sav. Bank, 36 Hun, 513.

In Whitlock v. Bowery Sav. Bank, 36 Hun, 460, where the surviving party to the account was made administrator of the other after he had drawn the money, the court held the appointment as administrator legalized the act of drawing the money, if legalization was necessary, so that the act could not be questioned by the administrator de bonis non of the deceased depositor.

Byers v. Hoppe, 61 Md. 215, 48 Am. Rep. 89; Setcell v. Slingsuff, 57 Md. 587.

The entry was a validly executed will of personality before August 1, 1884. The act of 1884, chap. 293, required certain formalities as to execution.

The second section of the same act provides as follows: "Sec. 2. And be it enacted, that this act shall not affect or be applicable in any wise to any will or bequest executed prior to the 1st day of August, 1884."

Account No. 7,437 was a continuation of Account No. 1,485, the change of number indicating merely that the account had been transferred to a new section of the bank's ledger.

On March 5, 1885, the name of Ann Murphy was added, and the account then stood: "Michael Murphy and Ann Murphy, subject to the order of either, the balance at the death of either to belong to the survivor."

In Taylor v. Henry, 48 Md. 550, 30 Am. Rep. 486, a precisely similar entry was declared of no effect when no actual delivery of the fund had taken place.

See also Dougherty v. Moore, 71 Md. 251; Murray v. Cannon, 41 Md. 466.

The ground of the court's refusing probate to the instrument was that the entry of July 8, 1878, operated as a will but for the entry of March 5, 1885.

The orphans' court having affirmatively found this paper writing to be testamentary in character, should, of necessity and for that reason alone, have admitted the same to probate. Probate desides merely on the factum of the instrument.

Michael v. Baker, 12 Md. 158, 71 Am. Dec. 593; 1 Jarman, Wills, 6th Bigelow ed. p. 38.

Messrs. James J. Lindsay and John T. Ensor & Son for appellees.

Roberts, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appeal in this case is taken from an order of the orphans' court of Baltimore county, refusing probate to an instrument claimed to be the last will and testament of Michael Murphy, deceased. There is no controversy as to the facts appearing in the record, which can be briefly stated as follows: Michael Murphy became a depositor in the Metropolitan Savings Bank on Baltimore City, on July 8, 1873, and from time to time thereafter made deposits therein of various sums of money. On the 5th of March, 1885, after he had at intervals drawn from said bank different sums of money, there remained to his credit with said bank a balance of $1,841.45.

This balance was, by his direction, transferred to a new and different account in said bank, which was opened in the names of Michael Murphy and Ann Murphy (his wife), and at the request of said Michael, which was agreed to by said bank, there was written at the head of the account of said Murphy and wife in the bank book No. 7,437, with the appellant, the following: "It is agreed that this account is opened subject to the by-laws printed on the first and last pages of this book, subject to the order of either. The balance, at the death of either, to belong to the survivor."

The wife survived her husband, and at the time of his death, which occurred March 7, 1888, the balance with said bank to the credit of the joint account of Murphy and wife amounted, with certain accretions of interest, to the sum of $2,482.67. This sum the appellant, in pursuance of the terms of its contract with Murphy and wife, paid over to the survivor, Ann Murphy. The only question which we are now called upon to decide is: Had the bank authority in law to make such payment? It is the claim of the appellees that the bank acted without authority in making such payment, and the converse of the proposition is maintained by the executor and residuary legatee of Ann Murphy, now deceased. It is contended by the appellant bank that the two accounts in said bank—that in the name of Michael, and that in the joint names of himself and wife—constituted in fact but one and the same continuing account, and both having been opened with said bank prior to the passage of the act of 1884, chap. 293, requiring certain formal prerequisites in the execution of wills of personalty, they are entitled to be considered and construed as testamentary papers, and that the balance in said bank to the joint credit of the husband and wife at the time of his death passed, under the terms of the alleged will, to the wife as the survivor.

It is claimed upon the part of the appellees that when the individual account in said bank in the name of said Michael was closed, it no longer had any connection with or relation to the joint account in the names of the husband and wife, and became thereby wholly disconnected with this controversy. We concur in this view, and think that the proper construction to be placed upon the two accounts in their supposed relationship is that the closing of the one and the opening of the other left them separate and distinct. And if this be so, there is but one consequence which follows, and it is this: The joint account in the names of the husband and wife ceased to possess a single testamentary attribute, as the entry at the head of the joint account was not, nor was the account itself, written or opened until after the act of 1884, chap. 293, had gone into effect.

So that we entertain no doubt about the legal effect of these accounts as testamentary papers. We are clearly of the opinion that the testamentary character claimed by the appellants as adhering to the first and second accounts by reason of their being one and the same continuing paper is without force and untenable. It is too plain for controversy that the accounts are separate and distinct, and in no just sense testamentary. We do not, however, concur in the view taken at bar of the case of Dougherty v. Moore, 71 Md. 248, as concluding the question raised by this appeal. The facts of that case differ very materially from the case presented in the record of this case.

At the death of the husband, the bank paid over to the wife the balance of the account and in doing so carried out in good faith the letter of its contract in strictissimis verbis.

This is not a case where the husband retained possession and control of the account in bank, and continued to draw therefrom such sums as his wants might indicate, as was the case in Dougherty v. Moore, supra, and in many other cases. Nor is the language controlling the ultimate disposition of the joint account in this case in any respect similar to that of Dougherty v. Moore. The bank's instructions, in opening the account, were that said account should be subject to the order of either husband or wife, and at the death of either the balance should belong to the survivor. It is neither the object of the law nor the duty of the court to seek by narrow and technical construction the means of invalidating a contract clearly expressive of the intention of the contracting parties, and we think nothing could be clearer than the object and intention of the parties to the contract in the language employed by them in opening the joint account.

While we have not been able to recognize the accounts in evidence as testamentary papers, we entertain no doubt as to the legal effect and meaning of the entry at the head of the joint account. It is quite true that the title to the deposits referred to in the first account was originally vested solely in the husband, Michael, and it was his privilege to make such disposition of the same as he thought proper. He had the indisputable right to enter into any contract with the appellant that would accomplish his purpose in securing to his wife the protection which these savings deposits might give to her. After opening said joint account the husband never drew one farthing from the bank on that account, which from March 5, 1885, to the date of his death, March 2, 1888, remained undisturbed, save by the addition of some interest items, which were made by the officers of the bank.

The property in controversy consisted of deposits in the appellant bank, which by the direction, authority, and request of the said Michael, assented to by the appellant, was entered in the books of said bank to the credit of himself and wife with the understanding and contract with the bank, indorsed thereon as hereinbefore stated. The parties were sui juris, capable of contracting, and having actually contracted, the law exacts fulfilment, which the appellant has done. And we do not think after it has fully executed its part of the contract, it ought now to be required to pay to the appellees the money which it promised to pay, and had already paid to the appellants' testatrix, unless some legal requirement can be established demanding its payment to the appellees.

We have given the most careful consideration to the various cases which have been passed upon by this court bearing any analogy to the facts of this case, but we have found no authority controverting the conclusions at which we have arrived.

This transaction partakes somewhat of the nature of an equitable assignment, looking to the interest of the parties, rather than to matter of form, and the question of the survivorship depended solely upon mere contingency. But looking at this controversy from whatever point we may, we think the appellant paid rightly to Ann Murphy the balance standing to the joint credit of herself and husband at the time of his death. We will, for the reasons assigned, affirm the order of the court below.

Order affirmed with costs, and petition dismissed.

quired by act 1891, chap. 370, is not wholly defeated by the fact that the poles carrying the light wires in the highways were not legally located.

3. The schedule of property which the owner of a light plant wishes to sell to a town which has elected to establish one under the act of 1891, chap. 370, need not be sufficiently particular to sustain a decree for specific performance or such as would be required in a formal conveyance of property. It is sufficient if it will enable the commissioners to identify the property and intelligently make an adjudication as to what shall be sold and purchased.

4. Ratification by a gas and electric light corporation of the action of its board of directors in electing in due time to sell its property to a town which has decided to establish a light plant under the act of 1891, chap. 370, before the town has changed its position, will make the act binding, although it was not within the thirty days given the corporation in which to act.

5. A town which elects to avail itself of the provisions of a statute enabling it to establish a light plant cannot attack the act as unconstitutional because it gives the owner of an existing plant the option to compel it to purchase that, and makes no provision for a jury trial as to value.

APPEAL by respondents from a decree of the Supreme Judicial Court for Middlesex County in favor of petitioner in a proceeding to compel respondents to take and pay for a portion of petitioner's gas and electric plant upon the ground that they had elected to establish such plant under the act of 1891, chap. 370. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Samuel K. Hamilton for appellant.
Messrs. Edgar R. Chaplin and Charles R. Darling, for appellee:

Chapter 370 of the act of 1891 is valid and constitutional.

Opinion of the Justices, 150 Mass. 592, 8 L. R. A. 487.

That part of the act requiring a town which proceeds to avail itself of the provisions of the act to buy any lighting plant which is already operating in the town is valid and constitutional.

The provision, instead of impairing vested rights, protects them. It does not compel a town to incur an obligation against its will. Towns are, and may be, compelled to assume obligations toward the public as an agency of the state; they are in this respect unlike an individual.

No obligation is incurred by compulsion; the town incurs it voluntarily, if at all.

It is a case of a gift cum onere, like the acceptance of a deed poll, in which the grantee assumes certain obligations. The statute is part of the vote, as a statute affecting the rights of a party under a contract is part of the contract.

1 Kent, Com. *421; Story, Const. 5th ed. § 1388.

There is no valid objection to the act on the ground that it binds the town to take the plant before it has voted any money or otherwise taken any practical steps towards establishing a plant of its own other than the passage of the votes prescribed by the statute.

Field, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a petition under Stat. 1891, chap. 370, § 13, and the case comes before us by appeal from an order of a single justice overruling the demurrer of the respondent, and by appeal from a decree of a single justice appointing commissioners to determine what property shall be sold by the petitioner, and bought by the respondent, and what the price, time, and other conditions of the sale and delivery, shall be. The facts on which the decree is founded are recited in the decree. The petition was filed on October 28, 1892, and all the proceedings were had before the passage of Stat. 1893, chap. 454.

The decree recites "that the petitioner is, and was at the time set forth in the petition, a corporation established under the laws of Massachusetts, and having its usual place of business at Wakefield, in the county of Middlesex; that it is, and was at said times, engaged in the business of manufacturing gas for the use of the inhabitants of the towns of Wakefield, Reading, and Stoneham, with its main gasworks in Wakefield, and with pipes extending into the towns of Reading and Stoneham; that it was duly authorized by the board of gas commissioners, and by the necessary vote of stockholders, under and in pursuance of chapter 885 of the acts of 1887, to engage in the business of generating and furnishing electricity for light and power in the towns of Reading, Wakefield, and Stoneham, and is, and was at said times, engaged in furnishing electric light for commercial purposes to the inhabitants of the town of Wakefield, with its central lighting station in Wakefield." It is contended that the two votes passed by the town pursuant to Stat. 1891, chap. 370, § 3, to the effect "that it is expedient for the town to exercise the authority conferred upon towns under the provisions of chapter 370 of the acts of the year 1891," are not equivalent to a vote that the town decides to establish a plant for the manufacture and distribution of gas and electricity, but that an additional vote, to the effect that the town decides to establish such a plant, is required before the town becomes subject to the obligations imposed by the statute. See sections 12 and 13. But the statute makes provision for only two votes. Section 12 begins as follows: "When any city or town shall decide as hereinbefore provided to establish a plant, and any person, firm, or corporation shall at the time of the first vote required for such decision be engaged," etc. The provisions thereinbefore made are the votes required by § 3, and the first vote must mean the first vote required by that section. Section 13 begins as follows: "Any person, firm, or corporation desiring to enforce the obligation of any city or town under § 12 to purchase any property shall file with the clerk of such city or town, within thirty days after the passage of the final vote whereby such city or town shall have decided to establish a plant, a detailed schedule describing such property and stating the terms of sale proposed," etc. The final vote must be the vote at the last of the two legal town meetings mentioned in § 3. This construction is confirmed by the language in the last clause of § 18. We find nothing in the statute, anywhere, indicating that after the town has voted at two separate legal town meetings, called as required by § 3, that it is expedient to exercise the authority conferred by the statute pursuant to § 3, any additional vote is necessary, and we think that this contention cannot avail.

Section 12 provides as follows: "When any city or town shall decide as hereinbefore provided to establish a plant, and any person, firm, or corporation shall at the time of the first vote required for such decision be engaged in the business of making, generating, or distributing gas or electricity for sale for lighting purposes in such city or town, such city or town shall, if such person, firm, or corporation shall elect to sell and shall comply with the provisions of this act, purchase of such person, firm, or corporation before establishing a public plant, such portion of his, their, or its gas or electric plant and property suitable and used for such business in connection therewith as lies within the limits of such city or town. If in such city or town a single corporation owns or operates both a gas plant and an electric plant, such purchase shall include both of such plants," etc. The petitioner, as the decree recites, operated both a gas plant and an electric plant in the town of Wakefield. The respondent contends that its poles for the support of the wires used in distributing electricity were not legally located in the town of Wakefield. On this question the decree recites as follows: "It appeared that an application by petitioner for permission to erect and maintain poles and wires in the streets of Wakefield had been made to the selectmen of Wakefield, under the provisions of chapter 382 of the acts of 1887 (there being another company in said town engaged in, or organized for the purpose of doing, an electric lighting business); that said permission was refused by said selectmen, but upon appeal taken to the board of gas and electric light commissioners, under the provisions of said act, the decision of the selectmen was reversed, and said permission granted, the order of said board being as follows, viz.:

"The Board of Gas and Electric Light Commissioners.

"Boston, May 27, 1890.

"In the matter of the appeal of the Citizens' Gaslight Company of Reading, South Reading, and Stoneham from the decision of the selectmen of Wakefield, refusing to grant it permission to erect poles and string wires in the streets of said town: Ordered, that the decision of the selectmen be reversed, and that permission is granted to the Citizens' Gaslight Company of Reading, South Reading, and Stoneham to erect wires over or under the streets, lanes, and highways of the town of Wakefield, for the purpose of supplying electricity for light and power."

"Thereafter, on August 7, 1890, at a regular meeting of said board of selectmen, without petition, notice to parties interested, or a public hearing, the following vote was passed, viz.: 'Voted, that the Citizens' Gas-light Company of Reading, South Reading, and Stoneham be and is hereby authorized and empowered to engage in the business of furnishing electricity for light and power in the town of Wakefield, and to erect poles and string wires in the streets and highways of said town, the location of said poles to be hereafter designated, and subject to such restrictions as to quality and style as may be imposed by the selectmen of said town of Wakefield, and subject also to such other provisions and conditions as may be required by said board of selectmen.' And a copy of said vote was furnished to the petitioner by the secretary of the board of selectmen of the town of Wakefield. But, except as aforesaid, the selectmen of the town of Wakefield had not given the petitioner any writing specifying where the posts to be used might be located, the kind of posts, and height at which, and the places where, the wires might run; and no such specifications had been recorded in the records of the town of Wakefield, in accordance with chapter 109, § 3, of the Public Statutes, and of chapter 221 of the laws of 1883. And, except as aforesaid, said petitioner received no written consent from the board of selectmen of said town to erect poles, lay or erect wires over or under the streets, lanes, and highways of said town, or to dig up and open the ground within the streets or highways of said town for the purpose of laying lines of wires, or to erect and maintain lines of wires upon or above the surface of the streets and highways of said town, as provided in either chapter 382 or 385 of the acts of 1887, or in compliance with any other statute. As to whether any oral directions or consent regarding said matters were given by the selectmen, no evidence was introduced by either party." The contention is that, so far as the electric plant is concerned, every pole supporting the wires within the limits of the highways in the town of Wakefield is a public nuisance, and that the town cannot be compelled to purchase property of the petitioner which the petitioner cannot legally use, and which may be removed or destroyed as a nuisance. The petitioner had received general authority to erect poles and lay wires in the public streets of the town. How far the particular location of the poles, and the quality and style of them, were subject to the approval of the selectmen of the town need not now be considered. The petitioner actually owned and operated an electric plant in the town. The specific property which the town is required to purchase in accordance with the provisions of the act, and the price, time, and other conditions of the sale, are to be determined by the commissioner or commissioners to be appointed under § 13, Stat. 1891, chap. 370. If the poles in the public ways were not legally located, this would not entirely defeat the petition; and what effect it would have upon the property to be purchased, or the price to be paid for it, cannot now be determined.

R. A.

The respondent contends that the petitioner has not complied with the provisions of the act, in filing a detailed schedule of the property within thirty days after the passage of the final vote, as required by § 13. The final vote was on August 15, 1892. The directors of the company, on September 9 1892, voted that the company file a detailed schedule of its property, in accordance with the act, and that the secretary be authorized to sign and file the same; and on September 12 the secretary, in the name of the company, filed with the clerk of the town a statement in detail of its plant, and the price and terms upon which the company would sell its property to the town. The contention is that the schedule should not be a mere list or catalogue of property, but a formal inventory, with a particular description, sufficient to enable a court to make a decree for specific performance, or such as would be required in a formal conveyance of the property. The provisions of the statute are that, if the corporation desires to enforce the obligation of the town to purchase any property, it shall file "a detailed schedule describing such property and stating the terms of sale proposed. If the parties fail to agree as to what shall be sold, or what the terms of sale and delivery in accordance with the provisions of this act shall be," either party may apply to the court, and the court shall appoint a commissioner or commissioners, who shall adjudicate "what property, real or personal, including rights and easements, shall be sold by the one and purchased by the other." It is evident that the schedule is not intended to settle finally just what property is to be included in the sale. We think that the schedule was required for the purpose, not of furnishing such a formal description of the property as may be necessary or proper in a conveyance, but of furnishing such information, in detail, to a city or town as the parties may need intelligently to negotiate for the purchase, or, if the parties cannot agree, of furnishing to the commissioners such a bill of particulars as may be necessary or convenient for an intelligent adjudication of the matters which they are to determine. We cannot say that the schedule filed in this case, on its face, appears not to be made up in sufficient detail to enable the town to understand what property, specifically, the petitioner owned and used in its business in the town of Wakefield; and we think that the commissioners probably could identify the property from the schedule, and intelligently make their adjudication. Certainly, it does not appear in the papers before us that the commissioners will be unable to identify the property from the schedule, and from such facts as necessarily must be put in evidence before them.

The schedule was filed by the secretary under the authority of a vote of the directors of the company, and it is contended that it was beyond the power for the directors to determine whether the company would elect to sell its property to the town, and to avail itself of the provisions of the statute. See Pub. Stat. chap. 106, § 28. The by-laws of the company are not set out in the papers.

It appears, however, that on September 19, 1892, the stockholders, at a meeting called for the purpose of taking action upon a proposition to sell the plant and assets of the company, and to transact such other business as should come before the meeting, ratified the action of the directors, but this was more than thirty days after the passage of the final vote by the town. We think that the vote of the stockholders must be considered as within the notice or call for the meeting at which it was passed. It does not appear that there was any change of position on the part of either of the parties between the action of the directors and that of the stockholders, and the petitioner duly filed its petition within sixty days after the filing of the schedule. Without considering whether the determination to sell the property to the town, and to file the schedule in accordance with the provisions of the statute, was within the authority of the directors, and assuming that the filing of the schedule within the thirty days is to be treated as a condition precedent to the right of the company to enforce the obligation of a city or town to purchase its property, we are of opinion that the ratification by the stockholders in this case must be taken as equivalent to original authority. The town took no action to rescind its votes between the time of filing the schedule and the vote of the stockholders, if any such action could have been taken, and the petitioner has never attempted to repudiate the action of the board of directors. See Bolton v. Lambert, L. R. 41 Ch. Div. 295; Andrews v. Etna L. Ins. Co. 92 N. Y. 596; Nims v. Mount Hermon Boys' School, 160 Mass. 177, 22 L. R.

It is contended that Stat. 1891, chap. 370, is unconstitutional. It is not in violation of the Constitution of Massachusetts for the legislature to authorize a town to purchase and maintain either a gas or an electric plant for the purpose of furnishing light to its inhabitants. Opinion of the Justices, 150 Mass. 592, 8 L. R. A. 487.

The legislature might have authorized cities and towns to erect and maintain such plants without requiring the cities or towns to purchase any existing plant of this kind, belonging to private persons or a corporation, but it has not done so. Under this statute a city or town is not required to establish any such plant, and private persons or corporations are not required to sell to any city or town any existing plant. In this respect, there is nothing compulsory in the statute. But if a town chooses to act under the statute, it must act in accordance with its provisions, and take the burdens with the benefits. The statute does not provide for a trial by jury upon the value of the property purchased, or upon any of the terms of the purchase. If we assume that, when property is taken by a town for a public use, the owner of the property has a right to a jury trial upon the amount of the reasonable compensation to be paid, still article 15 of the Declaration of Rights has no application to a party who comes in voluntarily under the provisions of a statute which provides for the determination of his rights and obligations in another manner than by a jury trial.

MCCOOK COUNTY, Recept.,

v.

*1. Section 2612, Comp. Laws, imposes the duty upon "the children of any poor person who is unable to maintain himself by work, to maintain such person to the extent of their ability."

2. While the statute prescribes no procedure for enforcing this duty as to future maintenance, a county which, under the direction of the law, has furnished necessities to such indigent and helpless father, may recover therefor in an action against the children whose duty it was to furnish the same, and whose refusal so to do made it necessary for the county to furnish such necessities.

(October 28, 1895.)

APPEAL by defendants from an order of the Circuit Court for McCook County overruling a demurrer to the complaint in an action brought to enforce defendants' liability for the support of their father. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. A. C. Biernatzki, for appellants:

A complaint alleging an open account and a balance due states two causes of action.

Eisenhower v. Stein, 39 Kan. 281.

When the complaint states a demand upon a claim due and a claim not due, there is a misjoinder of causes.

Wurlitzer v. Suppe, 38 Kan. 31; Union R. & Transp. Co. v. Traube, 59 Mo. 355; Weinland v. Cochran, 9 Neb. 480.

*Headnotes by KELLAM, J.

NOTE.—The decision in the above case is especially interesting as an affirmation of the right of action based on a statutory duty where the statute does not in terms provide a remedy. As the duty to provide the support rests by law upon the children first, and then, in case of their default, upon the county, the case is distinguishable from that of Albany v. McNamara (N. Y.) 6 L. R. A. 212, in 31 L. R. A.

which aid to a person was held to be voluntary so that no action would lie for reimbursement.

In this connection the case of Rowell v. Vershire (Vt.) 8 L. R. A. 708, is also interesting, where it was held that a promise of aid by the overseer of the poor to a man who by law had the duty of supporting a daughter was without consideration.

A summary proceeding may not be joined with any other cause of action although arising out of the same transaction.

Or v. Wickham, 38 Kan. 225.

So a statutory liability arising upon delinquencies cannot be joined with a common-law liability, if subsequent in time.

The statute, while saying that it shall be the duty of a child to support an indigent parent, has established no way in which this duty can be enforced, nor conferred upon any one the authority to enforce it: that is, failed to create a legal duty, and the provision is merely declaratory of a moral duty.

Kentucky v. Dennison, 65 U. S. 24 How. 66, 16 L. ed. 717.

The moral obligation, if any exists, could not be enforced, for our law does not go the length of the civil law to enforce a mere moral obligation.

Kellam, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

McCook county brought this action to recover from appellants $100, paid by the county for the support and maintenance of their indigent father, and for a judgment requiring them to contribute to his future support. This appeal is from an order overruling a demurrer to the complaint. The grounds of demurrer were: First, that plaintiff has not legal capacity to sue; second, that several causes of action have been improperly united; and, third, that the complaint does not state facts constituting a cause of action.

There is no merit in the first ground. The statute expressly authorizes a county to sue (Comp. Laws, § 572). The second ground will be noticed after the third is disposed of.

Does the complaint state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action in favor of the county against the appellants? Section 2612 of the Compiled Laws is as follows: "It is the duty of the father, the mother, and the children of any poor person, who is unable to maintain himself by work, to maintain such person to the extent of their ability." This provision innovates the common-law rule, by imposing upon children, to the extent of their ability, the duty of maintaining their poor and helpless parents. The statute declares the duty of such children to support such parents as expressly and unequivocally as the common law declares the duty of parents to support their minor children. Appellants contend that this statute declares only a moral duty, for it provides no means for its enforcement. This may be true so far as future support is concerned, but the general law affords the same means for compelling payment for necessary support by an adult child who disregards this imposed duty as it does in the case of a neglectful father. The duty rests upon the child, but, in consequence of his neglect, the statute humanely requires the county to provide such support. The county does not act officiously, but under the coercion of the law, and supplies the support which the son or daughter was under obligation to supply. The duty to support being by law put upon the child, he is liable upon the same principle that the father is liable at common law for necessary support furnished to a destitute minor child, whom it is his duty to provide for. If, under such circumstances, the county, under the direction of the law, furnishes necessities to the indigent and helpless father, we think, upon principle, it ought to and may recover therefor against the children whose duty it was to furnish the same, but who neglected and refused so to do. The statutes of most of the states go further, and provide a procedure by which such children may be compelled to supply future support. Ours does not. Whether the omission was an oversight or deliberate we do not know. Our conclusion is that the complaint states facts which would entitle the county to recover for the necessary support theretofore furnished the father, but we are unable to find any statutory authority for the court to make a judgment requiring the defendants to undertake the future support of their father. For such necessities as it has already furnished, or for such as, under the same conditions, it may hereafter furnish, it may maintain an action against the defendants. The complaint stating no cause of action for future maintenance, there was no misjoinder.

The complaint stating one good cause of action, the demurrer was properly overruled, and the order appealed from is affirmed.
All concur.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

DETROIT

v.

BOARD OF WATER COMMISSIONERS of the City of Detroit, Plff. in Certiorari.

(.....Mich.....)

Water need not be furnished without pay by an incorporated board of water commissioners having no source of revenue for the running expenses of the water-works except the water rates, to a house of correction which is under the control for the most part of a board of inspectors, and not of the city council, although the city is obliged to pay the expenses so far as they exceed the earnings of the institution, since any such burden should be laid upon the whole body of taxpayers of the city, and not upon those only who are private consumers of water.

(March 3, 1896.)

CERTIORARI to the Circuit Court for Wayne County to review a judgment granting a mandamus to compel defendant to furnish water free of charge to the Detroit house of correction. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Henry M. Duffield, for plaintiff in certiorari:

The city of Detroit has heretofore asserted, in defense of actions brought against it in the state and Federal courts, that it has no control or responsibility for the acts of the superintendent and officers of the house of correction; and such is the law of this state.

Detroit v. Laughna, 34 Mich. 402; Scharzwaelder v. Detroit, U. S. Dist. Ct. Mich.

The board of water commissioners is a corporation auxiliary to the city of Detroit and in charge of its waterworks; it is confined in its own procedure to raising money from water rates charged for the use of water. These are the primary resources for paying current expenses and expenses for the extension of the works.

Jones v. Detroit Water Comrs. 34 Mich. 273.

Mr. John J. Speed, for defendant in certiorari:

The board of water commissioners, as well as other boards and commissions, is a part of the municipal government of the locality known as the city of Detroit; and although for certain purposes the right to sue and be sued and to hold property in its own name is conferred upon this board, still this board can only under our system of government exist as a mere agency.

People, Park Comrs., v. Detroit, 28 Mich. 228, 15 Am. Rep. 202.

The board of water commissioners is not merely a trustee for the benefit of individual consumers of water who pay water rates.

The term "public use" in the 7th section of the act creating the board of water commissioners is broad enough to include public buildings.

The term "public" when applied to a building is one which exists by public authority and is used for public purposes.

See title Public, 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 302-304.

Hooker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The city of Detroit, through its corporation counsel, ask a mandamus to compel the board of water commissioners to furnish, free of charge, water to the Detroit house of correction. The writ was granted by the circuit court, and the respondent has brought the proceeding to this court by certiorari.

The Detroit house of correction appears to have been built by the city under a general power, given to the common council, "to establish and build jails, workhouses, and houses of correction for the confinement of offenders, to erect, and provide for erecting, the necessary buildings therefor, and control and regulate the same; to appoint all necessary officers for taking charge of the same and of persons confined therein; to prescribe their powers and duties, to provide for their removal from office, and the filling of vacancies." Sess. Laws 1857, p. 106, subdiv. 60. Other sections of the charter provide for the confinement of state offenders, at the expense of the state and the various counties, and subsequent statutes took away much of the control originally given to the council and lodged it elsewhere. See How. Stat. chap. 344. The status of this institution has been before the courts, and in the case of Detroit v. Laughna, 34 Mich. 402, this court said: "The city, indeed, built the prison, and has an interest in its finances, as it is responsible to a certain degree for its expenses; but after the house was built under provisions of the city charter, which may or may not have been legally sufficient to provide for its future management, the legislature,

either discovering defects, or more probably recognizing the manifest impropriety of allowing a prison to be managed by a city council, passed a statute which removed any doubt concerning the legal position of that establishment. On the 15th of March, 1861, an act was passed entitled 'An Act to Establish the Detroit House of Correction and Authorize the Confinement of Convicted Persons therein.' By this act, the government of the prison was put under the control of a board of inspectors, of whom three were to be appointed by the common council, on the nomination of the mayor, and in addition to these, the mayor and the chairman of the board of state prison inspectors were made ex officio members. The regulation and discipline were to be under rules adopted by the board, leaving the council no voice except concerning the approval of rules relating to salaries and compensation of officers and employees. There is no very important power which the council can exercise without the concurrence of the inspectors, except in the selection of the superintendent, whose powers and duties are all governed by the act of 1861 and the general laws of the state. Any interference whatever by the common council, either in the selection of inferior officers or in the internal management of the prison, would be unlawful and nugatory. While it has at various times in legal experience been customary to allow and sometimes to compel, prisons to be built and maintained by larger or smaller municipal corporations, yet all criminal prisons are and must be public and not private places of detention, and no imprisonment can be lawful that is not authorized by public laws. In England it is settled that all prisons, by whomsoever kept, are the King's prisons (2 Inst. 100; Ex parte Evans, 8 T. R. 172), and no new prison can be erected except by act of Parliament." We find, therefore, that, while the legislature has required the city to pay the expenses of the house of correction to the extent that they shall be found to exceed the earnings, its management and its appropriations are not within the control of the council, these being confided to officers provided for by the law, except as the assent and concurrence of the council are necessary to extraordinary appropriations, etc.

The board of water commissioners is a corporation created in the year 1853, by act of the legislature, and given the charge of the waterworks, which it is authorized to manage and extend, and to regulate and fix and collect water rates from the owner or occupant of each house or other building having or using water. Laws 1853, p. 180; 3 Laws 1873, p. 135. These water rates seem to be the only source of revenue provided for the running expenses of the waterworks. Jones v. Detroit Water Comrs. 34 Mich. 273. Extensions, etc., are provided for from other sources, and fire hydrants may be ordered by the fire commissioner, in which case they must be paid for from the funds of the fire commission. If required by the council, it must pay the expense.

It is now contended that the house of correction belongs to the city, and is a public institution, and, as such, is entitled to be supplied with water free of charge. It is a significant fact that those having in charge the management of the house of correction do not make this application, and that the city is the moving party. As already shown, the city must provide for the expenses of this institution, so far as they are not covered by the earnings. Such expense, then, should be a burden upon the whole body of taxpayers of the city. If the water must be paid for, it must come out of the general tax, unless it can be paid from the earnings. On the other hand, if the institution is entitled to have the water furnished gratuitously by the commissioners, the burden is not borne by the city at large, but by those only who are private consumers of water. The fund derived from water rates is depleted to that extent, and it might easily be so seriously affected as to require a raising of the rates. If, as contended, the water commissioners cannot refuse to furnish water gratuitously to this institution, they have practically no alternative but to furnish what is required, nor have they any means of preventing wastefulness, or the extension of its use to many purposes to which steam or other power is now applied. The common council would be powerless to control it. The house of correction should be supported from its own fund, and if, as is reported, it produces a handsome balance over expenditures each year, it should not be permitted to increase such amount by compelling the water board to use a part of its income from water rates; and we can see no difference between requiring the water board to pay a sum of money directly to the management of the institution, and expending it for water to be furnished.

It is said that there is no merit in the defense that it is merely a matter of bookkeeping, and that what is paid for water is taken from one city pocket and put into another; but we have shown that this is not true, inasmuch as one fund must be furnished by the city at large, or, possibly, by the county of Wayne and other counties, or the state at large, while the other is made up by a comparatively small portion of the inhabitants of the city, i. e. those who pay water rates. Again, if this were a mere matter of bookkeeping in the sense contended for, its natural tendency would be towards an economical use of water by the institution. It is probable that the board of water commissioners was created for the frugal and economical management of the waterworks, and the conduct of the business connected therewith, and that it could not have been intended that it should be at the mercy of every institution that may be called public. Whatever may be its duty as to furnishing water for the general purposes of the city, we think that it is not under an obligation to furnish it to this institution without pay.

We think the order of the Circuit Court granting the writ should be reversed.

The other Justices concur.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

A. L. ROGERS, Appl.,
v.
STATE of Arkansas.

(60 Ark. 76.)

1. One who fires a shot necessarily fatal, in self-defense, is not guilty of homicide in firing another shot which also would be fatal, after the other party has abandoned the conflict, where the last shot does not contribute to or hasten death.
2. A definition by the court of "great bodily injury" as a "felony committed on the person" is erroneous. The question must to a great extent be left to the judgment of the jury.
3. Failing to put a statement of law contained in an admonition to counsel in writing is not error in the absence of a request to do so.
4. A general request to put all instructions in writing does not cover a remark of the court in response to a remark of counsel in his argument.
5. A person charged with murder, who procures a continuance to obtain the testimony of an absent witness cannot be prejudiced by the failure of his attorneys, without his knowledge, to comply with a direction of the court to take such person's testimony to be used on an application for bail, made after such witness appears.
6. A judge cannot testify as a witness in a criminal trial over which he is presiding, under Sand. & H. Dig. § 2965, providing that the judge may be called as a witness by either party, but that in such case it is in the discretion of the court to order the trial to take place before another judge or jury.

7. The giving of testimony by the presiding judge on a trial for murder, reflecting on the good faith of defendant in a previous application for a continuance, is reversible error, although the testimony is subsequently excluded and no objection was taken to the competency of the judge as a witness, where the competency of the evidence was objected to.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Yell County convicting him of manslaughter. Reversed.

Statement by Riddick, J.:

The appellant, Rogers, was indicted by the grand jury of Johnson county for the crime of murder. The indictment alleged that he killed and murdered one M. L. Kernoodle in said county by shooting him with a pistol. A change of venue was taken to Yell county, and the case was there tried. The evidence showed that Rogers and Kernoodle became engaged in a combat in the town of Clarksville, near the barber shop in which Kernoodle worked; that they had only struggled a moment before Rogers drew a pistol from his

The competency of a judge as a witness in a case not on trial before him will form the subject of a separate note.

Introduction.

The principle laid down in ROGERS v. STATE as to the competency of a judge as a witness is in keeping with the other decisions upon the question.

I. Rule as to judges.

In 2 Hawk. P. C. chap. 46, § 17, p. 608, it is stated that it is no exception against a person giving evidence either for or against a prisoner that he is one of the judges or jurors who are to try him.

So, in a note to Trial of Colonel Hacker, in 5 How. St. Tr. 1178, 1181 (1880), it is stated that the secretary and president of the council were both in commission for the trial of the prisoners and set upon the bench, but there being occasion to make use of their testimony against Hacker, one of the prisoners, they both came off the bench and were sworn and gave evidence, and did not go up to the bench again during the trial, and it was agreed by the court that they were good witnesses though in commission, and might be made use of.

Again, in proceedings against the Five Popish Lords, 7 How. St. Tr. 1384 (1680), the prisoners were told that it would be best for them to produce all the witnesses they had, and not to leave anything undone that they could prove, whereupon the question was asked whether if they should name any of the House of Peers as their witnesses such fact should exempt them from being judges, and the 31 L. R. A.

question was answered in the negative, and it was stated that if they had any witnesses among any of the lords, they might very well testify on behalf of the accused and yet remain still in the capacity of their judges.

And in Trial of Fernley and Others for High Treason in the Year 1685, 11 How. St. Tr. 459, it was stated that every man knew that a judge in a civil matter tried before him, and a counsel even against his client, had been enforced to give evidence, provided it be not of a secret communicated to him by his client, for in that particular a judge ceased to be a judge, and was a witness of whose evidence the jury were the best judges, though he reassumed his authority and was afterwards a judge of the jury's verdict.

Upon Trial of Earl Macclesfield, 16 How. St. Tr. 1252 (1725), it was stated that in judicial proceedings, especially in a criminal case, witnesses of all sorts were to be examined upon oath.

The above would seem to have been the old rule, but it seems now to be agreed that the same person cannot be both witness and judge in a cause which is on trial before him. If he is the sole judge he cannot be sworn. If he sits with others he still can hardly be deemed capable of impartially deciding on the admissibility of his own testimony, or of weighing it against that of another. Morse v. Morse, 11 Barb. 510 (1851).

And the tendency of the decisions would seem to be that when it is necessary for the conduct of the trial that one should act as judge, he may not be called from the bench to be examined as a witness, but when his action as a judge is not required, because there is a sufficient court without him, he may become a witness, though it is then decent that he do not return to the bench. People v. Dohring, 50 N. Y. 374, 17 Am. Rep. 349 (1874); People v. Miller, 2 Park. Crim. Rep. 197 (1854).

pocket, and shot Kernoodle. Kernoodle turned, and ran into his shop, screaming, "Murder." As he entered, or was about to enter, the door of the shop, which was only a few steps away, Rogers fired again. Kernoodle staggered to the back part of the shop, sank down on the floor and expired almost instantly. The ball from the first shot entered the front part of the body, near the left nipple; and that from the second entered the back, near the spine. Both balls passed entirely through the body, and both, in the opinion of the medical experts, were fatal wounds, though they did not feel quite so certain that the last wound would have destroyed life as they did that this result would have followed from the first wound alone. There was a conflict in the evidence as to whether Rogers or Kernoodle was the aggressor in the combat. From some of the evidence one might conclude that the killing was premeditated on the part of Rogers; that he armed himself, and going to the shop where Kernoodle worked, beckoned him to come out, and then, having willingly entered into a combat with him, deliberately killed him. There is other evidence which contradicted this, and tends to show that Kernoodle was the aggressor, and that being a large and powerful man, he walked up to Rogers, and, after some words, without provocation, struck Rogers a violent blow with his fist, pushed him against the wall, and was about to throw him down when Rogers fired the first shot. There was some proof tending to show that at the time Kernoodle struck Rogers he was armed with a razor, although this was contradicted by other proof. The other facts will sufficiently appear from the opinion. The jury found the defendant guilty

The objection to the competency of a judge as a witness goes to the power of the court, the power to administer the oath, to decide on a question of competency, or the admissibility of parts of the evidence, to commit for refusing to answer, and to exercise over the witness all the other powers of the court which may be called into requisition for the protection of the rights of the party. Morse v. Morse, supra.

Public policy will excuse a judge from testifying if he insists upon it, but it is no ground for exception that he did not insist upon his right to be excused. Welcome v. Batchelder, 23 Me. 85 (1843).

In Dabney v. Mitchell, 66 Ala. 495 (1890), where a cause was tried before a judge of the probate court upon ex parte evidence, it was held that such judge was not a competent witness, and that an affidavit made by him, even though taken before an officer having authority to take and certify affidavits, could not be received as evidence.

In Ross v. Buhler, 2 Mart. N. S. 512 (1824), it was held that a district judge could not give evidence on a trial of an action in which he sat as judge, and the court stated that the Spanish law expressly forbade it, for the reason that such judge who was to administer the oath must do it alone, and was to decide as to his competency and to determine on the absence of evidence if a nonsuit was prayed.

In People v. Miller, supra, it was held, upon an indictment for obtaining the signature to a certain promissory note by false pretenses, that the county judge who presided at the trial could not be sworn and examined as a witness, as he could not occupy both positions at the same time.

Where, during the progress of a trial, the presiding judge, at the request of the respondent and over the objections of the appellant, took the witness stand and testified concerning testimony offered by the appellant in some prior action involving the matter in dispute, it was held that it was error. Maitland v. Zanga (Wash.) 44 Pac. 117 (1896).

Where, upon a trial, one of the justices was called as a witness and gave material evidence, it was held that the court was disorganized, and that the conviction made thereunder was irregular. Dohring v. People, 2 Thomp. & C. 458 (1873).

In People v. Dohring, 50 N. Y. 374, 17 Am. Rep. 349 (1874), a justice of the sessions, who was sworn as a witness, did not leave the court-room while the trial was progressing, nor abandon the trial, but left the bench for a space intending to return to it, and did so return. The court held that it was error to permit such justice to take his place and be sworn and testify as a witness, not upon the ground that any harm was caused, but because such practice, if sanctioned, would lead to embarassing results and hinder justice and be a scandal to the courts.

In the above case it was shown that two justices of the sessions were indispensable to constitute a legally organized court of sessions, and that neither could be dispensed with any more than the county judge.

In the above case, however, the court had originally obtained jurisdiction and the judge was examined by the consent of the people and the prisoner, and it was therefore held that the court had full jurisdiction even though such justice was examined as a witness, the court overruling the prior decision in the case in 2 Thomp. & C. 458 (1873), upon that point.

II. Justices of the peace.

In Baker v. Thompson, 89 Ga. 486 (1892), the evidence of a presiding magistrate in a justice's court upon a trial before a jury on appeal in the court over which he presided was refused upon the ground that the law made no provision for the administration of an oath to him as a witness, and upon the ground that he could not be sworn before himself.

So, in Perry v. Weyman, 1 Johns. 520 (1806), it was assigned as error that the justice before whom the case was tried was sworn by another justice as witness in the cause, the court held that such oath was extra-judicial and improper, and reversed the judgment.

Where a party seeks to avail himself of the evidence of a justice of the peace before whom the cause is tried through the intervention of a jury, he must, before the commencement of the trial, proceed according to the provisions contained in the Ohio statute, for the removal of the cause and its trial before another justice of the peace. McMillen v. Andrews, 10 Ohio St. 112 (1859).

The provisions of the Ohio statute (Swan's Statutes, p. 510, § 758), are that if at any time before the trial shall have commenced it shall be made satisfactorily to appear to the justice before whom any cause is instituted or is pending for trial, by affidavit of either party, that such justice is a material witness for either party, or that a fair and impartial trial cannot as he believes be had in such township, the cause shall be in the first case transferred to some other justice of the township for trial, and in the last to some justice of adjoining townships. Ibid.

In McMillen v. Andrews, supra, the question was whether a justice of the peace, before whom a cause was being tried through the intervention of a jury, could be required by either party to be sworn and testify in such case the other party objecting, and the court held that he could not. — E. W.

of the crime of voluntary manslaughter, and assessed his punishment at five years in the penitentiary.

Messrs. McKennon & Patterson, J. E. Cravens, and Martin & Murphy, for appellant:

If the first shot was fired justifiably, it was not made criminal by the second. If the first was justifiable and the second criminal, the appellant committed no criminal homicide, unless the second was an agent in causing death.

The definition of "great bodily harm" excluded everything but mayhem and rape. It was legally inaccurate, and also an unwarranted violation of the appellant's request that charges be put in writing.

Messrs. James P. Clarke, Attorney General, and Charles T. Coleman for the State.

Riddick, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We need not consider the objections urged against the definitions of the words "wilfully" and "deliberately" contained in instruction No. 1, given by the court. The object of those definitions, we suppose, was to inform the jury concerning the distinctions between the different degrees of homicide. As the defendant was only convicted of manslaughter, it is plain that, whether erroneous or not, they did him no harm. We find no error in either of the instructions numbered 2, 9, and 11, given by the court on its own motion, and to which defendant excepted. When taken in connection with the other instructions, we think they state the law as favorably to appellant as he had the right to demand.

The twelfth instruction given by the court, and to which the defendant objected, is as follows: "(12) If the jury believe that the defendant inflicted upon the body of the deceased two mortal wounds; that both wounds were necessarily fatal, and either of which, independent of the other, would have produced and resulted in the death of the deceased within a short time, of which two wounds the jury believe the deceased died; and the jury further find that the deceased had in good faith declined all further contest with defendant, and that, while deceased was fleeing from him, defendant inflicted the second fatal wound upon the body of the deceased by shooting him a second time,—although the jury might believe the defendant fired the first shot in self-defense, the killing would not be justifiable, but would amount to manslaughter only." It is said by Mr. Bishop that "whenever a blow is inflicted under circumstances to render the party inflicting it criminally responsible, if death follows, he will be deemed guilty of the homicide, though the person beaten would have died from other causes, or would not have died from this one had not others operated with it; provided the blow really contributed either mediately or immediately to the death in a degree sufficient for the law's notice." 2 Bishop, New Crim. L. § 637. To same effect, see Kee v. State, 28 Ark. 160.

If the defendant fired the first shot in necessary self-defense, and then afterwards, when Kernoodle had abandoned the contest, and was fleeing, he again fired upon him, inflicting another wound, when the circumstances were not such as to make a reasonable man in his situation believe that he was then in immediate danger of great bodily injury, he would be guilty either of some degree of homicide, or of an unlawful assault, depending upon the question whether or not the wound inflicted by the last shot either caused, contributed to, or accelerated his death. In other words, if the last shot was not fired in necessary self-defense, and the wound inflicted by it either caused his death, or contributed to or hastened it, the defendant would be guilty of some degree of homicide, even though the first shot was fired in self-defense, and though at the time the last shot was fired the deceased was already so severely wounded that his death would have followed in a very short time. On the other hand, if the first shot was fired in self-defense, and the last shot neither caused his death nor contributed to or hastened it, then he could not properly be convicted of any degree of homicide, but might be convicted of an assault. Davis v. State, 45 Ark. 464. The court, in giving instruction No. 12, doubtless had these rules of law in his mind, and the instruction, abstractly considered, is nearly correct, if not entirely so; but we doubt if in this case it presented the question in such a way as to let the jury understand that, in the event the first shot was fired in self-defense, then it became material for them to determine whether the last shot contributed to or hastened his death. Instruction No. 4, asked by the defendant, substantially covered the law on this point, but it was rather long, and also stated that, if the second shot did not contribute to the death of deceased, the jury must acquit, whereas they might still have found defendant guilty of an assault.

Another question raised by counsel is concerning the meaning of the phrase "great bodily injury." One of the counsel for defendant, in the course of his argument before the jury, stated that the law books did not define such phrase; whereupon the court interrupted him, and said that the law books did define it, and that its meaning was "a felony committed on the person." To this remark of the court defendant excepted at the time, and now contends that it was not a correct statement of the law, and that, even if correct, it should have been reduced to writing. It was held in Reg. v. McNeill, 1 Craw. & D. 80, that to constitute "a grievous bodily harm," under a statute of Geo. IV., it was not necessary to show that the wound be on a vital part, or that the injury be of a permanent nature, or that life be endangered thereby; but that proof that the prisoner committed an assault with a deadly weapon, whereby a severe wound was inflicted, was sufficient to sustain an indictment for an assault to inflict grievous bodily harm. In the case of Lawlor v. People, 74 Ill. 230, the court said that the phrase "serious bodily injury" meant substantially the same as "great bodily injury," and that the meaning of both was "a high degree of injury, as opposed to a slight injury." The phrase "great bodily injury" is difficult to define, for the reason that it well defines itself. It means a "great bodily injury," as distinguished from one that is slight or moderate, such as would ordinarily be inflicted by an assault and battery with the hand or fist without a weapon. To put one in danger of great bodily injury from an assault, something more than attack with the hand or fist would usually be required, and it would rarely happen that one might lawfully take the life of another to avoid an assault with the fist only. But cases might be supposed when it would be justifiable to do so; for an assault and battery by a powerful man with his fist upon a weak one might be carried to such extreme severity as to produce great bodily injury, and yet be unaccompanied by such circumstances as to make it a felony. One who intentionally commits a great bodily injury upon the person of another may or may not be guilty of a felony, depending upon the circumstances; but, as such an injury may under some circumstances be committed and still the offender not be guilty of a felony, it is therefore not accurate to define "great bodily injury" as "a felony committed on the person." What constitutes a great bodily injury, and whether the circumstances in any case are such as to justify one in believing that such an injury is about to be committed upon him and in defending himself against it, are matters which must be left to a great extent to the judgment of the jury.

It is also contended that the court, before making this remark concerning the meaning of the phrase "great bodily harm" or "injury," should have reduced it to writing; but we do not think this contention is well taken. It is the duty of the court to restrain the remarks of counsel within proper bounds. If, in the opinion of the court, counsel should announce propositions of law to the jury which are incorrect and misleading, the court should admonish counsel so that he may desist. It is not necessary to stop to reduce the admonition to writing before making it, but if it contains a statement of law calculated to influence the verdict of the jury, the court should, at request of counsel, reduce the same to writing, and, if necessary, repeat it in its written form to the jury. No request was made to reduce this remark to writing. The general request to put all instructions in writing cannot be held to cover this remark, for it was not intended as a part of the instructions, but only as a correction of what was conceived to be a misstatement of the law in the part of counsel.

During the progress of the trial the presiding judge was called as a witness, and, over the objections of the defendant, testified on behalf of the state. His testimony was, in substance, that at a former term of the court, before the change of venue was taken, the defendant had filed a motion for continuance on account of the absence of one Bert Cunningham, whom he alleged was a material witness in his behalf. Afterwards Bert Cunningham appeared, and, defendant having made an application for bail, the judge, in open court, notified the attorneys of defendant that they might take the testimony of said Cunningham to be used on the application for bail; to which notification the attorneys of defendant made no response, and took no steps to procure the testimony of said Cunningham. It was not shown that the defendant was present at the time this notification was given to his attorneys, or that he in any way approved of the conduct of his attorneys in this regard; on the contrary, defendant testified that he had been in prison, and did not know such notification was given. This evidence tended to make the impression that defendant had endeavored to procure a continuance on account of the absence of a witness whose testimony he did not want, when the failure to take this deposition may have been due to the neglect of his attorneys, and through no fault of the defendant. We think it clear that the testimony was incompetent. The trial judge seems to have arrived at the same conclusion, and afterwards, acting as a court, excluded the testimony which he had given as a witness. But the question still remains whether a judge, while presiding at a trial of a criminal case, may, against the objection of the defendant, testify as a witness on the part of the prosecution. The only reference to this question we find in our statute is § 2965, Sand. & H. Dig. That section is as follows: "The judge or juror may be called as a witness by either party; but, in such cases, it is in the discretion of the court to suspend the trial and order it to take place before another judge or jury; and when a party knows at the time the jury are impaneled that a juror is to be called by him as a witness, he shall then declare it, and the juror shall be excluded from the jury." This section was taken from the Code of Practice in Civil Actions, and is the same as section 660 of that Code. There is a provision in the Code of Criminal Practice that the provisions of the Civil Code shall apply to and govern the summoning and coercing the attendance of witnesses, and compelling them to testify in all criminal prosecutions; but that provision, we think, refers to the chapter of the Civil Code regulating the issuance of subpoenas for witnesses and attachments for contempt. It does not refer to the competency of witnesses. While there are other portions of the Civil Code applicable to criminal proceedings, we do not find anywhere that this section is to apply to such proceedings; on the contrary, the language of the section itself furnishes convincing proof that it was only intended to apply to civil cases. It states that, when the judge or juror is called as a witness, it is in the discretion of the court to suspend the trial, and order it to take place before another judge or jury. It is plain that on a trial of a defendant for a felony, after the jury are impaneled and sworn, the court would have no power, without the consent of the defendant, to suspend the trial, and order it to take place before another jury. So we conclude that this section was not intended to apply to criminal proceedings, and that we have no statute permitting a judge to testify as a witness in a criminal trial over which he is presiding.

clear that a judge cannot testify under such circumstances. It has been held in England that a judge may give evidence, but that if he does so he must descend from the bench, and cannot return thither during the trial. Sichel, Practice relating to Witnesses, 14. This rule was applicable to trials where the court was composed of several judges. In such a court, a judge might descend from the bench, testify, and take no further part in the trial of the case without interfering with the progress of the trial. Speaking of this question, Mr. Rapalje says: "If the judge sits alone, he cannot be sworn at all; and, if he be one of several judges, he ought not to be, unless he leaves the bench during the trial. In such a case, the maxim that 'no one shall be both judge and witness in the same cause' prevails." Rapalje, Witnesses, § 45.

This question came before the supreme court of New York in a case where one of the two judges presiding had testified, and Folger, J., who delivered the opinion of the court, said that it was erroneous, "because such practice, if sanctioned, may lead to unseemly and embarrassing results, to the hindering of justice, and to the scandal of the courts." In the same opinion, referring to the same matter, he says: "Other considerations may be added: If a judge is put upon the stand as a witness, he has all the rights of a witness, and he is subject to all the duties and liabilities of a witness. It may chance that he may for reasons sufficient to himself, but not sufficient for another of equal authority in the court, decline to answer a question put to him, or in some other way bring himself in conflict with the court. Who shall decide what course shall be taken with him? Shall he return to the bench, and take part in disposing of the interlocutory question thus arising, and upon the decision being made, go back to the stand or go into custody for contempt? The first would be unseemly, if not unlawful, for it would be passing judicially upon his own case. The last would disorganize the court and suspend its proceedings. Other like results may be conceived as possible, equally as contrary to the good conduct of judicial proceedings." People v. Dohring, 59 N. Y. 374, 17 Am. Rep. 549. This reasoning applies with even greater force where the court is composed of only one judge, for, if the judge of such a court takes the stand to testify against the defendant, there is no one to control his testimony or keep him within proper bounds. Even if he can control his own testimony, and discharge, at the same time, what have been called "the incompatible duties of witness and judge," yet, however careful and conscientious he may be, the chances are great that by thus testifying he will to some extent detract from the dignity that should surround the functions of his high office. Instead of the impartial judge administering the law with a firm and even hand, he takes on for the time the appearance of a partisan, endeavoring to uphold by his testimony one side against the other. More than likely he provokes unseemly conflicts between himself and counsel, and arouses the distrust of the party against whom he testifies. In addition to this, the higher his character and standing as a judge the more danger that he thus gives the party in whose favor he testifies an undue advantage over the opposing side. For these reasons, in the interest of the dignity and decorum of the circuit court and the orderly procedure therein, we feel compelled to hold that a judge presiding at a criminal trial cannot, against the objection of the defendant, be sworn and testify as a witness on the part of the prosecution. Bishop, Crim. Proc. § 1145; Underhill, Ev. § 313. We do not mean to intimate that in this case there was any partiality shown by the learned judge of the circuit court. The record shows to the contrary. The section of the Digest above referred to is calculated to mislead if not read carefully, and the mistake arose from being compelled to construe it in the hurry of a nisi prius trial. There were objections made to other rulings of the court, but when taken in connection with the facts of this case, we do not discover any error except as above indicated. For those errors the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

A petition for rehearing was subsequently filed, in response to which Riddick, J., on January 26, 1895, delivered the following opinion:

On the argument for rehearing, it was contended that no proper objection was made or exceptions saved to the action of the judge in taking the stand as a witness, and that for that reason the judgment should not be reversed. The language of the objection and exception is as follows: The presiding judge was "sworn as a witness on the part of the state, and he testified, against the objection of the defendant, touching an application for continuance, etc." At the close of his testimony there was an exception in the following words: "To the introduction of this evidence the defendant objected, but the objection was overruled, and the defendant at the time excepted." In the motion for new trial the following is set up as one of the grounds for a new trial: "The court erred in allowing himself to be introduced as a witness on the part of the state in rebuttal, against the objection of the defendant and in testifying, etc." "The office of the objection," says Judge Elliott, "is to present to the trial court the specific grounds upon which the court is asked to act in giving a decision, so that the court may be fully informed as to the reasons for the ruling sought by the objecting party." On the other hand, "an exception is not required to present specific grounds or reasons upon which a ruling is asked, for an exception follows the ruling, while an objection precedes it and lays the foundation for the exception." Elliott, App. Proc. 726. In his objection, preceding the testimony of the judge, the defendant gives no reason why he objects, and, in this respect the objection is defective, as the objection should state the grounds on which it is based, unless otherwise apparent. Vaughan v. State, 58 Ark. 373; Hurley v. State, 29 Ark. 17; Blackburn v. Morton, 18 Ark. 392. As the objection does not state the grounds on which it is based, it is not clear whether this objection was to the competency of the witness or to the competency of his testimony. As the bill of exceptions shows another and distinct objection to the introduction of the testimony, it would seem that the first objection was to the competency of the witness, and we so treated it in deciding the case. But, if we take the objection as one to the competency of the evidence only, the result must be the same; for while, as a general rule, an error in admitting incompetent testimony is cured by afterwards excluding it, to this rule there are exceptions. If the case is one where the appellate court can clearly see that the direction to the jury not to consider the evidence did not remove the prejudicial effect, it comes within the exception to the rule. Elliott, App. Proc. § 702; Holder v. State, 58 Ark. 482.

Apart from the incompetency of the judge as a witness, his testimony was also incompetent for reasons stated in the opinion. It tended to show that the defendant had not acted in good faith in making his application for continuance at a former time; that he had made an application for a continuance on account of the absence of a witness whose presence he did not desire. Our Constitution forbids judges from charging juries on questions of fact, and this was a statement of facts by the judge to the jury, from which they might readily draw conclusions very damaging to the defendant. It was, in effect, an expression of an opinion by the presiding judge to the jury unfavorable to the conduct and veracity of defendant. Although the court excluded the testimony, the jury still had this opinion of the presiding judge in their minds, and we think the prejudicial effect remained. Even if it be conceded that the defendant failed to object to the competency of the judge as a witness, he did object to the competency of his testimony, and, under such circumstances, we cannot say that the defendant had a fair and impartial trial; and the motion to rehear must be denied.

MISSISSIPPI SUPREME COURT.

JACKSON BANK, Appt.,

v.

R. W. DUFHEY et al.

(72 Miss. 971.)

Insolvent members of an insolvent firm cannot use the partnership property to pay their individual debts, leaving the partnership debts unpaid.

(May 20, 1895.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Chancery Court for Hinds County in favor of defendants in a suit to set aside certain trust deeds. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Nugent & McWillie for appellant.

Messrs. E. E. Baldwin and Williamson & Potter for appellees.

Cooper, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant, a firm creditor of the appellees, Dufhey & Ascher, exhibited its bill in chancery, seeking to annul as fraudulent two certain deeds of trust whereby the firm assets were encumbered to secure the individual debts of the partners. The evidence, fairly construed, discloses these facts: Dufhey one of the partners, was indebted to the defendant Caldwell in the sum of $5,000, and Ascher, the other partner, was indebted to Hart in the sum of $5,550. The firm and the individuals composing it were insolvent. On October 3, 1893, Dufhey executed a deed of trust on all property owned by him individually and upon his undivided half interest to certain property, specifically described, owned by the firm, to secure the debt due by him to Caldwell. On the same day Ascher executed a deed of trust conveying his individual property and his undivided half interest in certain property specifically described, owned by the firm, to secure the debt due by him to Hart. The book accounts, and certain horses which had been bought for resale, were not included in the conveyances; but the stock kept in livery, the carriages, feed, and other appurtenances, were all encumbered. Forfeiture of both conveyances was fixed for the same date,—January 1 following,—at which time, the secured debts remaining unpaid, the trustees were authorized and directed to make sale of the mortgaged property, and out of its proceeds to pay the secured debts. The members of the firm testified that they expected, by the collection of the outstanding book accounts, by the sale of the stock not included in the deeds, and from the profits of the business, to pay the firm debts; but a careful consideration of the evidence satisfies us that at the time the deeds were executed the firm and its members were hopelessly insolvent, and that no expectation could reasonably have been entertained that the firm debts could be paid after the firm property had been devoted to the individual debts of the partners. What followed the execution of the deeds was at best the struggle of mere hoping against hope, and postponing for a short time the inevitable end.

The issue is thus sharply presented whether it is lawful for the members of an insolvent firm to convert the joint estate into severalty and appropriate it to the payment of the individual debts of its members, leaving the firm debts unpaid. The question has never, so far as we are advised, been before the court, though expressions may be found, suggestive of the inclination of some of the judges who have been members of the court, to the view that the dominion of the partners over firm property is not limited by the existence of firm debts and the insolvency of the firm. In Schmidlapp v. Currie, 55 Miss. 597, 30 Am. Rep. 530,—a case of a solvent firm,—Judge Chalmers, while carefully limiting the decision to the question involved (i. e. the right of a solvent firm to devote firm assets to the payment of the debts of one of the members), cites with apparent approval the cases of Rice v. Barnard, 20 Vt. 479, 50 Am. Dec. 54; National Bank v. Sprague, 20 N. J. Eq. 13; Allen v. Center Valley Co. 21 Conn. 130, 54 Am. Dec. 333, and Sigler v. Knox County Bank, 8 Ohio St. 511,—which clearly hold that an insolvent firm may devote firm assets to the debts of its individual members; and also Whitton v. Smith, Freem. Ch. (Miss.) 231; Freeman v. Stewart, 41 Miss. 138; Carter v. Beaman, 6 Jones, L. 44; Ex parte Ruffin, 6 Ves. Jr. 119, and Campbell v. Mullett, 2 Swanst. 553,—which are sometimes cited as supporting the same view. In Hanover Nat. Bank v. Klein, 64 Miss. 141, 60 Am. Rep. 47, it was sought by the creditors of a banking firm to subject to their demands the proceeds of insurance policies upon the life of one of the members in favor of his wife, the premiums on which the bill averred had been paid with firm money, while the firm was insolvent. The answer denied the insolvency of the firm at the time the premiums were paid, and there was no evidence on this point. The case was decided on this point. Judge Arnold, however, in delivering the opinion of the court, gave expression to an emphatic dictum, that the insolvency of the firm and its members would not have changed the result. In addition to the cases cited by Judge Chalmers in Schmidlapp v. Currie, he referred to the cases of Case v. Beauregard, 99 U. S. 119, 25 L. ed. 370, and Roach v. Brannon, 57 Miss. 490. In neither Whitton v. Smith, Freem. Ch. (Miss.) 231; Freeman v. Stewart, 41 Miss. 139; Roach v. Brannon, 57 Miss. 490; Schmidlapp v. Currie, 55 Miss. 597, 30 Am. Rep. 580; nor Hanover Nat. Bank v. Klein, supra,—was the question now involved presented for decision. In all of them the nature of the right of partnership creditors to resort to firm assets for the satisfaction of their demands was considered, and the decisions in the cases in which the point was involved were that the right, being a derivative one, and resting on the rights of the partners, had been lost by the waiver of the partners, under the circumstances of the particular cases. The question involved is res nova in this state, and we deal with it as such.

The authorities, with practical uniformity, agree that the right of partnership creditors to have the partnership property applied to the payment of partnership debts is a derivative one, resting upon the equities of the partners as between each other. The conflict of decision arises with the question whether the partners may, by convention, waive their rights, and convert the joint estate into severalty, thus subjecting it to the debts of the individual members, or, by direct appropriation, apply the joint estate to such debts. It is quite generally held that this may be done so long as the partnership is solvent, and a going concern. Some courts seem to hold that if the partnership, though insolvent, is yet engaged in the prosecution of its business, it may thus deal with the partnership estate; and others, that this may be done even though the partnership is insolvent, contemplates dissolution, and converts the joint into separate estates for the purpose of applying it to the individual debts of its members. In Case v. Beauregard, 99 U. S. 119, 25 L. ed. 370, the individual members of an insolvent firm had applied all the partnership property to the payment of their respective individual debts. The firm's creditors sought to subject it to their demands, but relief was denied upon the ground that the right of firm creditors was a derivative one, and could not be enforced except so long as the partners themselves retained their lien upon the property. Speaking on the precise point, the court said: "The bill, it is true, charges that the several transfers of the partners were illegal and fraudulent, without specifying wherein the fraud consisted. The charge seems to be only a legal conclusion from the fact that some of the transfers were made for the payment of the private debts of the assignors. Conceding such to have been the case, it was a fraud upon the other partners, if a fraud at all, rather than upon the joint creditors,—a fraud which those partners could waive, and which was subsequently waived by the act of fusion." The clear effect of this decision is that it is not a fraud upon partnership creditors for an insolvent firm to devote the joint estate to the payment of the separate debts of the partners, leaving no provision for firm creditors. In no other case we have seen has the question been presented where the conversion of the whole assets into separate estates or the devotion of all of them to individual debts was involved. The reasoning of other courts, however, in the following cases would seem to conduct to the same conclusion as that reached in Case v. Beauregard, viz.: Sigler v. Knox County Bank, 8 Ohio St. 511; Rice v. Barnard, 20 Vt. 479, 50 Am. Dec. 54; Allen v. Center Valley Co. 21 Conn. 130, 54 Am. Dec. 333; Winslow v. Wallace, 116 Ind. 324 [Fletcher v. Sharpe, 1 L. R. A. 179]; People v. Farrington, 119 Ind. 164, 4 L. R. A. 535. See also other cases, probably holding to the same effect, cited in notes to section 560 of 1 Bates on Partnership. But the decided weight of authority is that while the right of firm creditors to go against the firm property in postponement of the right of creditors of the individual members is a derivative right, and rests on the right of the members of the firm, and while that right is lost by the bona fide waiver of their rights by the partners, it is not lawful for the members of the firm, in contemplation of insolvency, to divert the firm property, and apply it to the payment of the debts of the individual members, or to convert the joint estate into estates in severalty, to prevent its being subjected by firm creditors. Ex parte Mayou, 4 De G. Beach, Mod. Eq. §§ 787, 788; Hare & W's note to Silk v. Prime, 2 White & Tudor, Lead. Cas. in Eq. pt. 1, p. 353. The principle controlling in these cases is stated with precision by Judge Dixon, delivering the opinion of the court in Arnold v. Hagerman, 45 N. J. Eq. 186. We quote from that opinion at large, as we adopt and approve the reasoning of the court: "In equity, a partnership is for some purposes deemed a single entity. Thus, when the property involved in the business of a partnership is to be applied by a court of equity to the payment of debts, that property is treated as belonging, not to the persons composing the firm, but to a distinct debtor, the partnership, and is used first to liquidate the debts, . . . and only the surplus, if any, is surrendered to the individual partners. This equitable practice rests upon the presumed intention of the partners themselves, and hence is primarily considered as their equitable right against each other. Consequently, since the decision of Lord Eldon in Ex parte Ruffin, 6 Ves. Jr. 119, it has been generally held that the partners could put an end to this right, and that if, by their agreement, the partnership is dissolved and its property is assigned to one of their number or to a stranger, as his own, without reservation of the right, the right to have partnership debts paid out of that property is extinct. . . . Growing out of this right of partners has arisen a corresponding equity in partnership creditors to have their debts first satisfied out of the firm property, which is now deemed a substantial element of their demands. Generally, it may be said that this equity of creditors continues only so long as the right of partners against each other subsists, and perishes when that terminates; but this is not universally true, for this equity may survive the right to which ordinarily it is attached. In this respect it resembles the claim which the general creditors of an individual have upon his property; it is neither an estate nor a lien; it is ordinarily but a right, by lawful procedure, to acquire a lien during the ownership of the debtor; yet under certain circumstances that lien may be acquired after the debtor's ownership has ended. This results from the provisions of the ancient statute for the prevention of frauds and perjuries, by force of which, when a person has alienated his property with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors, the right of those creditors remain as if no alienation had taken place, except against the claims of bona fide purchasers for good consideration, without notice. . . . Equity applies this statute to a partnership, its property and creditors, just as it would in case of an individual; and therefore, while generally it is true that a partnership may defeat the equity of its creditors by the alienation of its property and consequent extinguishment of the right of its partners inter se, yet if the alienation be effected with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud the firm creditors by defeating their equity, the claims of creditors will be unimpaired, and the property will be treated as partnership assets, unless it shall have passed into the hands of those whom the statute protects." In Clements v. Sharp, 36 N. J. Eq. 569, it was said: "Partnership creditors, in equity, have an inherent priority of claim upon partnership property over individual creditors, and a transfer of partnership property by one partner with the consent of the other partners, or by all the partners, to pay individual debts, is fraudulent and void as to firm creditors, unless the firm was then solvent and had sufficient property remaining to pay the partnership debts." The recognition of this equity in favor of firm creditors does not impair any proper exercise of the power of the partnership over its property or affairs, nor bring within the control of a court of equity all partnerships which are insolvent in fact, or in a condition of temporary inability to meet their obligations. The apprehension of this result seems to have been influential in leading the court, in Sigler v. Knox County Bank, 8 Ohio St. 511, to adopt the opposing view. But the statute against fraudulent conveyances does not operate to control the lawful dominion of individuals, though insolvent, over their property; nor does mere insolvency confer jurisdiction upon equity to take charge of and administer their estates. And yet it cannot be denied that the statute does restrain the insolvent from disposing of his estate for the purpose of withdrawing it from liability to his creditors. Why should a different rule be applied to an aggregation of individuals than to them separately? The inquiry must in either case be whether the purpose and effect of the act are lawful or forbidden. If lawful, it may be done by the individual or by a firm; if unlawful, the act is equally void, as to the creditor injured, whether it be done by the one or the other.

But it is again said that it cannot be a fraud for one to devote whatever right or property he has to the payment of an honest debt. This is true if one devotes his own property to his own debts; but is it not a fraud in law if A appropriates his property to pay B's debt, leaving his own creditors unpaid? Take the case at bar. Durfey and Ascher appropriated one half of their joint estate to pay Ascher's debt. Now, if this was all that had been done, it would be manifest that the creditors of Durfey could treat the conveyance as fraudulent, because it would have been a clear donation by Durfey to the creditors of Ascher, at the expense of his creditors, he being insolvent. But it is said that Ascher at the same time conveyed his interest in the other half of the joint estate to the creditors of Durfey, and so each conveyance became a consideration of the other, and each partner received a full consideration for his release of his right as a partner. The reply is that a full consideration does not make a contract otherwise unlawful valid. If A agrees to do one unlawful act if B will do another, of what avail is it that each will reap a benefit from such act of the other? Durfey had a right to have the partnership property applied to the partnership debts, and Ascher had a like right. While these reciprocal rights existed, they were of value as property rights of the debtors to a certain class of creditors,—i. e. firm creditors. Now, it is manifest that for the very purpose of preventing these creditors from resorting to these rights for the satisfaction of their demands the rights themselves were waived, and attempted to be obliterated. We are unable to perceive any just principle upon which the right of a debtor can be recognized to thus deal with his estate for the very purpose of obstructing his creditors. It is to be noted, also, that neither partner could make a cent by the transaction. Five thousand dollars' worth of property will pay only $5,000 of debts, whether its proceeds be applied to partnership or individual liabilities. The partners would, in either event, after the payment of the debts of either class, owe precisely the same sums. To permit the consummation of the scheme would be of no benefit to them. Its sole effect would be to withdraw the property from one class of creditors who had created the joint estate, had given credit on the faith of it, and had a right to resort to it, and to permit its appropriation to another class, who dealt with the individuals composing the firm, with a full knowledge that all they could get out of the partnership assets was what remained after payment of the partnership debts. The complainant is entitled to the relief prayed by its bill.

The decree is reversed, and cause remanded.

A PPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Circuit Court for Marion County in favor of relator in a proceeding brought to enjoin defendants from executing a provision of a statute relative to the location and erection of a branch insane asylum. Reversed.

Statement by Wolverton, J.:

This is a suit to enjoin the defendants, William P. Lord, H. R. Kincaid, and Phil Metschan, in their capacity as a state board of commissioners of public buildings, from carrying into effect certain acts of the legislative assembly providing for the construction of a branch asylum in the eastern portion of the state, and appropriating money therefor, because of the alleged unconstitutionality of the portions thereof locating such asylum in eastern Oregon. The amended complaint, omitting the caption and formal parts, is as follows:

That the relator herein, in connection with other citizens of the state of Oregon, is a resident taxpayer within said state, and owns property within said state subject to taxation therein. That the defendants, Wm. P. Lord, H. R. Kincaid, and Phil Metschan, are, in the order in which their names appear in this amended complaint, the governor, secretary of state, and state treasurer of the state of Oregon, and as such constitute the board of commissioners of public buildings for said state of Oregon, and as such board are bound to expend large sums of the moneys of plaintiff, to be raised by taxation, for the purposes herein-after more fully stated, which expenditures the plaintiff alleges are unlawful, and repugnant to the organic law of the state of Oregon, namely: The said board, by virtue of the powers vested in them as such board, are about to expend large sums of money belonging to the plaintiff in the purchase of lands at some point east of the Cascade mountains for the purpose of constructing what is alleged to be a branch asylum in the eastern portion of said state, as one of the public institutions of the state, which said act of the defendants aforesaid they claim to exercise under and by virtue of a so-called act of the legislative assembly of the said state purporting to have been passed by said legislature at the 17th biennial session thereof, which said act was filed in the office of the secretary of state on the 21st day of February, 1893. That, of the aforesaid moneys of the plaintiff, said defendants propose to, and, unless restrained by this honorable court, will expend of the moneys of the plaintiff then claimed to have been appropriated, and also subsequently appropriated by the 18th biennial session of said legislature, the sum of $165,000, in the construction of said buildings and fitting the same for use, and for lands on which to erect said buildings. That the said defendants, as such board, threaten to, and are about to, appoint three citizens of the state of Oregon, to be known as supervisors of the work of constructing such buildings, in some of the counties east of the Cascade mountains, more than 300 miles from the seat of the government of said state, which said alleged supervisors are to have charge of the work of constructing such buildings on lands to be purchased and paid for by them of the moneys of the plaintiff, and threaten to, and are about to, direct said supervisors to expend large sums of money belonging to the plaintiff aforesaid in advertising for plans and specifications for such buildings, and are about to proceed to construct, in pursuance of said so-called act of said legislature aforesaid, a branch insane asylum and a public institution, together with outbuildings, excavations, and appurtenances thereto which, in the judgment of said alleged supervisors, may be necessary, under the direction and supervisory control of the defendants hereinbefore named, and are about to expend, of moneys of the plaintiff aforesaid, the sum of $1,500, to the said so-called supervisors, for their alleged services in the construction of said work. That the said defendants, as such board, propose to, and unless restrained will, if said buildings are permitted to be constructed and erected, employ a superintendent to conduct said institution, at a salary of $2,500 per annum, and assistant physicians and attendants, all to be allowed the same compensation now fixed by law for like officers and attendants at the state insane asylum at Salem. That the said proposed expenditures of the plaintiff's moneys aforesaid, if permitted, would be contrary to law and the Constitution of the state of Oregon, in that the said institution is not being constructed at the seat of government of the said state, but more than 300 miles therefrom; that the expenditures extend to the equipping, furnishing, officering, and maintaining the same, and will greatly increase the burden of taxation, and require the expenditure of $100,000 more than would be necessary to expend in the construction of like buildings at the seat of government. And the plaintiff further alleges: That the annual cost of maintaining the same after it is equipped and ready for use will be $50,000 per annum more than would be necessary to be expended in maintaining like services for the unfortunate insane of said state, if the same facilities are provided therefor in connection with the institution now in operation at the seat of government. That, unless restrained by this honorable court, the defendants will purchase and pay for the lands aforesaid; contract therefor, and build, and pay for said building; appoint the supervisors, and employ superintendents, physicians, and attendants, upon salaries as aforesaid,—all to be paid out of the public funds of the state of Oregon, raised by taxation, thereby greatly increasing plaintiff's burden of taxation, to the great and irreparable injury of plaintiff. That plaintiff has no plain, speedy, or adequate remedy at law for the redress of the grievances herein complained of. Wherefore plaintiff prays that an injunction may issue restraining the defendants and their agents, servants, and attorneys, from using the moneys of the plaintiff for any of the purposes which they propose, as specified in the complaint, and that on final hearing said injunction be made perpetual, and for such further order or relief as may be meet with equity, and also for costs and disbursements.

James McCain, District Attorney for the Third Judicial District.

H. J. Bigger and W. H. Holmes, Attorneys for Plaintiff.

State of Oregon, } ss:
County of Marion, }

I, A. C. Taylor, being first duly sworn, say that I am the person commencing the above action as relator for and in behalf of the state of Oregon; that I have read the foregoing complaint, and know the contents thereof; that I believe said complaint to be true.

A. C. Taylor.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 2d day of March, 1895.

Webster Holmes,
Notary Public for Oregon.

[Seal.]

The defendants demurred to the complaint upon the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of suit, which demurrer being overruled, the defendants answered. A trial was had upon the issues thus joined, resulting in a decree in accordance with the prayer of the complaint, from which defendants appeal.

Messrs. George G. Bingham and J. C. Moreland, for appellants:

Injunction will not lie to restrain executive action.

Messrs. James S. McCain, District Attorney, H. J. Bigger, and William H. Holmes, for respondent:

The appellants are acting without authority of law, and in violation of the Constitution of the state of Oregon, and may be enjoined like other corporate officers from wasting public funds in doing that which the law gives them no authority to do, or for proceeding in a manner contrary to that prescribed by law.

The relator need not be the real party, or have any special interest to enforce a public right, but as a voter and citizen he has a general interest in the execution of the law.

State v. Ware, 13 Or. 380.

The same rule applies in this case as in an application for mandamus.

The relator need show no further interest than that of a citizen interested in having the law enforced or observed, or an unlawful act enjoined.

Injunction is the proper, in fact the only, remedy, as the appellants have acted, and purpose and threaten to act, in violation of the Constitution and the rights of the people, who have only the remedy of injunction.

Article 14, section 3, of the Constitution of the state of Oregon provides that all the public institutions in the state, hereafter provided for by the legislative assembly, shall be located at the seat of government.

The act by which the legislative assembly sought to authorize the appellants to locate a site, and erect one of the public institutions of the state in eastern Oregon, was clearly unconstitutional and void.

Wolverton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

When this case was here before (26 Or. 205, 25 L. R. A. 862), we held that a private individual could not have public officers enjoined from using public funds, unless it could be shown that some civil or property rights were being invaded, or, in other words, that the individual was going to get hurt by the transaction. Upon that principle it was decided that he should be required to show that the location and building of the branch asylum in eastern Oregon would be attended with greater cost and expense than if constructed at the capital, thereby increasing the burden of taxation which would be imposed upon him, with others, whose duty it is to contribute to the support of the government. It was also held that the state, suing in its corporate capacity for the protection of its property rights, stood in no different or better position in this regard than an individual. This doctrine is supported by high authority. Allen, J., in People v. Canal Board, 55 N. Y. 395, says: "When the state as plaintiff invokes the aid of a court of equity, it is not exempt from the rules applicable to ordinary suitors; that is, it must establish a case of equitable cognizance, and a right to the particular relief demanded." And as is said by the same eminent jurist in People v. Ingersoll, 58 N. Y. 14, 17 Am. Rep. 178: "A distinction is to be observed between actions by the people or the state, in right of the prerogative incident to sovereignty, and those founded upon some pecuniary interest or proprietary right. The latter are governed by the ordinary rules of law by which rights are determined between individuals." To the same effect is the doctrine announced in People v. Fields, 58 N. Y. 514. See also 2 High, Inj. § 1327. So that we then concluded the plaintiff herein occupied no better or superior position, from a legal standpoint, for enforcing the remedy sought to be invoked, than the plaintiff in Sherman v. Bellows, 24 Or. 553. From this position we see no sufficient reason for receding, as we believe it to be sound in law, and supported upon reason and authority. It is insisted that the decision in White v. Multnomah County Comrs. 13 Or. 317, 57 Am. Rep. 20, stands in the way of this position, but we do not think so. White had a private interest to subserve in bringing the suit. The increase of the burden of taxation consequent upon maintaining the machinery necessary to secure a registration of voters under the law was sufficient to give him a standing in court to restrain the invasion of a private right. See Fletcher v. Tuttle, and Blair v. Hinrichsen, 151 Ill. 41, 25 L. R. A. 143. But the question touching the power of the court to interfere by injunction in restraint of the action of the county commissioners was not mooted at the hearing, and was not a point in controversy, although jurisdiction was necessarily assumed before the ultimate question in the case could have been decided. So the case is not in point, nor is it controlling here.

It is stoutly contended that it is shown by the evidence taken and submitted that the relator will be damaged by reason of the location and construction of the branch asylum at Union, under the rule above established. We have carefully examined all the testimony found in the record, and are unable to concur with this view. The whole theory of the relator, by which he seeks to establish injury, is based upon the assumption that the legislative and executive departments of the state will, in the event that the location and construction of the branch asylum is restrained, provide ways and means for the construction of such institution upon what is known as the "Cottage Farm,"—a tract of land now belonging to the state, and situate some 6 miles from the capital,—and thereby prevent the necessity of purchasing and acquiring other lands upon which to establish and construct such buildings; that they will utilize in connection therewith certain outbuildings now in use by the state, and the expense of constructing other like buildings; and that, by reason of the proximity of such location to the present state asylum, they could dispense with the cost of an additional superintendent and some additional physicians and assistants. But who can say that the legislature would be content to build the branch asylum at the Cottage Farm, or that it would see fit to utilize the outbuildings now in use in connection therewith, or that it would not, in any event, provide for the employment of an additional superintendent, and other physicians and assistants? The matter is of such vital and public concern, and attended with such diverse and dependent circumstances, and so wholly and peculiarly within the province of the legislature to devise the ways and means, that it would be but a conjecture at best to attempt to determine in advance the result of its deliberations in this respect. If the conditions assumed were established, then the question might possibly be capable of demonstration; but where the establishment of these conditions is first left to a body with discretionary powers, the ultimate question for the court to pass upon becomes speculative, and too remote for practical solution and determination. So we are constrained to pass the point without further comment touching the evidence submitted.

But it is now contended for the first time that this is a suit by the state in the right of a prerogative incident to sovereignty; that it was instituted by the law officer of the state in the interest of the whole people, and being so instituted, the high prerogative powers of government are set in motion, and that the courts of appropriate jurisdiction will take cognizance to control the officers of state from acting in violation of duties imposed upon them by law, and more especially where they sustain trust relations to the whole people,—not in the sense that a public office is a public trust, but as it pertains to the public funds of the people, raised by taxation, and intrusted to their management and control under the laws of the state. Under the common law, suit was instituted in behalf of the Crown, or of those who partook of its prerogative, by the attorney general, who made his complaint to the court purely by way of information. A private person, having cause to complain in a court of equity, proceeded by written statement of his cause, which was called a "bill in chancery." In all cases of suits which immediately concerned the rights of the Crown, its officers proceeded upon their own authority, without the intervention of any other person; but, where the suit did not immediately concern the rights of the Crown, they generally depended upon the relation of some person whose name was inserted in the information, and who was called the "relator." It sometimes happened that the relator had an individual interest in the matter in dispute, as where he was entitled to compensation for an injury. In such a case his personal complaint was joined to and incorporated with the information given to the court by the Crown officer. These together comprised what is known and termed as an "information and bill." It was the general practice, where suits immediately concerned the right of the Crown, for the Crown officers to proceed without a relator; yet by reason of a prerogative of the Crown not to pay costs to a subject, except in certain cases, sometimes, through the tenderness of the officers towards the defendant, the interposition of a relator was required, against whom the costs were taxed in case it appeared that the suit was improperly instituted or prosecuted. The introduction of a relator was a mere act of favor on the part of the Crown and its officers. Story, Eq. Pl. 9th ed. §§ 7, 8; 1 Dan. Ch. Pr. 2, 3, 7, 11, 12; State v. Dayton & S. E. R. Co. 36 Ohio St. 434; Atty. Gen. v. Delaware & B. B. R. Co. 27 N. J. Eq. 631. In Atty. Gen. v. Dublin, 1 Bligh, N. R. 312, Lord Redesdale says: "The relator is introduced properly by the attorney general, that there may be some person responsible for the costs of the proceedings, if finally there should be an opinion in the court that the information has been improperly instituted, or if in the course of the proceedings it should be in any manner improperly conducted. It is for the benefit of the subject that the attorney general in all those proceedings provides persons to be responsible as relators in the information, that the court may award against them what the court cannot do against him." So that the relator, where the proceeding immediately concerned the rights of the Crown, except so far as to stand sponsor for costs in case the Crown officers were unsuccessful in the suit, had no personal right or authority to become a party to the proceeding, either by relation or otherwise. It was only in cases where he had some private or individual interest to subserve, either in conjunction with the rights of the Crown, or wherein it was the province of the Crown to protect the rights of its subjects, acquired from it by grant or otherwise, that he could as a matter of right, interpose, as a relator, through the attorney general, to set in motion the machinery of the court.

The case stands different in mandamus proceedings. There a private person may, in behalf of the public, and without showing any individual or special interest to be subserved, become a relator, and, through the proper state officer, institute the proceeding. Although the authorities are much divided it is settled in this state that "where the question is one of public right, and the object of the mandamus is to procure the enforcement of a public duty, the people are regarded as the real party, and the relator, at whose instigation the proceedings are instituted, need not show that he has any legal or special interest in the result; it being sufficient to show that he is a citizen, and as such is interested in the execution of the law." State v. Ware, 13 Or. 383; High, Extr. Legal Rem. § 431. But in equitable proceedings, where the immediate rights of the Crown were alone concerned, we have seen that the attorney general only could invoke the action of the courts through the instrumentality of an information, and, if a relator was made a party, it was at his discretion that there be some one to stand responsible for the costs; the relator, as of right having no interest in the proceeding, and no power or authority to direct or control the suit in any particular whatever.

The attorney general could, at common law, by information in chancery, enforce trusts and prevent public nuisances and the abuse of trust powers. People v. Miner, 2 Lans. 396. His supervision, through equitable instrumentalities, of public trusts, and his authority to prevent the abuse of trust powers public in their nature, were apparently the outgrowth of equitable interposition regarding charitable uses. It was formerly held that it was the source from which the funds were derived, and not the purpose for which they were dedicated, that constituted the use charitable. Atty. Gen. v. Heelis, 2 Sim. & Stu. 77. But subsequently it was settled that the purpose to which the funds were dedicated was the real criterion by which the charitable use was to be determined. And this enlargement of the principle governing charitable uses extended equitable jurisdiction to public trusts involving all funds raised by taxation or otherwise for public purposes. Atty. Gen. v. Brown, 1 Swanst. 265; Atty. Gen. v. Dublin, 1 Bligh, N. R. 312; Atty. Gen. v. Eastlake, 11 Hare, 218-221. In the latter case it was declared that the attorney general was the proper person to represent those who were interested in having these public funds faithfully applied to the general and public purposes for which they were provided and intended. Allen, J., in People v. Ingersoll, supra, says: "It is well settled in England that, in right of the prerogative of the Crown, the attorney general, in his name of office, may proceed, either by information or by bill in equity, to establish and enforce the execution of trusts of property by public corporations, to prevent the misappropriation or misapplication of funds or property raised or held for public use; and the abuse of power by the governors of corporations or public officers, or the exercise of powers not conferred by law, and, generally, to call upon the courts to see that right is done to the subjects of the Crown who are incompetent to act for themselves. Ordinarily, the remedies sought have been preventive, but in some cases, as incident to the preventive and prospective relief, a claim has been made for retrospective relief, especially when the misappropriated funds could be traced and reclaimed in specie. The jurisdiction has been sustained upon the general principles of the right and duty of the court to grant preventive relief, and the relief actually granted, if any, in addition and as incident to that, has depended upon circumstances." But in all cases the court's action was invoked against faithless trustees to compel a proper execution of the trust, and the right use of trust funds, at the hands of those charged with its administration. A breach or violation of public duty enjoined upon those with whom the trust and the execution thereof are confided or committed, either actual or threatened or impending, is at the foundation of every action by the attorney general or of the Crown, or the people as sovereign and essential to the right of either to maintain, as well as the right of a court of equity to entertain jurisdiction of, a suit by either touching property or funds held by public or municipal corporations for public use. These principles thus established in England have been affirmed to some extent by the courts of this country, and applied in like cases. In People v. Ingersoll, supra, it is further said: "Doubtless, the prerogatives of the Crown, except as affected by constitutional limitations, exist in the people as sovereign, but to what extent the exercise of this prerogative is committed to the public officials, either by the legislature or by the common law, is a question worthy of grave consideration, and not to be lightly decided, and should only be determined when necessary to a judgment and decision. . . . If there were no other remedy for a great wrong, and public justice and individual rights were likely to suffer for want of a prosecutor capable of pursuing the wrongdoer and redressing the wrong, the courts would struggle hard to find authority for the attorney general to intervene in the name of the people." The doctrine is broadly asserted in Missouri, where it is held that it is competent for the state, through its authorized officers, to proceed in equity in restraint of public corporations doing acts in violation of the Constitution and laws of the state. State v. Saline County Ct. 51 Mo. 350. But the case made was for a misappropriation of public funds in subscriptions to a railroad company, which funds were to be raised by assessment and taxation of the people of Saline county. So that the case is authoritative only upon the power of a court of equity, through its injunctive process, to restrain public officers in the misapplication and misappropriation of public funds instituted at the instance of the executive or law officers of the state. The decision is, however, based, to a large extent, upon a statute providing that "the remedy by writ of injunction or prohibition shall exist in all cases where an injury to real or personal property is threatened, and to prevent the doing of any legal wrong whatever, whenever, in the opinion of the court, an adequate remedy cannot be afforded by an action for damages." 2 Wagner, Stat. p. 1032. Bliss, J., in that case, admits that he found some difficulty in regard to the question whether injunction would lie at all, but concludes that, both upon reason and authority, "when the wrong is a public one, suit may be brought in the name of the state, by its proper representative, and under our statute that representative is the circuit attorney." See also State v. Dayton & S. E. R. Co. supra; State v. Curators State University, 57 Mo. 178; State v. McLaughlin, 15 Kan. 228.

The Wisconsin cases, though not authority here, serve to illustrate the question touching sovereignty and prerogative appurtenant thereto, and the use of the extraordinary remedy by injunction, when it is invoked in the service of a sovereign state and in the interest of the whole people, as distinguished from its ordinary use, or coupled with ordinary equitable proceedings. It may be said here that injunction, in itself, is not prerogative or jurisdictional. It was issued in cases where the court had jurisdiction otherwise as preliminary or interlocutory to the final decree, or to give effect and permanency to such a decree. It was remedial and in aid of jurisdiction already attached within the vast range of equitable cognizance. Not so with mandamus, habeas corpus, and quo warranto. They were common-law prerogative writs, which "appertain to and are peculiarly the instruments of the sovereign power, acting through its appropriate department; prerogatives of sovereignty, represented in England by the King, and in this country by the people in their corporate character, or in other words, the state." Atty. Gen. v. Blossom, 1 Wis. 278. It has been said that injunction and mandamus are correlative in their operation; that where the one commands the other forbids; that, where there is nonfeasance, mandamus compels the duty, and, where there is malfeasance, injunction will restrain. But this is so in manner only. Injunction is frequently mandatory, and mandamus sometimes operates as a restraint. Aside from this, the injunctive writ, not being jurisdictional, but remedial, in its operation, a case of well-established equitable cognizance must be presented before its use and adaptation would become appropriate, and it is not every restraint which may seem beneficial as a remedy that the writ will enforce. For instance, some civil or private right must be about to be invaded, or some matter of public trust or concern, of which equity takes cognizance, must be deleteriously involved or affected, before injunction can be brought into requisition. So that it is apparent that it is not every case wherein mandamus will command that injunction will, in contrast, restrain. By reason of a provision in the Wisconsin Constitution conferring original jurisdiction upon the supreme court "to issue writs of habeas corpus, mandamus, injunction, quo warranto, certiorari, and other original and remedial writs, and to hear and determine the same," it has been there held that injunction is a quasi prerogative writ, and founds jurisdiction as if it were an original writ, whenever a question arises appropriate to its use, which "should be a question quod ad statum reipublice pertinet; one affecting the sovereignty of the state, its franchises or prerogatives, or the liberties of its people." Atty. Gen. v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 35 Wis. 513; Atty. Gen. v. Eau Claire, 87 Wis. 425; State v. Cunningham, 81 Wis. 440, 15 L. R. A. 561. Notwithstanding this constitutional provision, the earlier cases sought for equitable grounds in support of the injunctive writ. For instance, in Atty. Gen. v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. supra, it was argued that courts of equity have no jurisdiction, at the suit of the attorney general, to enjoin usurpation, excess, or abuse of corporate franchise. The court, after a careful review of the authorities, both English and American, concluded that the jurisdiction exists in this country as well as in England, and says: "The equitable jurisdiction by injunction goes upon the ground of nuisance. As, indeed, any intrusion upon public right is in the nature of purpresture. The ancient jurisdiction to restrain nuisance is perhaps the most direct ground of the modern jurisdiction under consideration. And the former is fully asserted as an American jurisdiction, as to remedies both by private persons and by the attorney general for the public," citing 2 Redf. Railways, 307, and 2 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 920-928. And so in Atty. Gen. v. Eau Claire, supra, which involved the damming of a public river by the city of Eau Claire, the court, considering such an encroachment as a purpresture, and within equitable jurisdiction to enjoin, and as it concerned the sovereign prerogative of the state and the prerogative jurisdiction of the supreme court, declared it to be a fit case for the exercise of its original jurisdiction by the injunctive writ. But in State v. Cunningham, supra, which was a later case involving the constitutionality of the act of apportionment of the state into senatorial and assembly districts, the court placed its jurisdiction, as it had intimated might be done in Atty. Gen. v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. supra, upon the single ground that the Constitution had adapted the writ of injunction to prerogative uses. Pinney, J., says: "It may well be conceded that courts of equity would not, by reason of their original jurisdiction, have authority to interfere by injunction in a case such as this; but it is to be borne in mind that the writ of injunction under our Constitution is put to prerogative uses of a strictly judicial nature, as a remedy of a preventive character in case of threatened public wrong to the sovereignty of the state, and affecting its prerogatives and franchises and the liberties of the people; their rights being protected in this court by information in the name of the state, on relation of the attorney general." The learned judge spoke advisedly when he said "it may well be conceded that courts of equity would not, by reason of their original jurisdiction, have authority to interfere by injunction" in such a case, as indeed there is high authority in support of the concession. Fletcher v. Tuttle, and Blair v. Hinrichsen, 151 Ill. 41, 25 L. R. A. 143, are cases involving similar questions, arising out of the passage of an act to apportion the state of Illinois into senatorial districts, claimed to be unconstitutional and void, but the suits were instituted by private individuals; and it was there decided that, wherever the established distinctions between equitable and common-law jurisdiction are observed, courts of equity have no authority or jurisdiction to interpose for the protection of rights which are merely political, and where no civil or property right is involved. In all such cases the remedy, if there is one, must be sought in a court of law. And the case of State v. Cunningham, supra, is distinguished. Doctrine of similar import is laid down by Chief Justice Fuller in Green v. Mills, 16 C. C. A. 516, 69 Fed. Rep. 852, ante, p. 90,—a very recent and well considered case. But, whatever the true doctrine might be as to the right use of the injunctive writ in cases involving merely political rights, the question is not involved here. These cases operate, however, as powerful factors in determining equitable jurisdiction, and fixing the right use of the injunctive writ. Under the Wisconsin Constitution, injunction being held to be a quasi prerogative writ, its operation becomes correlative with the common-law writ of mandamus, and will lie to restrain excess in the same class of cases that mandamus supplies defect, the use of the one writ or the other in each case turning solely on the accident of overaction or shortcoming of the defendant. But not so where the distinction between the equitable and common-law jurisdiction is still observed, as it is in this state. Hence, if jurisdiction to issue the injunctive writ is to be entertained, it must be based upon some well-defined equitable grounds to support it.

We have seen, however, that in England the equitable jurisdiction to enforce trusts, and prevent public nuisances and the abuse of trust powers, was invoked for prerogative purposes. Whenever necessary, an appropriate injunction was issued in aid of the jurisdiction, and became effective in its exercise. While the writ of injunction is not in itself a prerogative writ, it is put to prerogative purposes when used in aid of equitable jurisdiction invoked for such purposes. We have also seen that in this country the jurisdiction and the writ may be called into requisition for like purposes. Now, when so called into requisition, in cases appropriate for its adoption and use, is there any reason why the remedy thus invoked is not as effective for the accomplishment of like high purposes as the quasi prerogative writ peculiar to the state of Wisconsin under her Constitution? We think that none exists. So, therefore, the lawfully constituted authorities are not without an appropriate remedy in a case where public officials are proceeding in derogation of law in the application and use of public funds, wherever special injury cannot be predicated. The sovereign state, the whole people, have a right to see that the laws are duly executed. In most cases the common-law prerogative writs are appropriate for the accomplishment of such ends. Whether appropriately denominated "prerogative" in the states of the Union, it differs but little. They emanate from a like high source, pertain to sovereignty, and are adapted to like uses and purposes. But, wherever it is necessary to prevent the abuse of trust powers and the misapplication of trust or public funds, the equitable remedy is likewise appropriate, and likewise emanates from the like high source, and is attended with equivalent attributes of power. See People v. Ingersoll, and State v. Saline County Ct. supra. But the rule and the doctrine upon which it is based have their limitations. It is not every class of public officers that may be controlled in any event at the hands of the judiciary. This will become apparent in the further development of the opinion.

We have here to deal with matters not political, but with matters publici juris, and with the acts of public officers touching the administration of public funds, and affecting the whole people, or the state at large. And the question comes to this: Whether the governor, the executive officer of the state, can be enjoined while in the discharge of official duties. We speak of the governor, as it is, in effect, the act of the governor which this proceeding is intended to interdict. True, the act providing for the construction of a branch asylum at Union, and appropriating funds therefor, has empowered the board of commissioners of public buildings of the state of Oregon, consisting of the governor, secretary of state, and treasurer, to superintend the construction thereof; but, in the absence of such a commission, it would be the duty of the governor to see that the law was carried into effect. So that whether the duty is performed by the governor, or by a commission named by the legislature, of which he is a constituent part, and empowered to perform the service, the rules of law touching the interference of the courts with the performance of such duty must be the same, whether required to be performed by the one or the other. The purpose of the legislature was to construct and equip more commodious buildings and apartments for the accommodation of the insane and idiotic of the state. To provide for and take care of this unfortunate class of individuals, both for their own good and protection, as well as for the protection and security of all citizens, is a matter purely of public concern, as it relates to the welfare of the whole people. The subject is one of governmental concern only, and relates entirely to the legislative and governmental departments of state. In pursuance of this purpose, the acts involved here were passed and became law by the approval of the governor. That the legislature had the undoubted right to determine upon the necessity for such additional buildings, and the amount of funds necessary for their construction and equipment, as we have said in our former opinion, no one can dispute. Furthermore, it was entirely within its co-ordinate powers to pass an act locating the branch asylum in the eastern part of the state, and no power vesting in the government could prevent it from so doing, and yet its validity would be determined by the fundamental law, when properly invoked. The governor could prevent its becoming a law by the exercise of the veto power confided to him. But, as above stated, the measure became a law by the approval of the executive. It is the duty of the governor to see that all laws are faithfully executed, and it is now proposed to execute this law. The judicial department is called upon to prevent its execution. Is it competent for it to interpose in this proceeding, and restrain the executive department of the state? It may well be admitted that if the duty pertained to acts which are merely ministerial in their character,—which call for no exercise of judgment or discretion, and do not relate to political or governmental matters,—the governor of the state may, at the suit of interested parties, in a proceeding appropriate for the purpose, be compelled, at the hands of the judiciary, to perform them. Greenwood Cemetery Land Co. v. Routt, 17 Colo. 156, 16 L. R. A. 369; Gaines v. Thompson, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 347, 19 L. ed. 62; Moses, Mandamus, 80; Enterprise Sav. Assn. v. Zumstein, 15 C. C. A. 153, 67 Fed. Rep. 1000; Board of Liquidation v. McComb, 92 U. S. 541, 23 L. ed. 628. But if it pertains to duties which require the exercise of judgment or discretion to perform, or to matters political or governmental in their nature, all the authorities agree that the executive is clearly independent of the other co-ordinate departments of government, and is not subject in any manner to their direct supervision or control. Chief Justice Taney, in Mississippi v. Johnson, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 498, 18 L. ed. 440, says: "A ministerial duty, the performance of which may, in proper cases, be required of the head of a department, by judicial process, is one in respect to which nothing is left to discretion. It is a simple, definite duty, arising under conditions admitted or proved to exist, and imposed by law." This definition of a "ministerial duty" is concurred in by Mr. Justice Miller in Gaines v. Thompson, supra. Now, what is the nature of the duties cast upon the governor by these acts? Are they purely ministerial, or do they belong to the domain of governmental affairs? What is he, or the board of which he is a member, required to do? This latter question answered, the former is answered, also, without the necessity of comment. He shall, within sixty days, locate a site for a branch insane asylum at some point in one of the counties named, lying in the eastern part of the state. He shall contract for and purchase a tract of land at the place selected. He shall hire a competent architect, who shall, under the direction of the board, draw plans, prepare specifications, etc. When completed, the board shall approve, and thereupon shall give notice, and in due time let contracts, etc. In all these prescribed duties there is not a single item that partakes of a ministerial character. They all pertain to executive duties, and are wholly and entirely governmental in their nature and purport. The governor can execute them, or not, at his will, as they fall exclusively within his department of government. To test the question as to whether these enumerated duties are ministerial or governmental, suppose these acts of the legislature were entirely free from doubt touching their constitutional validity, and the governor, or the board acting in his aid, should refuse to execute the requirements thereof; would this court, by a mandamus proceeding, compel him to act? Undoubtedly not, and why? Because the acts required of him do not fall within the domain of those acts which are denominated "ministerial." On the contrary, they are governmental in their nature, pertain to matters publici juris, and affect the welfare of the people at large. Now, for the sake of the argument, concede that the law is unconstitutional, and that injunction is an appropriate remedy, and is competent to restrain where mandamus will compel; could this court with any more propriety or right interfere with the governmental and executive acts of the governor? No one will so contend. Chief Justice Marshall, in Marbury v. Madison, 5 U. S. 1 Cranch, 170, 2 L. ed. 71, says: "It is not by the office of the person to whom the writ is directed, but the nature of the thing to be done, that the propriety or impropriety of issuing a mandamus is to be determined." In People v. The Governor, 29 Mich. 320, 18 Am. Rep. 89, Judge Cooley says: "In many cases it is unquestionable that the head of an executive department may be required by judicial process to perform a legal duty, while in other cases, in our judgment, the courts would be entirely without jurisdiction; and, as regards such an officer, we should concede that the nature of the case and of the duty to be performed must determine the right of the court to interfere in each particular instance." So that, looking to the nature of the thing to be done and the duty to be performed by the governor under the requirements of these acts, there can be but one conclusion in respect to them. Whatever else may be said, they are not ministerial, and hence no judicial process of the courts can issue to compel or restrain, or in any manner affect or interfere with, the executive volition of the governor with respect thereto. The mere fact that a law is alleged to be unconstitutional does not confer jurisdiction upon courts to interfere with the acts of the executive officers while proceeding in pursuance of its requirements. Mississippi v. Johnson, supra. True, the board is empowered to make payment upon contracts as the work progresses, and it is contemplated that such payments and disbursements shall be made out of the public funds so appropriated by the legislature; but neither the governor nor the board can obtain a dollar of such funds without a warrant from the secretary of state, by the very terms of the acts themselves. There is no intimation anywhere that the secretary is about to or is intending to draw, or is contemplating the drawing of, any warrant against such fund, or any public fund of the state. Indeed, the secretary of state, acting in his capacity as such officer, is not a party to the suit.

The judiciary takes cognizance of such proceedings only, if at all, which operate incidentally as a check upon a co-ordinate branch of government. It may, in a proper case, proceed against an officer engaged in the discharge of purely ministerial functions, which may indirectly or incidentally affect the acts of a co-ordinate branch, and even nullify and render them inoperative; but directly, as against officers acting in a political, governmental, or discretionary capacity, it never has and never will, so long as the relative duties and powers of the co-ordinate departments are justly observed. Gaines v. Thompson, supra. Moreover, it is not fit that these great powers pertaining to sovereignty, which affect the whole people alike, and none less nor more than the rest, should be invoked by individual citizens, or by a class or classes, or body corporate, or an aggregation thereof less than the whole state. State officers should not be subjected to the annoyance of a suit at the instance of every individual, when civil or property rights are not invaded, who might conceive that the laws were being improperly administered, or that public funds were not being applied to legitimate public purposes. State government being divided into three co-ordinate branches,—executive, legislative, and judicial,—it is most essential to the preservation of the autonomy of government that there be no encroachment of one branch upon another. And to this end the just limitations of the constitutional powers accorded to either branch should be nicely defined and jealously guarded. But sometimes one branch of government, in the discharge of its co-ordinate functions, oversteps the limit of its constitutional powers. In such a case one or both of the other branches of government may operate as a check upon its action. The legislature may pass an act in disregard of the inhibitions of the Constitution. The executive may veto the measure, or, failing to do so, the judiciary may refuse to recognize it as controlling. The governor acts upon his own motion, and by right of high constitutional powers and privileges reposed in him. The judiciary acts, not upon its own motion, but only when some suitor duly authorized by law presents, in due form, a cause appropriate for its cognizance. Its machinery may be set in motion by private suitors, in some form or another, in all cases where civil or property rights are being invaded or intrenched upon to their injury or damage, be the suitor ever so humble, or the injury to be encountered ever so small; but in all cases of purely public concern, affecting the welfare of the whole people, or the state at large, the court's action can only be invoked by such executive officers of state as are by law intrusted with the discharge of such duties. The attorney general was such an officer at common law. Under the Constitution (art. 7, § 17), the prosecuting attorneys are made the law officers of the state, and of the counties within their respective districts. These officers, says Waldo, J., in State v. Douglas County Road Co. 10 Or. 201, are possessed "with the powers, in the absence of statutory regulation, of the attorney general at common law." When the office of attorney general was created, it was made the duty of the incumbent to "prosecute or defend for the state all causes in the supreme court in which the state is interested." Sess. Laws 1891, p. 188. Whether his duties and powers in any manner supersede those of the prosecuting attorneys, it is not now necessary to inquire; but a vital question here is whether this proceeding has been properly instituted by the law officer of the state, whether he be a prosecuting attorney or the attorney general. The pleading, by virtue of which it is contended the court should take and entertain jurisdiction, may properly be termed a bill in equity by a private individual, to wit, A. C. Taylor, the relator. It is verified by him, and purports to be his bill, and not the information of the district attorney for the third judicial district, although signed by that officer. We have seen that at common law if a private individual had an interest in the proceeding apart from the interest of the government, he might, as relator, have his bill incorporated with the information of the attorney general, which was denominated an "information and bill." In practice, if it should afterwards appear that the relator had no interest to be subserved, the bill was dismissed, and the information retained. Atty. Gen. v. Vivian, 1 Russ. Ch. 236, 237; State v. Cunningham, supra. But do we find here what may be termed an information or bill by the law officer of the state? As such an officer is the only person competent to institute a proceeding of the nature under consideration, the information should show upon its face, in no uncertain manner, that he is the officer instituting and prosecuting the suit, and the sole person responsible for its inception and maintenance. The most common form of instituting like proceedings, it seems, has been in the name of the attorney general. Cosaw Min. Co. v. South Carolina, 144 U. S. 585, 36 L. ed. 543. Less frequently they are brought in the name of the Crown or the state upon the relation of the attorney general. State v. Hibernian Sav. & L. Assn. 8 Or. 896. And, if permissible at all to bring the suit in the name of the state alone, the complaint or information should show upon its face that the appropriate law officer brings the same for or in behalf of the state. The proceeding in either form would fix the responsibility for the maintenance thereof upon that officer, and it is not believed that the mere affixing of his signature in his official capacity to a complaint or bill shown to be the bill of a private relator is sufficient to impress it with the functions and capacity of an information competent to put in motion the machinery of the courts, whereby they will take cognizance of questions pertaining to the high prerogative powers of the state, or affecting the whole people in their sovereign capacity. See State v. Saline County Ct. supra; Bigelow v. Hartford Bridge Co. 14 Conn. 578, 36 Am. Dec. 502; State v. Anderson, 5 Kan. 115; Buck Mountain Coal Co. v. Lehigh Coal & Nav. Co. 50 Pa. 100; Iroquois County Supers. v. Keady, 34 Ill. 296; People v. Pacheco, 29 Cal. 213; Atty. Gen. v. East India Co. 11 Sim. 380; Bobbett v. State, 10 Kan. 15; United States v. Throckmorton, 98 U. S. 70, 25 L. ed. 96.

Having reached these conclusions, the decree of the court below will be reversed and the complaint dismissed. This leaves the constitutional question still undisposed of, and the fact that we would probably not declare the acts to be unconstitutional cannot affect or change our duty in the premises. Courts will not assume to pass upon a question of that character, unless properly before them; and the case at bar, as presented, not being within our jurisdiction to hear and determine, it is clearly not within our province to assume now to decide that question, although of grave public importance. "As a general rule a court will not pass upon a constitutional question and decide a statute to be invalid unless a decision upon that very point becomes necessary to the determination of the cause." Lord, J., in Elliott v. Oliver, 22 Or. 47. We said when this case was here before that "this rule arises out of the due respect which one co-ordinate branch of the state government entertains towards another." The legislature, in adopting laws for the government of the people, does so under its construction of the Constitution, and the just presumption always prevails that the business of the legislature is transacted with due regard to the fundamental law by which its acts are limited and governed. It must be a clear case, therefore, and one in which the constitutional question is the very lis mota, before courts will assume the responsibility of declaring an act of the legislative assembly void upon constitutional grounds, and reverse the judgment of a co-ordinate branch of the state government. The case before us affords a striking illustration of the soundness of this doctrine. The law complained of was passed at two succeeding sessions of the legislative assembly, and received the approval of two executives of the state. By the last act an expenditure of $25,000 under the former, in the purchase of a site for the branch asylum, is approved, as well as all other acts of the board in pursuance of its provisions. At the time of the passage and approval of the latter act this case was pending in the courts, which fact was strongly calculated to attract the attention of both the legislative and executive branches of the state government to the direct point at issue, and it is but just to assume that the question of its constitutionality was duly and carefully considered. Hence the peculiar gravity of our assuming at this time to pass upon the constitutional question so ably and elaborately presented at the hearing. Being inhibited by the rule under discussion, we cannot go into the question.

These conclusions are concurred in by the full bench, but the majority of the court are of the opinion that such conclusions are susceptible of support on other grounds, and in this connection we will proceed to state them. The power of a court of equity, in a proceeding by the attorney general or district attorney to enjoin the issuance of warrants in payment for the Eastern Oregon Asylum,—as is heretofore intimated might be done if it be conceded that the act locating it is in violation of the Constitution,—it is believed, is involved in grave and serious doubt, and, further, the facts in the case do not seem to bring it within any recognized equity jurisdiction. It is not claimed, nor can it be, that the objects and purposes of the acts in question are unconstitutional, or that the defendants threaten to apply the public funds to an unconstitutional use, or to waste or dissipate them. The claim is that the legislature has directed that the branch asylum shall be located at a place other than the seat of government, in violation, as plaintiff claims, of the duty imposed upon it by the Constitution; and this, it is asserted, is sufficient ground upon which a court of equity should assume jurisdiction. This is not enough. The construction and location of public buildings of the character in question are purely a public governmental question, belonging to the legislative and governmental departments, and affect no private or property right. Nor do the facts of this case justify the conclusion, as a matter of law, that it would be of any pecuniary injury to the state. If the legislative and executive departments have misconstrued the Constitution in this regard, their responsibility is to the people. A court of equity cannot for that reason alone assume the right to sit in judgment on their acts. There is no authority to be found in the Constitution or statutes of this state for the exercise of such an extraordinary power, nor is it believed it can be found in the analogies of the common law. In this state the distinction between common law and equity, as a matter of substance, prevails, although both jurisdictions are invested in the same court. Ming Yue v. Coos Bay R. & E. R. & Nav. Co. 24 Or. 392. And, it being well settled that a court of chancery is conversant only with the maintenance of property rights, it has no jurisdiction to interfere with the duties of the other departments of government, except when necessary to the protection of such rights, and cannot even then interfere with the discretion invested in either of such departments. "The office and jurisdiction of a court of equity" says Mr. Justice Gray in Re Sawyer, 124 U. S. 210, 31 L. ed. 405, "unless enlarged by express statute, are limited to the protection of rights of property." And in Sheridan v. Colvin, 78 Ill. 247, it is said: "It is elementary law that the subject-matter of the jurisdiction of the court of chancery is civil property. The court is conversant only with questions of property, and the maintenance of civil rights. Injury to property, whether actual or prospective, is the foundation on which the jurisdiction rests. The court has no jurisdiction in matters merely criminal or merely immoral, which do not affect any right to property. Nor do matters of a political character come within the jurisdiction of the court of chancery. Nor has the court of chancery jurisdiction to interfere with the public duties of any department of government, except under special circumstances, and where necessary for the protection of rights of property." See also Green v. Mills, 16 C. C. A. 516, 69 Fed. Rep. 852, ante, p. 90, and authorities cited by Mr. Justice Gray in Re Sawyer, supra. The several departments of government are each independent of the other. To the judicial department is intrusted the determination of rights and the encroachment of remedies, and, as an incident to the protection of property, a court of equity has the undoubted right to refuse to recognize as valid a clearly unconstitutional act of the legislature, because the Constitution is the paramount law of the land, which every suitor can invoke when an infringement of his rights is threatened under some law in violation thereof. But the mere fact that an act of the legislature is alleged to be unconstitutional gives it no jurisdiction to determine that question. Its duty is to determine actual controversies, when properly brought before it, and not to give opinions upon mooted questions or abstract propositions. Before it can assume to determine the constitutionality of a legislative act, the case before it must come within some recognized ground of equity jurisdiction, and present some actual or threatened infringement of the rights of property on account of such unconstitutional legislation. When the question, as here, is publici juris alone, affects no property rights, and no threatened waste of the public funds is shown, it may be well doubted whether the court has any more power to interfere with the duties of the other departments, on the ground that their acts may be unconstitutional, than it has with their discretionary powers or duties. The independence of the different departments in this respect is so complete that, however ill advised the action of the legislature or executive may be, and no matter how gross an error may be committed, a court of equity is nevertheless powerless to interfere when rights of property are not involved, unless express authority is conferred upon it to do so. The decision of a large class of public questions must, in the very nature of the case, be left to the legislative and executive departments, and when the decision is made it must be accepted as correct. Among these is the construction and location of public buildings, and the presumption is just as conclusive that in the discharge of this duty they observe the provisions of the Constitution as it is that the courts properly interpret that instrument when called upon to do so in discharge of the duty intrusted to them. It is true that by this rule, practically, public or private interests may sometimes suffer in either instance, although theoretically there are no such cases; but, however gross the wrong in fact committed by the other departments, a court of equity is powerless to remedy it, unless property rights are involved, or appeal to the judiciary is given by law. No greater evil could exist, under our form of government, than the usurpation by the judiciary of powers not intrusted to it. It should therefore refuse, under all circumstances, to assume jurisdiction in any case which affects the powers, duties, or prerogatives of the other departments of government, unless its right to do so is so clear as to admit of no reasonable doubt. In the opinion of the majority of the court, this record does not present such a case. No great public wrong is threatened, nor will public justice or individual rights suffer by the execution of the law in question. And, more, it must be admitted that the construction sought to be placed upon the Constitution by the plaintiff is at least open to serious question. It has, for almost a quarter of a century, received a practical exposition to the contrary by the legislative and executive departments, each of which is as much bound to obey the Constitution as the courts; and to this exposition the courts would be bound to yield, in a proceeding properly within their jurisdiction, unless satisfied that it is repugnant to the plain provisions of the Constitution. Indeed, the very act locating the branch asylum at Union, the execution of which is now sought to be enjoined, was passed by the legislature with only three dissenting votes, while this suit was pending, and its constitutional right to enact such a law thereby challenged. Moreover, it was approved by the present executive, whose eminent legal attainments and familiarity with the question (it having been argued before him in Sherman v. Bellows, 24 Or. 553) justly entitle his opinion in the matter to great respect. The court is bound, therefore, to assume that in the opinion of the legislature and executive there is no constitutional inhibition against the passage of such a law, and while none of these facts would excuse the court from assuming jurisdiction, if its right to do so was clear, nor would the exposition given the Constitution by the other departments be absolutely controlling upon it, when called upon, in the discharge of its duty, to construe that instrument, yet they afford a very persuasive argument why the court should not struggle to find some grounds, doubtful at best, upon which it can rest its jurisdiction. Before it could assume the power to question the legality of the action of the other departments of government in such a case its right to do so ought to be beyond all possible question, and it ought to be able to place its jurisdiction upon some well-settled ground for equitable interference, which it is believed cannot be done in this case.

Let an order be entered dismissing the complaint and dissolving the injunction.

FLORIDA SUPREME COURT.

James K. DUKE, Appt.,
v.

Greenfield TAYLOR et al.

(.....Fla.....)

- *1. The domicile and citizenship of a corporation belong to the state under whose laws it is created. It exists only in contemplation of law and by force of the law, and where that law ceases to operate the corporation can have no existence. Hence a corporation must dwell in the place of its creation, and cannot migrate to another sovereignty.
2. Though a corporation must dwell in the place of its creation, its existence there will be recognized in other places, and its residence in one state creates no insuperable objection to its power of contracting in another.
3. Where a corporation has been legally created and organized under the laws of a sister state for the transaction of any business there, it may, by comity existing between the states, transact business in this state, provided it be not in contravention of our laws or public policy.
4. A corporation created under the laws of one state cannot hold corporate meetings in another for the purpose of organizing the corporation, electing its officers, or performing any strictly corporate functions in its organization.
5. The courts will not take judicial knowledge of the laws of another state under which a corporation is claimed to have been created, when the corporate existence is in issue, but proof of such laws must be made in order that the courts may be advised of the legal warrant for the creation of such corporation.
6. A corporation de facto is one where the company has made an effort to organize under some law authorizing the creation of such a corporation, but there is an irregularity in the organization, and where a corporation de facto exists and does legitimate business in its corporate name, the stockholders are not liable as partners. There can, however, be no corporation de facto unless it can exist de jure.
7. An attempted organization of a corporation in this state under a supposed charter obtained under the laws of another state, no authority being shown for the grant of such charter, or of user thereunder in the state of its creation, renders the participants in the attempted organization here liable as partners, on proper demand against such association.
8. One must contract with or deal with an association as a corporation exercising corporate powers before he can be estopped from denying its existence as a corporation.

the amount alleged to be due on a promissory note. Reversed.

Statement by Mabry, Ch. J.:

Appellant instituted suit against appellees, Taylor and fifteen others, as partners doing business as the Florida Orange Hedge Fence Company, on a note as follows:

Orlando, Fla., March 23d, 1887.

Two months after date we, or either of us, for value received, jointly and severally, as principals, promise to pay to the order of Collis Ormsby, at the First National Bank of Orlando, at its office in Orlando, Florida, the sum of $654; and it is further agreed that if this note be not paid at maturity, the same shall draw interest at the rate of 3 per cent per month after maturity until paid, together with an attorney's fee and all costs should said note be collected by law. We each hereby waive all right to any exemption by law and under the Constitution, and permit any legal execution to levy upon whatever we may have to satisfy this note.

Florida Orange Hedge Fence Company,

By its Pres. Jno. W. Childress,

James A. Knox, as Secty & Treas.

Indorsed: Collis Ormsby.

The declaration alleges the transfer and indorsement of the note to appellant before maturity.

Taylor, James A. Knox, and Wiley Abercrombie were served, and they filed pleas as follows: That the Florida Orange Hedge Fence Company was a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Tennessee, and doing business in the state of Florida, and that said company was not then and had never been a partnership. Second, that the note sued on was given by the president and secretary of said corporation for a corporation debt, and that the same was accepted as the note of the corporation, and not as the note of a partnership, and that plaintiff knew when the note was assigned to him that it was a note of a corporation, and he accepted it as such.

Taylor filed two separate pleas, the second one of which was overruled on demurrer and no amendment offered. The plea not demurred to alleges that defendant was not then and had never been a member of any copartnership known as the Florida Orange Hedge Fence Company, and he knew of no such copartnership. Issue was joined upon the pleas recited, and the record shows that the cause was, by consent of parties, submitted to the judge without a jury, upon the plea in abatement, and that the court sustained the plea in abatement and dismissed the cause. The appeal from this decision was entered to the January term, 1892, of this court.

On the trial defendants put in evidence a certified copy of a charter purporting to have been obtained under the general laws of the state of Tennessee for organizing corporations. The alleged charter recites that by virtue of the general laws of the land five persons named were constituted a body corporate by the name of Florida Orange Hedge Fence Company, for the purpose of planting, wiring, trimming, and manufacturing fence; and certain enumerated powers incident to corporations are conferred upon the company. The terms of all officers, not to exceed two years, are to be fixed by the by-laws, and the directors, to consist of five or more members, at the option of the corporation, are to be elected by a majority of votes cast, each share representing one vote. The directors are required to keep a full and true record of all their proceedings, and an annual statement of the receipts and disbursements is required to be copied on the minutes. The books of the corporations are required to show the original or subsequent stockholders, their respective interest, the amount paid on shares, the transfer of stock, by and to whom made, and also other transactions in which a stockholder as creditor might have an interest. The first board of directors was to consist of five or more corporators, and they were to apply for and obtain the charter. The name of the corporation is the Florida Orange Hedge Fence Company, but there is nothing in the grant of powers to indicate that the corporation was organized to do business in Florida, or in any other state than Tennessee. The certified copy of the charter offered in evidence has attached to it a certificate under the hand and seal of the clerk of the county court of Montgomery county, Tennessee; that the named corporators acknowledged the execution of the instrument for the purposes therein contained, and also a certificate from the secretary of state that the charter, with certificate of probate, was received and duly registered by him.

Appellees proved by the deposition of one of the corporators that at least three of them met in Clarksville, Tennessee, soon after the charter was obtained, but the witness was unable to say, as he did not remember, what formalities were had in the way of electing officers. At this meeting the means and methods of operating the company were considered, and a conclusion was reached to go to Florida for the purpose of carrying out the plans of operation. In pursuance of the determination reached, three of the corporators went to Orlando, Florida, and the evidence of this witness, as well as others introduced by appellees, shows that, at the place named in this state, officers for the corporation were elected, stock was issued, the corporation organized and started its business in Orange county, Florida. After the corporation was organized in this state, a record was made upon the books of the company of the meeting in Tennessee, and appellees put this in evidence. It is as follows:

Clarksville, Tenn., February 21st, 1885.

Whereas, C. G. Smith, W. M. Daniel, A. Howell, and H. C. Merritt, of Tennessee, and Samuel Johnson of Kentucky, on the 16th day of February, 1885, obtained a charter for the Florida Orange Hedge Fence Company from the state of Tennessee, which charter is in words and figures following, to wit. (Then follows a copy of the charter with certificates on it, including one from the recorder of Montgomery county, Tennessee, that record of the instrument had been made in his office)

The minute concluded as follows:

And whereas, the said charter provides that said five persons named as incorporators in said charter shall constitute the first board of directors, and in pursuance of the forms granted them, a quorum of said directors this day met in the office of Smith & Lurton, in the city of Clarksville, Tennessee, there being present C. G. Smith, W. M. Daniel, and Samuel Johnson. C. G. Smith was, on motion, made chairman, and, on motion, Samuel Johnson was made secretary. C. G. Smith presented to the board the resignations of A. Howell and H. C. Merritt as directors in the company, which were accepted. Thereupon the board adjourned.

Chas. G. Smith, Chairman, Secretary.

This minute was made from memoranda supposed to have been reduced to writing at the time of the meeting. The testimony further shows that three named corporators, after the meeting in Tennessee, went to Orlando, and, with others, the defendants in the present suit being among them, held meetings, adopted a corporate seal, elected officers, and issued stock to subscribers, and that the parties participating in the organization of the corporation in this state, and acquiring stock therein, did so in good faith, believing that the corporation was legally incorporated. Ormsby, the party to whom the note sued on was given, was secretary under the organization in Florida, and the note was for services due from the company to him as secretary. The organization here continued to do business openly as a corporation under the charter mentioned, but took no steps towards organizing a corporation under the laws of this state by filing articles of incorporation or doing any of the things required to form a corporation here. A witness for appellees stated that the company did business openly and notoriously as a corporation in Orange county, Florida, and that its place of business was near the business house of appellant; that he did not know that appellant knew when he received the note that the company was a corporation, but had reason to believe that he did. Witness was not positive, but was under the impression that the company set some hedge fences for appellant. The effect of the latter's testimony is that he did not know that the Florida Orange Hedge Fence Company was a corporation, and supposed it was a joint-stock company; that Ormsby informed him that the stockholders were individually liable for the payment of the note, and that it was so stated in the articles of agreement. He also stated that "the book he showed it to me in was a large book similar to this" (pointing to the record book of the company). "He turned to the book and read to me in substance as follows: 'The stockholders are severally and jointly liable individually at all times for all money due and owing to laborers, servants, clerks, and operatives of the company.'" It was also shown that the defendants sued were stockholders and members of the company when the note was given.

The other facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. William H. Jewell, for appellant:

The evidence fails to show that the defendants were a corporation; the documentary evidence is insufficient, the various steps incorporating, prescribed by the law of Tennessee, should have been complied with.

Demarest v. Flack, 128 N. Y. 205, 13 L. R. A. 854; Cook, Stock & Stockholders, ed. 1894, § 237.

Mabry, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

One of the pleas in this case, called a plea in abatement, alleges that the Florida Orange Hedge Fence Company was a corporation organized under the laws of Tennessee, and doing business in this state. According to the recognized American doctrine, the domicile and citizenship of a corporation are regarded as belonging to the state under whose laws the corporation is created. In the case of Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 519, 10 L. ed. 274, it is said that "a corporation can have no legal existence out of the boundaries of the sovereignty by which it is created. It exists only in contemplation of law and by force of the law; and where that law ceases to operate and is no longer obligatory, the corporation can have no existence. It must dwell in the place of its creation, and cannot migrate to another sovereignty. But although it must live and have its being in that state only, yet it does not by any means follow that its existence there will not be recognized in other places; and its residence in one state creates no insuperable objection to its power of contracting in another. It is, indeed, a mere artificial being, invisible and intangible; yet it is a person, for certain purposes, in contemplation of law, and has been recognized as such by the decisions of this court." And in St. Louis v. Wiggins Ferry Co. 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 498, 20 L. ed. 192, it is said, in reference to a corporation, that, "it can exercise its franchises extraterritorially only so far as may be permitted by the policy or comity of other sovereignties. By the consent, express or implied, of the local government, it may transact there any business not ultra vires." In recognition of the doctrine announced in the case first cited it was held by this court in Taylor v. Branham, 35 Fla. 297, that a corporation can have no legal existence out of the boundaries of the sovereignty by which it is created. It exists only in contemplation of law, and by force of the law; and where that law ceases to operate, the corporation can have no existence. It must dwell in the place of its creation, and cannot migrate to another sovereignty. And where a number of individuals assume to act in a corporate capacity in a state where they have not been clothed with corporate existence and authority, they cannot there be recognized as a legally constituted corporation, though they may have been duly incorporated in another state, and such persons, in the state where they assume corporate capacity, will be treated as and held to the responsibility of partners. In the case just cited in this court the record showed that there was an attempt at an organization of a corporation in this state under a supposed charter obtained under the general laws of Tennessee without any organization or user in that state. Where a corporation has been legally created and organized under the laws of a sister state for the transaction of any business there, it may, by comity existing between the states, transact business in this state, provided it be not in contravention of our laws of public policy. Our general incorporating laws recognize the transaction of business by foreign corporations in this state, and in the absence of express legislative assertion to the contrary, the courts of this state would be bound to recognize the comity existing among the states. While this is true, it is also well settled that a corporation created under the laws of one state cannot hold corporate meetings in another for the purpose of organizing the corporation, electing its officers, or performing any strictly corporate functions in its organization.

A corporate charter was granted by the legislature of Maine, and the corporators met in New York, accepted the charter, elected officers and a board of directors for the corporation, and it was held in Miller v. Ewer, 27 Me. 509, 46 Am. Dec. 619, that all votes and proceedings of persons professing to act on the capacity of corporations, when assembled without the bounds of the sovereignty granting the charter, are void. The corporators in a charter granted by the state of North Carolina met in Baltimore, Maryland, and accepted the charter, and it was held that the acceptance was invalid, and the corporation had no legal existence. Smith v. Silver Valley Min. Co. 64 Md. 85, 54 Am. Rep. 768. After a corporation had been duly organized in the state of its creation there may be some questions as to the legality of meetings of directors, or even stockholders, without the limit of the state, as to which we express no opinion; but there can be no doubt from the authorities that the first meeting to organize the corporation and elect its first officers must be within the state where it is created. 1 Beach, Priv. Corp. § 286.

In our judgment there was no sufficient proof before the court to sustain the plea in the case before us, that the Florida Orange Hedge Fence Company was a corporation organized under the laws of Tennessee and doing business in Florida. In the first place, the laws of Tennessee, authorizing the formation of such a corporation as the supposed charter purports to create, were not put in evidence so far as the record shows, and we do not see that we can take judicial knowledge of the laws of another state under which a corporation is claimed to have been created. The authorities indicate that proof of such laws must be made in order that the court may see the legal warrant for the creation of such corporations. Holloway v. Memphis, E. P. & P. R. Co. 23 Tex. 465, 76 Am. Dec. 68; United States Bank v. Stearns, 15 Wend. 314; 1 Lawson, Rights, Rem. & Pr. § 344. Conceding that there was legal authority for obtaining the charter in question, the evidence fails to show any organization of the corporation in Tennessee, or any user under the charter in that state; but it does show, in our opinion, an attempted organization in this state under the charter. The first officers were elected here, and the only stock ever issued was in Orlando. The meeting in Tennessee cannot be regarded as resulting in any corporate action to the extent of organizing a corporation under the charter. Taken in connection with what one of the corporators testified, the conclusion is that they determined to come to Florida to carry out the methods and plans of operating the company, and the testimony shows that they did come to this state and attempted to organize by adopting a seal, electing officers, and issuing stock, and although such action on their part appears to have been in good faith, under the belief that the corporation existed, it was ineffectual to accomplish any organization in law. Under the authorities referred to there can be no organization of a corporation in this state under a charter obtained in a foreign jurisdiction to do business there. The present case does not come within the principle decided in Demarest v. Flack, 128 N. Y. 205, 13 L. R. A. 854, where citizens of that state obtained in West Virginia a charter and organized under it for the purpose of doing business in the state of New York. From the evidence produced in this case we are of the opinion that the proceedings on the part of appellees and associates in attempting to organize a corporation in this state were void, and no corporation was in fact organized.

It is contended for appellees that the Florida Orange Hedge Fence Company was, under the organization mentioned, a corporation de facto, and that appellant cannot be permitted to question its existence; and, further, that he is estopped from denying its existence, because both he and his assignor recognized and dealt with the company as a corporation. Cook states, in his book on Stock & Stockholders and Corporation Law, 8d ed. § 233, that "there are many cases to the effect that a corporation creditor seeking to enforce the payment of his debt may ignore the existence of the corporation, and may proceed against the supposed stockholders as partners, by proving that the prescribed method of becoming incorporated was not complied with by the company in question. For instance, it has been held that where the articles of association were signed, but not filed until some time subsequently, debts contracted in the interim might be collected from the stockholders as partners. So also a total failure to file or record the certificate or articles of incorporation has been held to render the members liable as partners; as also an omission of the members to sign and publish the articles of association, or an indefinite statement of where the principal place of business of the corporation is to be." And in § 284 he states that "during the past few years, however, the great weight of authority has clearly established the rule that where a supposed corporation is doing business as a de facto corporation, the stockholders cannot be held liable as partners, although there have been irregularities, omissions, or mistakes in incorporating or organizing the company. The corporation is a de facto corporation where there is a law authorizing such a corporation and where the company has made an effort to organize under that law and is transacting business in a corporate name." The two views here expressed by this author indicate the dividing line between the decisions on the subject. The case of Snider's Sons' Co. v. Troy, 91 Ala. 224, 11 L. R. A. 515, contains a clear statement of the diversity of judicial opinion in reference to the matter. The authorities pro and con, are cited in note to the case of Rutherford v. Hill (Or.) 17 L. R. A. 549, and reported in 29 Am. St. Rep. 596. Conceding that the rule approved by Cook, in § 234, to be the correct one, we do not perceive how an association of persons can exist as a corporation de facto unless they can legally become a corporation de jure. It is stated in Snider's Sons' Co. v. Troy, supra, that "a corporation de facto exists, when from irregularity or defect in the organization or constitution, or from some omission to comply with the conditions precedent, a corporation de jure is not created, but there has been a colorable compliance with the requirements of some law under which an association might be lawfully incorporated for the purposes and powers assumed, and a user of the rights claimed to be conferred by the law — when there is an organization with color of law, and the exercise of corporate franchises." The cases cited in note to Rutherford v. Hill, supra, show that when the organization of a corporation never had any appearance of validity, the participants therein will be held liable as partners. The attempted organization of the corporation in this state under the supposed Tennessee charter was wholly illegal and without any semblance of authority. There is no law in this state, nor in Tennessee, so far as we are advised, to authorize such proceedings, and the claim of the existence of the corporation de facto under it is without support. Neither do we see that the appellant is estopped from proceedings against the appellees as partners. The fact that the note, indorsed to him before maturity, is executed by persons as president and secretary of the company, does not create a presumption that it was a corporation. Clark v. Jones, 87 Ala. 474; Holloway v. Memphis, E. P. & P. R. Co. supra. The body of the note indicates an unusual paper for a corporate body to make, and contains no recital that the company in whose name it was executed was a corporation. There is nothing sufficient to overcome the positive testimony of appellant that he did not know the company was a corporation, or claimed to be a corporation, when he received the note, which was before its maturity; nor does it appear that he contracted with or dealt with the company as a corporation so as to be estopped from gainsaying its existence as a corporation. The facts of the case do not bring it within the principle decided in Booske v. Gulf Ice Co. 24 Fla. 550, and Jackson Sharp Co. v. Holland, 14 Fla. 384, to the effect that one who contracts with an association as a corporation and exercising corporate powers is estopped to deny it.

Objections were made to the admission of certain evidence on the part of appellees, but as the trial was before the judge, without a jury, we have not considered the objections.

On all the evidence proper in the case our conclusion is, that the judgment was wrong, and must be reversed.

It is so ordered.

SOUTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

STATE of South Carolina, Respt.,

v.

Joseph Benjamin GAYMON, Appt.

(.....S. C.)

Jurors cannot act upon their personal knowledge of the mental condition of one accused of perjury, in arriving at a verdict.

NOTE.—The right of jurors to act on their own knowledge of the facts in or relevant to the issue.

I. The general rule.

II. Modifications thereof.

a. In general.

b. As to intoxicating liquors.

c. As to witnesses.

The question of the right of a juror to be called as a witness will form the subject of a future note.

Upon the question of a juror impeaching his own verdict, see notes to Bartlett v. Patton (W. Va.) 5 L. R. A. 523 (1890); Murphy v. Murphy (S. D.) 9 L. R. A. 820 (1890), and Hauk v. Allen (Ind.) 11 L. R. A. 706 (1890).

This note does not include the question of a juror's right to rely upon his own opinion, judgment, and experience in questions involving the assessment of values and damages, but is confined to cases involving the right to consider matters of fact within his personal knowledge which are not disclosed by the evidence.

I. The general rule.

In ancient times the established doctrine in England was that without the production of any evidence whatever by the parties, a jury found their verdict upon their own private knowledge of the facts in controversy, and further had the right to be governed by such private knowledge as well as by the evidence of witnesses delivered in court on the trial, the oath of the jurors to find according to their evidence being considered to mean that they should do so to the best of their own knowledge. Sam v. State, 1 Swan, 61, 65 (1851).

The ancient doctrine was that jurors were to render the verdict as well upon facts within their personal knowledge as upon those derived from the testimony of the witnesses duly sworn and testifying in the case. Schmidt v. New York Union Mut. F. Ins. Co., 1 Gray, 529, 535 (1854).

In the case of Trial of Reading, 7 How. St. Tr. 267 (1679), a jurymen was challenged because he was supposed to know something of the matter. The court stated that for that reason the juries were called from the neighborhood, because they should not be wholly strangers to the facts, but that if cause could be shown that such juror had already given his verdict by his discourse, and that the prisoner was already condemned in his opinion, that such might be a cause of challenge, but although he had discoursed with neighbors as others did, and might believe it, yet he was then to give his verdict upon what he heard upon oath.

The practice of taking jurors from the vicinage seems to have been adopted under the notion that they might thus be the better qualified from their personal acquaintance with the facts, the parties and their witnesses, to decide the case that might be brought before them. Schmidt v. New York Union Mut. F. Ins. Co. supra.

The reason for the English rule was that the jurors were liable to attain for a false verdict, but when the proceedings by attain fell into disuse and a new trial in case of a wrong verdict was introduced, a verdict founded upon the private

(June 27, 1895.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Clarendon County convicting him of perjury. Affirmed.

The exceptions upon which the case was taken to the supreme court were as follows:

"(1) That his honor, the presiding judge, erred in overruling defendant's motion for a knowledge of the jury was excluded and the opposite doctrine obtained, whereby the verdict of the jury must be found upon the evidence delivered to them in court in the presence of the judge and of the parties. Sam v. State, supra.

At the present day it is thought a greater object and more likely to secure the due administration of justice, to submit cases to impartial and unbiased jurors, and that those are less likely to be so who have come from the immediate neighborhood of the parties and have been either eyewitnesses to the facts, or have had their minds imbued with the popular feeling as to the merits of the controversy. Schmidt v. New York Union Mut. F. Ins. Co. supra.

An essential element in the trial by jury is that the verdict shall be rendered according to the facts of the case lawfully produced to the jury, who are sworn to give their verdict according to the evidence, and if they find without evidence or against the evidence, a new trial will be granted, and the jury cannot even render a verdict upon knowledge within their own breasts, and therefore a jurymen having knowledge of facts pertinent to the issue must be sworn. Mitchum v. State, 11 Ga. 615, 633 (1852).

In Clarke v. Robinson, 5 B. Mon. 55 (1844), the court stated that it never was the practice of jurors to act upon their own view of things about which the controversy was had where it was a thing personal, though it was sometimes the case in controversies about real property, but at that time they were triers of the facts, not upon their own knowledge as was previously the case, but upon the testimony of others delivered before them, subject to cross-examination and the scrutiny of the court and jury.

The evidence admitted to the jury should be the sworn evidence submitted in open court, under the safeguards of the law, and open to be sifted by cross-examination liable to be made by countervailing proof on the part of the party who may be affected by it, and such is the rule in both civil and criminal cases. Wade v. Ordway, 1 Baxt, 229 (1872), where a new trial was granted upon the ground that new evidence obtained by one of the jury was imparted by him to his fellows after the retirement of the jury to consider the verdict.

The theory of the jury trial is that all the parties and witnesses are to be heard in open court, in the presence of and under the direction of the presiding judge, and of such cardinal doctrine the law is extremely tenacious and looks with distrust and aversion upon any departure in practice from its strictness. Heffron v. Gallupe, 55 Me. 563, 567 (1868).

The oath of the juror is to decide according to the law and the evidence, given to him according to the rules of evidence in open court, and with the parties face to face, and does not mean evidence given to a juror outside of the court-room to be read and pondered upon in secret, and given to his fellows in deliberation upon the verdict. Ibid.

A jury are by their oaths obliged to go according to the evidence, that is, the evidence given in court; and if a jurymen be prepossessed it is good cause of challenge, which seems to be a proof that new trial, based on alleged error of his honor in charging the jury, in substance, that they could not communicate to one another facts known by any of them, but not brought out on the witness stand, going to show that the defendant was not of sound mind or memory at the time the offense is said to have been committed, and in charging the jury, to wit: 'I charge you that you have no right to make communications to one another of a fact bearing upon the case, either in regard to the competency of the defendant or any other fact. . . . You can't, if you knew the defendant to be perfectly sane at that moment, or if you a juror ought not to give of his own knowledge. Smith, Dormer, v. Parkhurst, Andr. 315, 321.

If a juror does indeed know anything material in the cause he ought to acquaint the court therewith and be sworn as a witness that he may be cross-examined, otherwise he may go upon insufficient and improper evidence. Ibid.

And this is so, for the reason that to permit them to take into consideration evidence not produced upon the trial and without the knowledge or consent of the opposite party is subversive of all rules which govern the admissibility of testimony, and of the right of a fair and impartial trial by jury. Stewart v. Burlington & M. R. R. Co. 11 Iowa, 62, 64 (1860).

Although the weight and credit to be given to the evidence should be judged of by the jury in the light of their own experience, yet that should be done without any addition to, or modification of, it, arising out of the peculiar scientific acquirements or actual knowledge of the facts in controversy by any one or more of their number. People v. Zeiger, 6 Park. Crim. Rep. 355 (1865).

Jurors can undoubtedly, and must, use their judgment more or less concerning documents laid before them, and have it in their power to rely on their own views very much if they see fit, but the law presumes they will act on testimony chiefly, if not entirely, and it will not be presumed that they all have equal knowledge or skill in such inquiries, or that when they consult together the opinions of one would not have more influence than those of another, when the opinions operate as facts in the cause; and if a verdict were formed on statements of material facts by one juror to his fellows, such a verdict is a violation of their oaths, and when opinions are such as to stand in the same light the result is not less dangerous. Re Foster's Will, 34 Mich. 21 (1876).

A case is not to be tried upon the ex parte statement of a juror made where contradiction and explanation are impossible. Simpson v. Kent, 9 Phila. 30 (1871).

Questions of fact are to be decided according to the evidence introduced, and the personal knowledge of a juror cannot constitute a part of the evidence. Gibson v. Carreker, 91 Ga. 617 (1883); Schmidt v. New York Union Mut. F. Ins. Co. 1 Gray, 529, 535 (1854); Wood River Bank v. Dodge, 36 Neb. 708, 715 (1893); Richards v. State, 36 Neb. 17 (1893).

No evidence can be admitted, but what is or might be under the examination of both parties. Gass v. Stinson, 3 Sumn. 98, 104 (1837).

The jury must not add to the evidence admitted by the court upon their own motion after they have retired to their room. Kruidenier Bros. v. Shields, 70 Iowa, 428, 432 (1896).

Jurors cannot go in search of evidence privately, or act upon evidence thus obtained. Winslow v. Morrill, 68 Me. 332 (1878).

The jury may not take into consideration facts known to them personally outside of the evidence produced. Close v. Samm, 27 Iowa, 503, 508 (1869).

So, the jury cannot be permitted, by adding evidence, to make a case different from that which they took with them to their room. Griffin v. Harriman, 74 Iowa, 436, 439 (1888).

If a juror has knowledge of facts not in evidence, the jury have no right to consider them in making up a verdict, and before they can take such facts into consideration the juror should be sworn and testify to the fact precisely as any other witness. Ottawa Gaslight & C. Co. v. Graham, 28 Ill. 73, 81 Am. Dec. 263 (1862).

And such evidence cannot be heard in private by them, either to refresh their memory as to what passed at the trial, or as to any new matter which may arise during their deliberations, for if it is the verdict will be invalid and a venire de novo must be awarded. Stewart v. Burlington & M. R. R. Co. 11 Iowa, 62, 64 (1860).

Any fact pertinent to the issue which the jury are called upon to try cannot be considered unless it is found in the testimony adduced, even though such fact may be known to some one or all of the jury. State v. Jacob, 30 S. C. 131, 136 (1888); State v. Jones, 29 S. C. 233 (1888).

A juror who, after the jury have retired to their deliberations, avails himself of the opportunity of adding to or detracting from the evidence by means of his own peculiar knowledge of the circumstances attending the case submitted, violates his duties and is utterly unfitted for the position. People v. Zeiger, 6 Park. Crim. Rep. 355 (1865).

The oath of a juror will not permit him to find a verdict on what he may think he knows himself. Green v. Hill, 4 Tex. 465, 467 (1849).

Subsequent representations made by jurymen after their departure from the bar ought to be totally disregarded in arriving at a verdict. Rex v. Thirkell, 3 Burr. 1696 (1765).

For the reason that when a juror is to give testimony he must do it in open court. Re Foster's Will, 34 Mich. 21 (1876).

Where a juror knows of a fact material to the issue he must disclose and testify to it in court. Parks v. Boston, 15 Pick. 198, 209 (1834); McKain v. Love, 2 Hill, L. 506, 508, 27 Am. Dec. 401 (1834); Sam v. State, 1 Swan, 61, 65 (1851).

In Benner v. The Hundred of Hartford, Style, 233 (1650), it was said that if a juror desired to give evidence of something in his own knowledge, he should be examined openly in court upon oath, and not privately by his companions in the jury room.

And this is so for the reason that a juror has no right to give testimony or state facts outside of the case made in court to his fellow jurors after their retirement and for their consideration in making up the verdict in the case. Hall v. Robison, 25 Iowa, 91, 93 (1868).

In Trial of Anderson, 7 How. St. Tr. 874 (1680), it was stated that it was not the business or the duty of the court to give any evidence of any fact that they knew of their own knowledge, unless they would be sworn for that purpose, for though they did know it in their own private conscience to be true, yet they were obliged to conceal their own knowledge unless they would be sworn as witnesses.

In Smith v. Hollings, decided in the year 1791, found in a note in 6 How. St. Tr. 1012 (1870), it was stated that where a jurymen has knowledge of any matter of evidence in a cause which he is trying, he ought not to impart the same privily to the rest of the jury, but should state to the court that he had such knowledge and thereupon be examined and subjected to cross-examination as a witness.

If the juror knows of any particular material fact he ought to be publicly sworn so that his evidence like that of other witnesses may first be scrutinized as to its competency and bearing upon the issue, knew him not to be perfectly sane at that time, you can't tell the other jurors so in the jury room: nor you can't, if you knew him to be a man who had no memory, or had knowledge of right and wrong, you can't say so in the jury room, except what you saw upon the stand.' (2) That his honor erred in overrul-ing defendant's motion for a new trial based on alleged error in charging the jury, in substance, that they could not let their personal knowledge of the defendant, or of any fact other than what was proved on the stand, enter into their judgment, save their personal knowledge of the character of the witnesses, for the reason that the court and the parties may know upon what evidence the verdict is rendered. Schmidt v. New York Union Mut. F. Ins. Co. 1 Gray, 529, 535 (1854).

And this rule holds as well upon the ground that the testimony may go to his brethren under the sanction of an oath, as upon the ground that the party against whom it bears may have the privilege of cross-examining, and that the counsel and the court respectively may be informed of the evidence on which the jury is to act and make such use of it as their respective duties may require. Patterson v. Boston, 20 Pick. 159, 166 (1838); Murdock v. Sumner, 22 Pick. 156, 158 (1839).

Such evidence should be so stated in order that the court may judge of its competency, and in order that the court and counsel may have under their consideration the whole of the evidence upon which the verdict was founded. Murdock v. Sumner, supra.

If a jury give a verdict upon their own knowledge, they ought so to state to the court. Wright v. Crump, 7 Mod. 1, 2 (1702).

The same rule, and the reason thereof, hold in the case of a juror having any scientific conclusions bearing upon the controversy and important for the other jurors to know. People v. Zeiger, 6 Park. Crim. Rep. 355 (1865).

The custom of allowing jurors to rely on their own supposed knowledge of facts, or the knowledge of any number of them without being given in evidence, is wrong in principle and exceedingly pernicious in its tendency, as it affords a pretense for disregarding the evidence and relying on their own supposed personal knowledge of the facts disclosed by passion and prejudice. Green v. Hill, 4 Tex. 465, 467 (1849).

Generally a verdict founded on facts first disclosed in the jury room would be bad, although the facts were known to one of the jury, for the reason that it would be unfair not to give the party against whom they operate an opportunity of repelling or explaining them. M'Kain v. Love, 2 Hill, L. 506, 508, 27 Am. Dec. 401 (1834).

Whatever chances and accidents may enter into the determination of causes by jurors, improper outside influences, no matter from what motives they may proceed, cannot be enumerated among the evidence submitted in open court. Simpson v. Kent, 9 Phila. 30 (1871).

Courts should distinctly charge the jury in criminal cases that they must look alone to the testimony adduced in the evidence before them on the trial, and should not permit one of their number to communicate to them any facts in his knowledge not deposited to in court. Morton v. State, 1 Lea, 498 (1878).

And under the Constitution of Tennessee it has been held that what a juror knows of the defendant ought to be proposed and offered in court, and if admissible there rendered in order that it may be observed upon by the defendant's counsel, and a contrary course would be directly against and repugnant to the Constitution of the state, which provides, art. 2, § 9, that "in all criminal prosecutions the accused hath a right to be heard by himself and his counsel, and to meet the witnesses face to face." Booby v. State, 4 Yerg. 111, 114 (1833). And the ruling of the court in the case of Sam v. State, 1 Swan, 61, 65 (1851), is to the same effect, and applies the rule equally to civil and criminal cases.

It is the duty of the jury to be governed by the evidence introduced on the trial and the instructions of the court, otherwise, in case of an erroneous verdict it would be impossible to review the same. Wood River Bank v. Dodge, 36 Neb. 708, 715 (1893).

In Potter v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 21 Wis. 372, 374, 94 Am. Dec. 548 (1867), which was an action to recover damages for the death of the plaintiff's intestate through the defendant's negligence, it was stated that the verdict must be based upon the evidence. The Wisconsin statutes (Rev. Stat. chap. 135, §§ 11, 12) were peculiar and much must be left to the sound judgment and discretion of the jury.

The rule excludes jurors from communicating to each other, for the purpose of influencing their conclusions, the knowledge of any facts and the existence of any scientific opinions bearing upon the questions submitted to their decision. People v. Zeiger, 6 Park. Crim. Rep. 355 (1865).

Under Me. Rev. Stat. chap. 82, § 68, the jury were sworn in all cases betwixt party and party committed to them to give a true verdict therein according to the law and evidence given them. Bowler v. Washington, 62 Me. 302 (1873).

It is not for the jury to believe from other sources that a debt is unsatisfied, but they must found their belief upon the acknowledgment and its references. Finch v. Elliot, 4 Hawks, 61 (1825).

In State v. Cain, 1 Hawks, 352 (1821), it was held that where a bill was found by the same grand jury that made the presentment, upon the testimony of some of their own body not sworn as witnesses, such proceedings were in opposition to N. C. act 1797, chap. 2, § 3, and that the bill must be quashed.

So, in order to vitiate a verdict in such a case it is not for the prisoner to show affirmatively that he was prejudiced by the improper evidence received by the jury, but it is enough that he may have been prejudiced, and the law will so presume. Sam v. State, 1 Swan, 61, 65 (1851).

And where the facts do not inhere in the verdict itself, they will be sufficient to justify the court in receiving the affidavit of jurors to overthrow or set aside the verdict. Perry v. Bailey, 12 Kan. 539 (1874); Johnson v. Husband, 22 Kan. 277 (1879).

In the case of Imprisonment of Bushell, 6 How. St. Tr. 999, 1012 (1870), Vaughan, 135, error was assigned from the judgment of the common bench, the issue being whether feoffment was made. One of the jury in conferring upon the verdict showed to the rest an "escrow pro petentibus" not given in evidence by the parties, per quod, they found for the demandant. It was held such evidence could not be received and showed misconduct on the part of the juror.

II. Modifications thereof.

a. In general.

A distinction has been taken as to a juror applying his own general knowledge and experience to the examination of the case in estimating the weight of the evidence and in assessing damages, and while to this extent a juror may properly call to his aid his personal knowledge, learning, and experience, yet he cannot act upon his knowledge of a particular fact known only to himself and not a matter of common observation or general knowledge. Schmidt v. New York Union Mut. F. Ins. Co. 1 Gray, 529, 535 (1854).

If a given fact has become sufficiently notorious to be taken judicial notice of without proof, jurors and in charging the jury as follows: 'You are not governed by personal knowledge, but by the testimony adduced on the stand.'

Mr. M. C. Galluchat, for appellant:

Under the doctrine of "Jury from the vicinage" our courts allow the juror's individual knowledge of character to enter into his judgment in determining the credibility of witnesses.

If, then, the juror is allowed to let his individual knowledge of character—the moral condition of the spirit—enter into his judgment, surely he should be allowed to let his individmay act upon it without proof. State v. Maine C. R. Co. 86 Me. 309, 312 (1894).

A jury must in some degree act on their own knowledge of the parties and their witnesses. M'Kain v. Love, 2 Hill, L. 506, 508, 27 Am. Dec. 401 (1834).

It is proper for the jury to apply to the facts proved their general knowledge as intelligent business men, and they must test the truth and weight of evidence, and what it proves by their knowledge and judgment derived from experience, observation, and reflection. Kitzinger v. Sanborn, 70 Ill. 146 (1873).

In King v. Sutton, 4 Maule & S. 582 (1815), upon an information for publishing a malicious and seditious libel, it was held it was not a misdirection if the judge referred the jury to their own knowledge of any facts which had been proved as matters of illustration only, and not as matter of evidence.

The general rule that a jury is not at liberty to consider any fact pertinent to the issue, unless it is found in the testimony adduced, even though such fact be known to some one of them, does not forbid a juror, in weighing the credibility of the testimony, from taking into consideration his own knowledge of the character of the witness delivering such testimony. State v. Jacob, 30 S. C. 131, 136 (1888).

Again, in construing and applying testimony, reasonable inferences and deductions may be made by the jury, and conclusions may be reached that lie quite beyond the mere letter of the evidence. White v. Hammond, 79 Ga. 182 (1887).

It has been held that the statement of a member of a jury to other jurors, that the defendant had previously been in the penitentiary, will not, in the absence of a showing that the remark prejudiced the defendant, be a ground for the reversal of the judgment. Parker v. State (Tex.) 30 S. W. 553 (1895).

So, important inferences may be drawn when there is no direct proof of the fact, and the distinction is between mere conjectures and inferences which the facts and circumstances naturally suggest; and it is no more the duty of the jury to refrain from supplying missing links in the testimony by mere conjecture than it is to draw such inferences as arise naturally and satisfactorily out of the facts and circumstances in proof. Smith, P. & Co. v. Jernigan, 63 Ala. 256 (1887).

And where the statements made in the jury room among the jurors had no relation to the merits of the case, and were not of a character which would influence a conscientious juror, it was held they had no effect upon a verdict such as would ground a motion for new trial. State v. Cowan, 74 Iowa, 53 (1878).

Again, where in an action to determine the right to the possession of a certain drug stock under a chattel mortgage the court instructed the jury that the description in the mortgage "was sufficiently specific to cover and embrace all property or goods sold by the plaintiff which were of the kind, nature, and description usually and ordinarily kept in a drug stock, and that the plaintiffs could not recover under the mortgage any furniture or fixtures, or for any goods or property not ordinarily and usually understood as being included in the term "drug stock," the court held that it was a matter of common observation that such articles as were enumerated in the invoice produced in the case were usually kept for sale in connection with drugs in retail drug stores, and that the jurors might, in such a case, act upon matters of common knowledge. Kern v. Wilson, 82 Iowa, 407 (1891).

In State v. Intoxicating Liquors, 73 Me. 278 (1882), it was held that the initials C. O. D. when affixed to packages sent by a common carrier meant collect on delivery, or, more fully stated, delivered upon payment of the charges due the seller for the price and the carrier for the carriage of the goods, and that such initials had a fixed and determinate meaning which courts and juries might recognize from their general information, and that such letters being notorious needed no proof.

An instruction to the jury that in considering the evidence they might bring to its consideration, in determining the weight to be given to it, such general practical knowledge as they might have upon the subject, would not transgress the rule of law applicable to the case. Douglass v. Trask, 77 Me. 36 (1885).

The habits and general characteristics of domestic animals, such as are liable to take fright and run away, are matters of which a jury may act upon their common observation and general knowledge. State v. Maine C. R. Co. 86 Me. 309, 312 (1894).

So, the fact that horses are liable to be frightened by locomotive engines and moving trains of cars, and that collisions at highways are often caused thereby, are facts sufficiently notorious to be taken judicial notice of; and it is not error in the trial of a cause for an injury so received to instruct the jury that in weighing the evidence and determining what was the real cause of the accident, they may call to their aid their observation and general knowledge of such matters. Ibid.

Therefore in an action against a railroad company for negligently causing death at a railroad crossing by frightening the deceased's horse by the company's locomotives, the jury cannot make use, in arriving at their verdict, of any knowledge that they may have of that particular accident, but they can make use of their general knowledge of the character and habits of horses and how such accidents are liable to be produced. Ibid.

An instruction to the jury that in determining the questions of fact upon the evidence before them, they may apply their own practical knowledge upon such subjects, is not error, as it does not permit them to rely upon facts not in evidence or to decide the matters at issue upon their own private knowledge, but simply as men of affairs to judge of the questions of fact in issue in the light of their own experience. Johnson v. Hillstrom, 37 Minn. 122 (1887).

In Swain v. Fourteenth Street R. Co. 93 Cal. 179 (1892), it was held that the fact that street cars were easily and readily stopped was one of common knowledge which the jury might properly consider without any other evidence of its existence in an action against a street-car company for negligence, and the instruction in that case, which left the jury entirely free to draw from the fact alluded to, such inference as they thought proper, and contained no expression or intimation of the opinion of the court as to the weight which should be accorded to it in their deliberation, was not error.

In an action for seduction, it was held competent for the jury to use their knowledge of human ual knowledge of sanity or insanity—the mental condition of the spirit—enter into his judgment also.

M'Kain v. Love, 2 Hill, L. 506, 27 Am. Dec. 401.

Mr. Joseph F. Rhame, for respondent:
The law in its wisdom places no reliance upon unsworn testimony. Two of the main securities which the law provides for the truth of testimony in judicial proceedings are that it be delivered, first under the religious or moral sanction of an oath, affirmation, or declaration, and next at the risk of a prosecution for perjury.

2 Taylor, Ev. pt. 3, § 1878.

Receiving evidence out of court is improper nature and of the customs of society in their efforts to interpret conduct, and judge of its indications, and it was further held that they could and ought to use their knowledge in passing on the question whether a particular woman was virtuous, but had no right to use it to determine what a virtuous woman was, as that question was not for their decision. O'Neill v. State, 85 Ga. 383, 410 (1890).

Where, upon an indictment for bigamy, one of the jurors stated in the jury room that he knew the accused had at least three wives, and such statement was proved by the affidavit of a party to whom the jury told it after the conviction, stating at the same time that the statement procured the conviction, the court held that however improper it might be for jurymen to discuss in their deliberations anything outside of the testimony, it would be erecting too high a standard and would result in a defeat of justice to set aside their verdicts because they would do so, and the surmise of the juror in that case that the facts stated by him had caused the conviction could not be considered by the court. Taylor v. State, 52 Miss. 84, 87 (1876).

So, it has been held that the court will not reverse a judgment, even in a criminal case, upon the ground of misconduct of the jury in the matter of receiving information derived from particular jurors. State v. Schaefer, 116 Mo. 96 (1893).

An instruction upon a trial for murder "that a juror could neither consider any fact which comes within his personal knowledge, nor could he communicate it to the other jurors without being in contempt of court and violating his solemn oath," is correct, as the whole context shows that the judge's remarks apply only to some facts alleged to have been known to one of the jurors. State v. Jones, 29 S. C. 201 (1888).

Where the error assigned was that, after the jury had retired from the bar to consider their verdict upon an indictment for murder, one of their number made a statement as to his own knowledge to his fellow jurors, to the effect that the prisoner was a violent man, and had stabbed other persons and should not be turned loose upon the community, the court held there was no error, and affirmed the judgment, the statement being verified by the affidavit of the prisoner alone. Nolen v. State, 2 Head, 520 (1859).

In Austin v. State, 42 Tex. 355 (1875), a statement by one juror to one of his fellow jurors after their retirement, with respect to the accused's character, was held not such misconduct as fell within the provisions of the Texas statutes regarding new trials, as in order to bring the case within the provisions of the article of the statutes it must be shown that the defendant had not received a fair and impartial trial by reason of the juror's conduct. The article in question is §137 of Paschal's Digest, subdvs. 7, 8.

Where the statement of a juror to one of his fellow jurors "that he knew more about that at the time than such juror did, there was a regular nest of them," meaning cattle thieves, was not shown to have created in the mind of such juror such prejudice against the defendant as would deprive him of a fair and impartial trial, such statement was held not a sufficient ground for reversal of the judgment. Ray v. State (Tex.) 33 S. W. 869 (1896).

And where the defendant moved for a new trial upon the ground that one of the jurors gave information of his own knowledge after they had retired, to the effect that he had heard both from the defendant and plaintiff that the defendant was not to be allowed anything for the services of her son, which was the claim and set-off which he had attempted to prove on a trial, the new trial was refused, the court being of opinion that substantial justice had been done between the parties. Cherry v. Sweeny, 1 Cranch, C. C. 530 (1808).

So, where in a criminal prosecution it is essential to prove the particular value of an article, the jury may use that general knowledge which any man can bring to the subject, but if any of the jurors have a particular knowledge on the subject arising from his being in the trade he ought to be sworn and examined as a witness. Rex v. Rosser, 7 Car. & P. 648 (1836).

Evidence to the effect that during the progress of the trial some of the jury had gone into the rotunda of the postoffice and made certain measurements by "stepping" with a view of ascertaining the distance between the points from the place witness testified they were standing and the place they alleged defendant was standing when he mailed the circulars in question, and that they imparted such information to the other jurors, is not sufficient to support an application for a new trial, or to impeach the verdict, and does not come within §§ 3400, 3402, of the Compiled Laws of Utah. People v. Ritchie (Utah) 42 Pac. 209 (1895).

But if a given fact has not become sufficiently notorious to be taken judicial notice of without proof, jurors cannot be allowed to act upon it without proof although the fact may be known to one or more of the panel. State v. Maine C. R. Co. 86 Me. 300, 312 (1894).

The courts will not proceed further than to allow the jury to take notice of whatever ought to be generally known within the limits of their jurisdiction, and a rule which would leave the jury at liberty to supply defects in the case of the prosecution or defense from their own knowledge, has no authority to sustain it. Lenahan v. People, 3 Hun, 164, 5 Thomp. & C. 285 (1874).

An instruction to a jury should be so modified as to exclude their right to act upon facts not in evidence but within their own knowledge, and so as to limit their action to their general knowledge and experience derived from observation and reflection, and an instruction which authorizes them to apply special circumstances and facts connected with the case is erroneous. Ottawa Gaslight & C. Co. v. Graham, 28 Ill. 73, 81 Am. Dec. 263 (1862).

In a case where one of the jurors was familiar with the facts of the case and, by reason of the suppression of the fact of such acquaintance, procured himself to be accepted as a juror, and in the jury room asserted such knowledge and assumed the role of both witness and advocate, and so procured a verdict, the verdict was not allowed to stand, upon the ground of prejudice. Harris v. State, 24 Neb. 803, 810 (1888).

And where a juror testified in a jury room to facts within his own personal knowledge which directly affected the issue, such misconduct was held sufficient to set aside the verdict. Griffin v. Harriman, 74 Iowa, 436, 439 (1888).

conduct in jurors, and will, if influential, vitiate their verdict.

12 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 876, title Jury and Jury Trials; Anechicks v. State, 6 Tex. App. 524.

Although a juror may apply to the subject before him the general knowledge which every man may be supposed to have, yet if he be personally acquainted with any material fact he is not permitted to mention the circumstance privately to his fellows, but he must submit to be publicly sworn and examined.

2 Taylor, Ev. pt. 3, § 1379; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 364; Best, Ev. § 187.

In that case one of the jurors made statements from his own personal knowledge, in regard to the quality of the land in controversy, which tended directly to support the defendant's case, the value of the use of the land depending upon its quality and being a material issue.

Where, in reference to a material point necessary to be established by the prisoner in order to justify a conviction, there had been apparently conflicting evidence submitted to the jury on the trial, the proper effect and weight of which it was their province to determine, and, after leaving the bar to consult and determine upon their verdict, and while in the act of doing so, they received fresh evidence from one of their number, the effect of which must have conduced in some degree to their verdict against the prisoner, the verdict given under such circumstances cannot stand. Sam v. State, 1 Swan, 61, 65 (1851).

So, where a juror made reference to another offense alleged to have been committed by the prisoner, and stated that he was a bad man anyhow, it was held to be sufficient to cause a reversal of the judgment and to show that such juror was biased and disqualified from serving as a juror, as it was shown that he afterwards acknowledged that such imputation influenced his fellow jurors. Martin v. State, 25 Ga. 494 (1858).

Where during the progress of the trial one of defendant's witnesses conversed with one of the jurors relating to matters connected with the case on trial, and after the jury had retired to their room such juror stated the facts to his fellows as within his personal knowledge, the court ordered a new trial, the verdict being rendered on the side advocated both by the witness and the juror. Simpson v. Kent, 9 Phila. 30 (1871).

Where the jury, in arriving at their verdict and in estimating the amount of damages caused by a fire, were influenced by statements made by one of their number, to the effect that he had had a similar claim against the company, and that the company had paid him a certain amount per rod as damages, which amount was greater than the damages sustained by the plaintiff, and before such statement was made the jury had not rendered a verdict nor fully agreed thereon, and the statement made was an argument to convince the jurors that the amount finally agreed upon was not too much, the court held that the jury were influenced and granted a new trial. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Bayes, 42 Kan. 609 (1899).

And where the jury were instructed that they must be satisfied from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the second story or chamber of the premises where intoxicating liquors were alleged to be kept and deposited was a part of a store, and that they would judge from the evidence in the case, with their knowledge or experience as practical men, as to how rooms or stores on the ground floor and rooms above in the second story were generally used by merchants; whether the said second story or chamber was in point of fact a part of said store,—the court held such instruction was erroneous as being susceptible of a construction which would authorize and perhaps require the jury to act upon their own knowledge or experience as evidence in the case, and therefore granted a new trial. State v. Bartlett, 47 Me. 368, 365 (1890).

Again, where, in an action of assumpsit on an account, while the cause was on trial and before the verdict was rendered, the foreman of the jury spent the Sunday with, and was shown the subject-matter of the action by, the defendant, who held a conversation with him upon it and such information was imparted to the other jurors the condition of the articles which had been shown him being described but not exhibited to the jury, the court set aside the defendant's verdict. McIntyre v. Hussey, 57 Me. 493 (1870).

So, where one of the jurors visited the place of the accident, held conversations with the inhabitants, and afterwards communicated to his fellow jurors the information so acquired, the court set aside the verdict. Bowler v. Washington, 62 Me. 302 (1873).

And where the juror visited the defendant's shop, investigated its location as to the steam, drain, and water supply, about which there was conflicting testimony, and imparted such supposed knowledge thus obtained to his fellow jurors, together with the fact that he had examined the premises himself, the court sustained a motion for a new trial. Winslow v. Morrill, 68 Me. 302 (1878).

Again, it has been held in an action for breach of warranty for the soundness of a horse, the alleged unsoundness being a curb which caused lameness, that an instruction for the jury to find the nature, cause and time of development of the curb from such personal knowledge as they might have in relation to matters of that kind, was error, the subject not being one of general knowledge and observation, but one of science upon which no witness not specially qualified as an expert could testify, it not appearing that any juror upon the panel was qualified as an expert to testify or give his opinion upon the subject under consideration, a verdict thus given not being according to the evidence. Douglass v. Trask, 77 Me. 35 (1885).

Where, in an action for deceit in the sale of a pair of oxen, the jury were instructed that they had a right to call into requisition in a case of that sort their practical experience and knowledge, if they had any, relating to cattle of that kind, it was held such instruction was erroneous and prejudicial to the plaintiff's right for the reason that there was no knowledge that the instruction did not thus injuriously influence the jury. Page v. Alexander, 84 Me. 83 (1891).

In a case involving the genuineness of a will, which was to be determined mainly upon opinions in the nature of expert evidence as to the handwriting of the testator, the court held that such a matter could not be left to be settled by an inquest and inspection in the jury room, where the opinions of fellow jurors who might not be qualified to give such opinion, and whose qualifications were not investigated, might stand for more than the sworn testimony of the most careful and skilled expert. Re Foster's Will, 34 Mich. 21 (1876).

So, where there was conflicting evidence between the witnesses of the plaintiff and defendant as to certain structures upon the property in question, and one of the members of the jury without the knowledge or consent of either party to the action, or the attorneys, examined such structures and made use of the knowledge thus obtained which knowledge was considered by his fellow jurors in arriving at the verdict, the court granted a new

Gary, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant was convicted of perjury at the June, 1894, term of the court of general sessions for Clarendon county, and thereon made a motion before the presiding judge for a new trial, which was refused. He was then sentenced to one year at hard labor in the state penitentiary. The appeal to this court is based upon two exceptions, which will be incorporated in the report of the case, and raise the single point whether his honor, Judge Norton, erred in charging the jury that they must not allow their personal knowledge of defend-trial. Garside v. Ladd Watch Case Co. 17 R. I. 601, 605 (1892).

And an instruction to the jury giving them power to act upon simple unsworn evidence of the existence of a material nature which was not of common knowledge, is error as in direct violation of the well-settled rules of law. Lenahan v. People, 8 Hun, 164, 5 Thomp. & C. 265 (1874).

Where the evidence of the prosecution showed that the place where the assault was committed was generally deserted at the hour of the night at which the crime was alleged to have taken place, an instruction that the jury had a right, of their own knowledge, to take notice of the circumstance that at the time no part of the street was more likely to be deserted, even as early in the night as the time at which the offense was said to be committed, than that part of the street, was held error, the fact not being one of general notoriety. Ibid.

In Bradley v. Bradley, 4 U. S. 4 Dail. 112, 1 L. ed. 763 (1792), a new trial was granted upon the ground that when the jury withdrew two of them testified to the other jurors that although the defendant had bought land, yet the bonds given for the purchase money were unpaid when the purchaser intermarried with the testator, and that the testator had been obliged to discharge them, and upon such representation several of the jurors, who were previously in favor of defendant's title, concurred in finding a verdict for the plaintiff.

So, a new trial was ordered where the jury retired and conferred together for some time without coming to a decision, and then broke up, and before they met the next morning one of the jurors applied for information upon a particular point, and, having obtained it, communicated it to his fellow jurors. Brunson v. Graham, 2 Yeates, 166 (1796).

Where the grounds for granting a new trial were that after the jury had retired to their room one of them stated to the rest of the jury, which was regarded as evidence, that the defendant had stolen a hog, and made other statements from what he had heard, and verified before them, which were not given in evidence upon the trial, and which were a strong inducement, and partly the cause, of the verdict against the defendant, the court held that although the act of the juror in making such statements, and that of the others, being influenced by them was very irregular, improper, and contrary to law, and although it did not appear on the face of the evidence that there was any malice or ill design actuating them to make the disclosure, and it might have proceeded from ignorance and even a belief that in conscience he was bound to tell all he knew or heard about the defendant,—yet the evident tendency of such remarks was to injure the defendant, the affidavit showing that result; and was a strong inducement and partly the cause for the finding of a verdict against the defendant. Booby v. State, 4 Yerg. 111, 114 (1833).

Where the prisoner, indicted for horse stealing, was convicted upon the testimony of one witness, who proved the commission of the offense, and it appeared that one of the jurors had stated to the jury in the jury room, after their retirement, without having been examined in court, that he had heard such witness examined by the grand jury that found the indictment, and that he then made the same statements that he made before the traverse jury, and that such statements had a powerful influence upon the jury in finding the verdict of guilty, the court refused the judgment and ordered a new trial. Donston v. State, 6 Humph. 275 (1845).

Where, while the jury were considering the verdict, one of the jurors stated to his fellows "that the prisoner had heretofore stolen sheep, money, and other things from his father," the court held that such conduct was reprehensible and prejudiced the accused, and arrested the judgment and remanded the prisoner. Morton v. State, 1 Lea, 498 (1878).

Where the judge instructed the jury as follows: "I am not familiar with the custom of merchants in settling with insurance offices, or what are the liabilities of insurers in case of partial loss. I see on the jury planters and merchants who doubtless are familiar with transactions of this kind; you will apply the rules of the same to the nature of this kind of transaction,"—the court held that such charge was objectionable for the reason that so far as the transaction was governed by law it belonged to the judge to declare the law, and so far as the question rested on particular custom that custom was a fact to be given in evidence to the jury, and not dependent on the knowledge which any particular juror might have of such custom, as, if such were permitted, each juror might assume to know of his personal knowledge what the custom was and no two of them agree. Green v. Hill, 4 Tex. 465, 467 (1849).

And where, in a prosecution for rape, a new trial was sought, upon the ground that the jury, after retiring to consider their verdict, received and were influenced by the testimony of one of their number as to a matter of fact which was not adduced at the trial, to the effect that such juror knew one of the witnesses for the defense, and that such witness was kept by the defendant and was unworthy of belief, the court held that such verdict should be set aside and a new trial granted. Anschicks v. State, 6 Tex. App. 524 (1879).

A material point upon which the court were influenced in granting a new trial in the above case was the fact that the juror who made such statement had lived in the county in which the crime was said to have been committed, and that the venue had been changed from that county because of prejudice against the defendant.

In Lucas v. State, 27 Tex. App. 322 (1889), a new trial was granted upon the ground of misconduct of two of the jurors in stating to the jury, while the case was being considered by them, that they knew one of the witnesses who testified on behalf of the defendant, and that such witness was a chicken thief and in their opinion unworthy of credit, and had often lied to them, one of the jurors making affidavit that the statement did not influence his verdict, but might have had some influence upon the verdict, as one of the jurors had said that such remarks had influenced him.

Where the jury asked the court: "Can we judge the witness just by what he says on the stand and not by what we know of him privately?" to which question the court made no reply but instructed the jury upon the rules which govern them as to the weight of testimony, it was held there was error for the reason that the court had no authority further than to answer their question and instruct them that they must give their verdict upon the evidence adduced upon the trial, as the question, ant's mental condition to enter into their judgment in arriving at a verdict. The question as to the mental condition of the defendant was not a collateral circumstance, but a material fact in issue, upon which the jury were called upon to pass. Under these circumstances, it would be extremely dangerous to allow the jury to find a verdict upon facts first communicated to them by jurors in the jury room. Such a verdict would be contrary to that part of their oath where they swear to give a true verdict according to the evidence. The practice for which the appellant contends would deprive a party to the cause of the very important right of cross-examination. This is not a case involving the right of a juror to state facts in the jury room touching the credibility of a witness, as was the case of McKain v. Love, 2 Hill, L. 506, 27 Am. Dec. 401, in which the distinction herein stated was pointed out by the court, which used the following language: "The oath usually administered to the jurors in the common pleas, well and truly to try the issue joined between the parties, 'and a true verdict give according to the evidence,' contains a very correct summary of the law on this subject. The jury are bound to give their verdict according to the evidence, and what is suggested the fact that some of the jurors had knowledge of facts touching the credibility of some of the witnesses, which facts were not given in evidence. Wharton v. State, 45 Tex. 2 (1876).

b. As to intoxicating liquors.

In Freiberg v. State, 94 Ala. 91 (1892), the defendant was convicted of unlawfully selling liquor to a minor, and it was held there was no error in the court's refusal to charge the jury that they were not to infer that whiskey was a spirituous, vinous, or malt liquor until it was proved by the evidence, for the reason that whiskey was a spirituous liquor within the common knowledge of all men, and for the further reason that the courts take judicial notice of what everybody else is presumed to know, and juries are permitted to find such facts without specific proofs being adduced in its support.

But where the instruction was that the jury were to use their own knowledge and science, if they possessed any, and the question was whether lager beer was an intoxicating liquor, the court held that such instruction was clearly error for the reason that it might improperly influence the conclusions of the jury. People v. Zeiger, 6 Park. Crim. Rep. 355 (1865).

So, it has been held that the credibility of testimony is a question exclusively for the jury, and a juror cannot exclude from his mind his own knowledge of the character of the witness; and the question is, What impression does the testimony make upon the minds of the jurors, and that impression must necessarily be affected by their own knowledge of the character of the witness from whom such testimony proceeds. State v. Jacob, 30 S. C. 131, 136 (1886).

In a case where the credibility of one of the plaintiff's witnesses was a subject of inquiry, and one of the jurors stated a fact that he had heard derogatory to her character, but stated it as a rumor without giving it his own sanction, the court held that, however it might deprecate the introduction of such new matter into the jury room, yet to exclude such a matter would be to strip the trial by jury of the right of weighing the credibility of the witnesses. McKain v. Love, 2 Hill, L. 506, 508, 27 Am. Dec. 401 (1844).

Where on trial the court charged the jury that they had the witnesses before them and must consider the man himself, judge of his intelligence, his manner of testifying on the stand, and his integrity and uprightness, character for veracity "if they know what this is,"—the court held there was no error in such instruction. Anderson v. Tribble, 66 Ga. 584 (1881).

So, where the court charged the jury, with reference to the credibility of witnesses, to consider their manner of testifying, their intelligence, their means and opportunity of knowing the facts to which they testified, their character for integrity and veracity, if they know it, their interest in the case or their business, if they have any, the court held there was no error. Head v. Bridges, 67 Ga. 227, 236 (1881).

And it is not error for the court to charge the jury that in arriving at their verdict they have a right to act upon their personal knowledge of the witnesses. State v. Jacob, 30 S. C. 131, 136 (1886).

Where in an action for commission in effecting a sale the question of the credibility of witnesses arose the jury were instructed, inter alia: "And you may also, in considering whom you will or will not believe, take into consideration your experience and relation among men," the court held that there was no error in such instruction, stating that the value of experience is not to be given up when a man becomes a juror and is required to apply the tests of credit to the heart and mind of the witness, but whatever qualification that experience gives should be employed to the end that the whole truth may be known and acted upon. Jenney Electric Co. v. Branham (Ind.) 41 N. E. 448 (1895).

But where, upon an action against a railroad company to recover damages for personal injuries, the jury were charged as follows: "In determining any material point in the case, it is the province of the jury to take into consideration, in determining the weight and value of the evidence, the manner of the witnesses on the stand, the character of each witness, if you know it, the interest or want of interest they take in the case, the opportunity of each witness to know the facts about which he testifies," which charge was objected to upon the ground that the court used the words "the character of each witness if you know it,"—it was held that such instruction was error. Chattanooga R. & C. R. Co. v. Owen, 90 Ga. 285, 293 (1892).

So, it is error, in charging upon the credibility of witnesses, to instruct the jury: "You may even consider their character for truth and veracity, if it be known to you." Pettyjohn v. Liebecher, 92 Ga. 149 (1898).

And where the evidence did not absolutely require the verdict, the accused was held entitled to a new trial for error in the charge of the court, to the effect that the jury in weighing the evidence might consider the character of the witness, if known to them personally. Collins v. State, 94 Ga. 394 (1894).

So, where the jury, deliberating upon their verdict, were divided in their opinion, and one or more of the jurors professed to have some personal knowledge of a certain person connected with the case, his pecuniary condition, residence, etc., and stated to his fellow jurors what he professed to know about such person, and also what he professed to know in relation to the habits, situation, and business relations of one or more of the plaintiff's witnesses, and various other matters connected directly or remotely with the case, the parties and the witnesses, which statements were false, the verdict was set aside and a new trial granted. Darrance v. Preston, 18 Iowa, 306, 402 (1865).

or is not competent evidence belongs to the court, and not to the jury, to determine. Generally speaking, therefore, a verdict founded on facts, first disclosed in the jury room, would be bad, although the facts are known to one of the jury, because it is unfair not to give the party against whom they operate an opportunity of repelling or explaining them. In an Anonymous Case, in 1 Salk. 405, ¶ 3, it is said that "if a juror know, of his own knowledge, anything material to the matter in issue, the fair way is to tell the court, so that he may be sworn as a witness." See also State v. Jones, 29 S. C. 201.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the court below be affirmed.

ADAMS & WESTLAKE COMPANY,
Resp't.,
v.

C. E. DEYETTE et al., Appts.

(.....S. D.)

The assets of a corporation for profit being a trust fund for its creditors, and its officers, in anticipation of insolvency, being unauthorized to diminish its capital and release its stockholders from liability in a manner that will inevitably defeat the rights of bona fide creditors, a judgment confessed in favor of persons who loaned to its directors money for the purpose of, and with actual knowledge that the funds advanced were to be used in, the purchase of shares in itself, is void as to such creditors, because: (a) When insolvency occurs, a corporation has no authority to prefer creditors; (b) a corporation, as such, has no power to create a debt by borrowing money with which to purchase its own stock.

(December 23, 1895.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Brown County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to set aside certain judgments which had been confessed by the Hicks-Trask Hardware Company in favor of Deyette and Lewis. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Frank A. Luse, for appellants:

There being no allegation in the complaint, nor any findings of fact as to any defect in form, the judgments must be held good unless there was fraud or collusion in obtaining them.

Sidensparker v. Sidensparker, 52 Me. 481, 83 Am. Dec. 527.

The fraud must be actual, and not constructive.

The statute gave them the right to buy said stock with the consent of its stockholders.

There is no finding that Deyette knew that this consent was never had, therefore it must be presumed, in favor of the legality of his judgment and the legality of his claim, that he did not know it.

Fuller, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case, now before us on rehearing, is reported in 59 N. W. 214,* where the unassailed substantive facts are stated as follows: "On the 9th day of May, 1888, the Hicks-Trask Hardware Company, a corporation, being insolvent, confessed judgments against itself in favor of each of the defendants C. E. Deyette and W. W. Lewis, amounting to $1,469.26; the Deyette judgment being for $649.84, and the Lewis judgment for $819.42. After entry of the above judgments, and on the 12th day of the same month, said defendant confessed numerous other judgments, among which there was one in plaintiff's favor for $1,319.47. Executions issued in succession, and the property of the defendant corporation was levied upon in the order above indicated, and in the order in which the respective judgments were entered and docketed; and the property of the corporation was found to be insufficient to satisfy the judgments which preceded that of the plaintiff. The referee made, among others, the following findings of fact: "(14) That the consideration of the confession of judgment in favor of Charles E.

The pleadings in this case raised an issue of fraud on the part of the corporation in purchasing its own stock, in borrowing money for such purpose without authority, and in confessing judgments upon obligations thus incurred. The referee found as matters of fact that defendants Deyette and Lewis had actual knowledge, at the time they loaned the money, that the same was to be used in the purchase of the Trask stock, and that the defendant Lewis was a director and secretary of said corporation at and prior to the confession of these judgments, and as such secretary joined in their execution on behalf of said corporation, and at a time when he was chargeable with a knowledge of its insolvency and inability to pay its obligation to this plaintiff. In the absence of an opportunity to examine the evidence, and without indulging unwarranted presumptions in favor of the correctness of the conclusions of law and judgment of the court, we are disposed to believe that the action of the corporation and its officers under the circumstances was unwarranted in law, and constituted a fraud upon the plaintiff, and justified the court in declaring the judgments of defendants void, so far as they interfered with the rights of this plaintiff. The property and capital of a corporation gives it financial standing, because it is primarily liable for its debts. Persons extending credit to such corporation do so upon the faith that its officers and agents will conduct its affairs in a manner consistent with business principles; and when such officers devote the corporate assets to their individual use and benefit to the exclusion of creditors, courts without hesitation characterize such acts, as to creditors, fraudulent and void. Independently of the question of actual fraud in the case under consideration, the immediate effect of the purchase of the Trask stock at a time when the corporation was financially embarrassed, if not, indeed, insolvent, was to increase its liability, without adding anything to its resources to which plaintiff could look for the security or payment of its claim, and such conduct is contrary to the spirit, if not the letter, of our statute, and is not upheld by the courts. Comp. Laws, §§ 2217, 2222. In Cur-

Deyette was as follows: $514.60, money loaned to the Hicks-Trask Hardware Company on January 20, 1888, was borrowed by said company for the purpose of using the same to purchase the stock of said company held by Trask, and on account of the indebtedness of $184.22, owing to said Deyette by said corporation for work and labor done by said Deyette for said corporation. (15) That the defendant Deyette had actual knowledge of the purpose and intent of the said corporation to use the same in the purchase of stock. (16) That the consideration of the judgment of the defendant Lewis was $514.60, money loaned to the said corporation by him about January 20, 1888, and borrowed by said company for the purpose of using the same in the purchase of stock of said corporation held by Trask; and the sum of $304.07, due Lewis from said corporation on account of services rendered by Lewis to said corporation. (17) That defendant Lewis knew of the purpose and intent for which said money was borrowed by said corporation. (18) That the defendant Lewis, at the time of and prior to the making of said confession of judgment to himself, was a director of said corporation, and secretary thereof, and signed said confessions as secretary on behalf of said corporation. (19) That the defendant Deyette, at the time of said confessions of judgment by said corporation to himself, was not a director. (20) That no written consent of the stockholders of the Hicks-Trask Hardware Company was ever had to the purchase of stock from Trask by said corporation. (21) That on May 12, 1888, executions were issued from the district court upon the said judgment of said plaintiff to the sheriff of Brown county, in which said defendant the Hicks-Trask Hardware Company had its place of business. (22) That executions issued from the clerk of the district court of Brown county on each of the judgments of the defendants Foster, Deyette, and Lewis, and were by him levied on the personal property of the Hicks-Trask Hardware Company, and all thereof; and the said sheriff sold the same and holds the money realized from said sale, to be applied on said executions according to the decree of this court. (23) That the proceeds arising from said sale are not sufficient to pay the judgments against the Hicks-Trask Hardware Company prior to the judgment of plaintiff. Upon these findings of fact the following conclusions of law were based: (2) That the judgment of the defendant Deyette, as to the sum of $514.60, money loaned to the said corporation for the purpose of purchasing stock, is invalid, for the reason the Hicks-Trask Hardware Company, and the officers thereof, had no power to borrow money for the purchase of its stock; and the defendant, having loaned said money knowing of the illegal purpose for which it was to be used, cannot recover the same from said corporation. (3) That as to the sum of $184.25, included in the judgment of said Deyette, the same is valid, and should stand, and be enforced for said sum of $184.25. (4) That judgment of the defendant Lewis is invalid for the reason that the confession of the same made by him and obtained by him when he was a director rier v. Lebanon Slate Co. 56 N. H. 262, the court says: "The funds of an insolvent corporation cannot be taken to buy a portion of its capital stock."

It would be grossly inequitable to the other stockholders, and a fraud upon creditors." From Crippin v. Greenlees, 38 Ohio St. 275, 43 Am. Rep. 425, we quote the following: "The doctrine that corporations, when not prohibited by their charters, may buy and sell their own stocks, is supported by a line of authorities. But nevertheless we think the decided weight of authority, both in England and in the United States, is against the existence of the power, unless conferred by express grant or clear implication. It is true, however, that in most jurisdictions where the right of a corporation to traffic in its own stock has been denied an exception to the rule has been admitted to exist, whereby a corporation has been allowed to take its own stock in satisfaction of a debt due to it. This exception is supposed to rest on a necessity which arises in order to avoid loss."

If a corporation, to the injury of creditors, can borrow money for the purchase of one share of its stock, or the stock held by one member, it can borrow money with which to purchase the shares of all its members, and thus destroy its very existence, as no corporation like the defendant can have an existence in this jurisdiction without stock and without stockholders. The doctrine is well established that a purchase of shares in itself by a corporation is against public policy, and ultra vires, whenever such purchase diminishes its ability to pay its debts, or lessens the security of its creditors. German Sav. Bank v. Bank of Wulfeckuhler, 19 Kan. 60; Gill v. Ballis, 72 Mo. 424; Barton v. Port Jackson & N. F. Pl. Road Co. 17 Barb. 397; Clapp v. Peterson, 104 Ill. 23; 1 Spelling, Priv. Corp. 168, and cases there cited. By confessing judgments when insolvent, and for debts incurred in the purchase of its stock without authority, and in favor of the defendants, who had actual knowledge at the time of loaning the money that the same was to be thus used, the corporation attempted to give such defendants a preference over other creditors, and to defeat the collection of the plaintiff's claim, which was confessedly valid and subsisting. Without going into an extended discussion concerning the powers of and limitations upon corporations, we are satisfied that the judgment should be sustained upon the broad principles of justice and equity, and upon the doctrine that an insolvent corporation is without power to prefer its creditors in cases like the present; and, in our opinion, its action in that regard was fraudulent in law, and ineffectual for every purpose.

In Ford v. Flankington Bank, 87 Wis. 370, Newman J., speaking for the court, says: "The law applicable to the question is well settled. The corporation, being only a fictitious body, can act only through agents, called 'directors.' The directors manage the business for the stockholders. But when insolvency of the corporation happens, then the duty and function of the directors are changed. Then they become trustees for the creditors of the corporation, of all the corporate property and rights. They are trustees for all the creditors, and are bound to preserve and administer all the corporate property in the interest impartially of all the corporate creditors. Being trustees for all the creditors, they are incapable of making any preference of their own claims, or of giving preference to the claims of any creditor." While the defendant Deyette was not a director at the time the judgment was confessed in his favor, he had been in the employ of the corporation, and had actual knowledge, at the time he loaned the money, that the same was being borrowed for the purpose of buying the stock of the corporation; and, in the absence of a finding that he actually knew that the written consent of the directors had not been obtained as required by statute, he is charged with a knowledge of the law requiring such consent, and is presumed to have known that the purchase was being made without authority. In any event, he was in possession of sufficient facts to put him on inquiry, which, if prosecuted in good faith, would have placed him in full possession of such knowledge. In our opinion, the judgment is sustained by the findings of fact, and, as the judgments of defendants as confessed by the corporation are fraudulent and void as to this plaintiff, no rights can exist under them antagonistic to plaintiff, and the judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

of said corporation was an illegal preference as against the creditors of said corporation, and that the relief prayed by plaintiff should be granted as against said Lewis. (5) I further find as to the judgment of the defendant Lewis that as to the sum of $514.60 it is invalid for the reason that, as to said amount, the consideration was for money loaned to said corporation by Lewis for the illegal purpose of purchasing stock in said corporation." Judgment by the court was accordingly entered on motion of plaintiff's counsel, and defendants Deyette and Lewis appeal therefrom."

In order to affirm the contention of appellants' counsel and disaffirm our former conclusion, we must adopt and proclaim a rule by which a corporation without surplus profits or unemployed capital may, in contemplation of insolvency, borrow money with which to purchase shares in itself, and, when insolvency occurs, give a preference to the persons from whom the loan was made, by confessing judgments in their favor for an amount equal to the corporate assets, at a time, for the purpose of, and in such a manner that the rights and claims of bona fide creditors are entirely defeated. In determining the rights of these parties, rules of law and statutory provisions bearing upon the questions presented must be viewed in the relation that each bears to the other; and all must be considered with reference to an enlightened public policy, upon which is based a strong and wholesome rule of law, prohibiting a corporation from distributing its capital among shareholders by the purchase of stock in itself to the inevitable detriment of creditors. As observed by Mr. Thompson in the second volume of his recent Commentaries on the Law of Corporations, at pages 1555, 1556: "Stringent precautions to prevent the reduction of the capital of a limited company without due notice and judicial sanction would be idle if the company might purchase its own shares wholesale; and, if it were otherwise, the result would be that the shareholders would receive back the money subscribed, and there would thus pass into their pockets what before existed in the form of cash in the coffers of the company, or of buildings, machinery, or stock, available to meet the demands of their creditors. . . . The purchaser of the stock must be one who succeeds to a liability, distinct from and in addition to that of the corporation." Mr. Spelling, after conceding that the foregoing rule is supported by the irresistible weight of authority, and in connection with a suggestion that he can see no valid reason why shares in itself might not be purchased by a corporation, provided always that by so doing its capital stock is not diminished and its creditors are not injured, states the rule as follows: "A purchase of shares in itself by a corporation would be ultra vires wherever and whenever the effect would be to diminish its capital and lessen the security of creditors." 1 Spelling, Priv. Corp. § 168. Mr. Morawetz says [§ 112] that "no verbiage can disguise the fact that a purchase by a corporation of shares in itself really amounts to a reduction of the company's assets. . . . The fact that such a transaction may not necessarily be injurious to any person is not a sufficient reason for supporting it. It is contrary to the fundamental agreement of the shareholders, and is condemned by the plainest dictates of sound policy. To allow the directors to exercise such a power would be a fruitful source of unfairness, mismanagement, and corruption. It is for these reasons that a shareholder cannot be allowed to withdraw from the corporation with his proportionate amount of capital, either by a release and cancellation before the shares have been paid up, or by a purchase of the shares with the company's funds."

Cases almost innumerable are cited by each author in support of the foregoing rule, based upon the equitable principle that the assets of a corporation are a trust fund for its creditors, — a doctrine that so completely pervades and enters into the warp and woof of the law of corporations that no literary effort, by whatever degree of legislative sanction or judicial sagacity aided, can destroy the immutable principles of justice and considerations of public policy from which the doctrine emanates, and upon which the rule is based. For the reason that creditors of a corporation cannot, as in case of a partnership, ultimately look to those who constitute the membership for the payment of their claim, the law requires corporations for profit, as a condition precedent to the commencement of business, and for the protection and security of creditors, to have capital stock and shareholders, and to hold that they may, upon the strength of their capital, incur debts in the prosecution of legitimate corporate business, and then destroy their assets and the credit of the corporation by borrowing money with which to purchase shares in themselves, and defeat their creditors by confessing preferred judgments in favor of those who had loaned the money with a knowledge of the purpose for which it was to be used, would be to sanction a fraud and judicially approve a vicious species of legerdemain.

Commencing at page 5115 of the fifth volume of his Commentaries, Judge Thompson approves in a vigorous manner the rule adopted by all recent text-writers, which asserts and emphasizes the proposition that the assets of a corporation are a trust fund for its creditors; and, after stating that it is the only doctrine worthy of any respect, proceeds to discuss at length the fallacy by which courts have been led to hold that a corporation anticipating insolvency has the power of a private individual to deal with its assets, and under like circumstances to prefer creditors; and at page 5121 he concludes his observations in part as follows: "It is thus perceived that the courts which have adopted the doctrine that an insolvent corporation may prefer its creditors have jumped at the conclusion by reasoning that, in the absence of statutory prohibitions, a corporation has the same power in disposing of its property that an individual has. But in adopting this hasty conclusion they have overlooked the fact that the analogy between an insolvent individual and an insolvent corporation wholly fails in this: That, although an insolvent individual may turn over his property to certain of his creditors whom he desires to prefer, and may, by so doing, hinder and delay the others, yet he merely hinders and delays them; he does not, by that act, destroy himself; he still lives; and he may, and often does, get on his feet again, and acquire property, and discharge his previous obligations. But when a corporation becomes insolvent, and ceases to have the means of carrying out the objects of its creation, and disposes itself of all its property, it destroys itself, and becomes ipso facto dissolved, and, in fact, is regarded as a dissolved corporation for many purposes having reference to the rights of creditors. An assignment for the benefit of creditors is, in point of fact and experience, an end of the corporation; and to this statement there is not one exception in a thousand cases, as every lawyer and judge knows. The corporation, after such a catastrophe, not only has nothing more for its unpreferred creditors, but it never will have anything more for them. Its act of exhausting its assets in preferring particular creditors deprives the others of all remedy, unless in those cases where the law has left them the remedy of proceeding against its stockholders." In determining whether a corporation, organized for the purpose of dealing in hardware at wholesale, has power to borrow money with which to traffic in its own shares, and thereby relieve its stockholders from liability, the question of intent is of no importance, when the inevitable result must bring disaster to honest creditors. As between them and the money lender, in case of insolvency, a knowledge of the purpose for which the funds were borrowed is sufficient to at least postpone his claim until they have been paid in full; otherwise it would be a popular scheme for a corporation to incur debts, limited in extent only by its ability to engender confidence, and then, in contemplation of suicidal dissolution, borrow money from some trusted friend, with which to purchase its entire stock, upon the assurance that by its last official act, and by a judgment timely confessed, the proceeds of the entire assets of the company shall be turned into the pockets of the man who loans the money with a knowledge of such fraudulent purpose, and to the exclusion of honest persons who extended credit, believing that the assets of a corporation are a trust fund for the benefit of creditors. A corporation, as such, has no power, under the statute, to enter into any obligation or contract except such as are necessary and essential to the transaction of the ordinary business for the prosecution of which it was organized; and in recognition of the trust-fund doctrine the directors are expressly prohibited from diverting, withdrawing, or paying to stockholders any part of the capital stock, and are in their individual and private capacity made jointly and severally liable to the creditors of the corporation to the full amount so "divided, withdrawn, paid out, or reduced, or debt contracted." Comp. Laws, §§ 2917, 2928. Section 2917 is as follows: "Unless otherwise provided, a corporation may purchase, hold, and transfer shares of its own stock, from its surplus profits, or as provided in the article on the assessment of stocks, or by the unanimous consent in writing of all its stockholders, in such manner and for such price or consideration as the said stockholders may unanimously decide upon." Although by enabling a corporation to purchase shares of its own stock from its surplus profits our legislature has to that extent encroached upon the otherwise invariable rule by which all such traffic is prohibited, the foregoing section, construed, as it must be, with other statutory provisions relating to the same subject, is not sufficient to empower a corporation, through the agency of its directors, to "divide, withdraw, or pay to stockholders, or any of them, any part of the capital stock," or to increase its liability by borrowing money with which to purchase shares in itself. This is obvious, because it is "otherwise provided," and because the power is, by the law of corporations, expressly withheld from directors and officers as such, as well as by that portion of section 2917 which authorizes no purchase of stock in any manner, except from surplus profits, or by virtue of the law of assessment, unless the purchase be made by and through the unanimous consent and united individual action of all the stockholders, evidenced by a stipulation in writing, signed by every member and specifying the consideration to be paid, and the manner of and the means by which the purchase is to be effected. Without such written consent, the corporation cannot be bound; and in the total absence of express or implied power to borrow money with which to purchase shares in itself, and in the face of the fact that the lenders thereof had actual knowledge of the extraordinary use to which the funds were to be applied, their claims are ultra vires, and must not be asserted to the detriment of creditors. Cheerack Lime Works v. Diamukes, 87 Ala. 344, 5 L. R. A. 100. Actual notice on the part of one who loans money to a mercantile corporation that the funds so loaned are to be used for the purchase of stock in itself is sufficient to charge him with knowledge that such an unauthorized act works an immediate fraud upon creditors, and is therefore against public policy, and prohibited by the law of the land. These promissory notes upon which the Deyette and Lewis judgments were confessed, being ultra vires because the corporation was, under the circumstances, powerless to make them, it follows, of course, that the judgments were void to the extent of the money loaned for a purpose beyond the scope and object for which the corporation was created. Currier v. Lebanon Slate Co. 56 N. H. 262; Richardson v. Sibley, 11 Allen, 65, 87 Am. Dec. 700; Pearce v. Madison & I. R. Co. 62 U. S. 21 How. 441, 16 L. ed. 184; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Keokuk & H. Bridge Co. 131 U. S. 371, 33 L. ed. 157.

We are fully aware that numerous cases may be found in which judges, though standing upon an eminence, have been unable to observe or unwilling to concede that the assets of an insolvent corporation are a trust fund for the benefit of all bona fide creditors, none of whom, at the hands of a corporation, are entitled to a preference; but a careful research discloses no case which goes to the extent of holding that a corporation apparently in failing circumstances can borrow money with which to purchase shares in itself, and give to the persons from whom the money is borrowed a preference over all other creditors. Manifestly, a transaction so inconsistent with every consideration of common honesty and public policy, and so disastrous to the credit of corporations, as well as to the rights of those with whom they transact business, cannot receive the stamp of judicial approval. Adhering substantially to the views expressed in our former opinion, the judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

Kellam, J., dissenting:

I feel compelled to dissent from the conclusions of the court upon the main propositions discussed in the foregoing opinion. It is always a matter of interest to the general student of the law to know the views of eminent text-writers upon any legal question, but it must always be a matter of more particular interest to a court to know what its own legislature has made and established as the law of that jurisdiction; and so, when I find that the statute law of this state expressly allows a corporation to purchase shares of its own stock (Comp. Laws, § 2917), I conclude that the wisdom or unwisdom of such policy is not a question for discussion or settlement by the courts of this state. At all events, it is gratifying to know that, however bad the law may be, or however vicious its policy, it is not original with a Dakota legislature. It is the law of many of the states. It was broadly declared as a general rule of law in the Field Commission Code; and in Columbus City Bank v. Bruce, 17 N. Y. 507, Judge Selden said: "I am not aware of any common-law principle which forbids it." Be that as it may, our statute says that it may be done, and it does not seem to me allowable for this court to say that what the statute authorizes is contrary to the policy of the law.

I think, too, that the argument of the opinion is predicated almost entirely upon assumed premises, to wit, that the corporation was insolvent, or in contemplation of insolvency, when it borrowed the money with which to buy this stock. The only finding is that it was insolvent when it confessed these judgments, nearly four months afterwards. For aught that appears in the record, its then insolvency may have resulted from causes entirely occurring after the money was so borrowed, and that at the time of the loan both borrower and lender may not only have thought, but known, that it was in a solvent and prosperous condition, and even that it then had "surplus profits" equal to the amount used in the purchase of this stock. I do not suppose that the fact that the corporation borrowed money would prove that it did not at the time of such borrowing have surplus profits, for such profits would not necessarily be in money on hand. A condition or relation shown to exist will be presumed to continue, but the presumption does not also reach backward. I think, therefore, that there is no warrant in the findings for treating the corporation as insolvent when the loan was made, but that the same is purely an assumption.

If this case is rightly decided upon the facts found, it is because a note given by a perfectly solvent corporation, for money borrowed to purchase shares of its stock, the purpose being known to the lender, is invalid and unenforceable unless the subsequent purchase of such stock is made by the corporation under the conditions named in the statute, or else that such note, good when made, becomes invalid by the subsequent insolvency of the corporation. The last proposition seems utterly indefensible. It cannot be that a note, valid when made, becomes invalid by a change in the financial condition of its maker. If it is the intention of the court to rest its decision upon the first proposition, I am unable to understand how it can so confidently reach the conclusion it announces, without at least some consideration of the question whether Deyette's knowledge of the purpose for which the money was borrowed would invalidate his note. There is certainly a very respectable, not to say formidable, line of authorities firmly holding that money loaned to a corporation for a confessedly ultra vires purpose is recoverable, although the lender knew that the money was to be so used. Some of these cases are collected in 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, under head of Ultra Vires. Ex parte Credit Foncier, L. R. 7 Ch. 161, would seem from the general statement of facts, to be much like the case now in hand. Company A loaned money to Company B. "Company B had authority to borrow money, but not to buy up their own shares. Both companies were subsequently wound up. It was held that Company B was not affected by notice of any illegality in the purpose to which the money borrowed was to be applied, and that it was consequently entitled to prove against the estate of Company A under the winding up." As this question is not discussed in the majority opinion, I only refer to it here so that I may not be understood as assenting to the view which the court seems to have adopted without discussion.

In determining the rights of the parties respectively upon the facts found in this case, the first question would seem to be, Did the transaction of January 20 create a legal and enforceable claim in favor of Deyette against the hardware company for the repayment of the money so loaned. Respondent claims, and this court holds, that it did not, because the money was advanced knowing it was to be used for an illegal purpose, to wit, the purchase by the company of the Trask stock. The purchase of the stock, however, was not necessarily illegal. It would be illegal if the stockholders all consented in writing. Comp. Laws, § 2917. It is found that such consent was not obtained. It is not found that Deyette knew or had notice that it was not obtained. Was it required of him, in order to make his loan valid, to know or see to it that the purchase of the stock was made under such conditions as would make it a permissible and legal transaction? The money was loaned to accomplish a purpose that might be legal or it might be illegal, depending upon conditions not connected with the loaning of the money, but with the purchase of the stock. There are many cases holding that contracts made to actively aid in the violation of the law are unenforceable, and that money advanced and used for such a purpose cannot be recovered. The cases go upon the ground of guilty knowledge upon the part of the lender, making him in pari delicto with the immediate perpetrator of the wrong. But here there was no guilty knowledge on the part of Deyette, unless the law imputes it from the facts proved. It was not found that he loaned the money for the purpose of, or knowing that it was to be used for, buying this stock under unlawful conditions. All that the proved facts show upon this point is that he loaned the money to the company for the purpose of, and to be used in, buying this stock, and that he did not know that the consent of the stockholders had been or would be obtained, so as to make the purchase permissible, and such use of the money loaned lawful. Respondent contends, and our former opinion favors the thought, that as, under ordinary conditions and generally, the purchase of the stock would be in violation of the law, it was incumbent on Deyette to know; that the conditions existed which would make the purchase allowable under the law. I think this is going too far. It is, in effect, presuming guilt from facts which are entirely consistent with innocence. The law punishes the lender by denying to him the right to enforce repayment, because he has knowingly participated in and willingly aided the violation of the law. If, as is found in this case, this money was borrowed for the purpose of buying this stock, the borrowing preceded the actual purchase; and, if any presumption is charged against or credited to Deyette, it ought to be that the company would proceed in a lawful manner in effecting the purchase. Suppose the traffic in intoxicating liquors is generally prohibited by law, and is only legal when the party so trafficking has first obtained a license therefor. A applies to a bank for a loan of money to enable him to put in a stock of liquor for sale, and the bank makes the loan knowing the money is to be used for that purpose, is it therefore to be charged with the presumption that A intended to engage in an illicit trade, instead of that he would do what was necessary to make his business legal? It is against the policy of the state as announced in its Constitution (art. 17, § 7) for a corporation "to take or hold any real estate, except such as may be necessary and proper for its legitimate business." A bank or other party loans money to a corporation, knowing that it is to be used in the purchase of real estate. Must the loan contract be presumed to be invalid until the lender establishes affirmatively that the real estate so purchased was actually "necessary and proper" for the legitimate business of the corporation? There may be authorities so holding, but I have found none. The rule is that, the corporation proving authority to borrow money, it will be presumed that it did it legitimately, and in the exercise of its corporate powers. 4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 222. It would seem a freak in logic to say that after a thing is done it will be presumed that it was done regularly, but, that before it is done it must be presumed that it will be done irregularly. The loan contract was valid or invalid when made. If invalid, it was because of some knowledge, actual or imputed, upon the part of the lender, that he was aiding and participating in a violation of the law. Such knowledge is the very essence of his wrong, and ought in some way to be reasonably proved, rather than presumed, and that, too, against the established presumption that men will not ordinarily do unlawful things. The presumption applies as well in civil as in criminal matters. It will never be presumed that the law has been or will be violated, but the contrary will be presumed. 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 42. If this is a safe presumption for courts to rest their judgments upon, it ought to be safe for individuals to act upon. Suppose in a proper judicial proceeding complaint were made that this company was about to purchase shares of its own stock. Would not the court of whom relief was asked say at once it may legally do so under certain conditions, and it cannot be presumed against it that it will do it illegally? If a court will presume in its favor that it will act within the law, is there any good reason why a stranger dealing with it may not indulge the same presumption?

The findings in this case are entirely consistent with absolute moral and legal innocence on the part of Deyette: entirely consistent with an honest belief on his part, when he loaned the money, that the consent of the stockholders had been or would be obtained. And a simple finding that it was not obtained is quite insufficient, in my judgment, to charge him with a knowledge that the law was to be violated in the purchase of the stock. In his argument respondent assumes that Deyette was in the employ of the company, and must have had knowledge of what was and was not done, and therefore should be held to know that the Trask stock was bought without the consent of the stockholders being first obtained. There is nothing in the record showing that he had any relations with the company except that of creditor on account of this loan, except that included in the judgment confessed was $184 for work and labor. In what capacity this was performed is not shown or suggested. He might have been a clerk in the store, with some knowledge of its business and financial condition, or he might have been a drayman or laborer outside, with no knowledge of its affairs. We cannot presume either. We must get the facts from the record, and not from the briefs of counsel. I am unable to discover anything in the findings that militates against the validity of Deyette's claim. Placing this conclusion upon the ground that no guilty knowledge is found upon his part, furnishes an additional reason why it is unnecessary for me to discuss the mooted question of whether knowledge alone, if he had had it, that the stock was to be bought in violation of law, would, without participation by him in the unlawful transaction, other than loaning the money, be sufficient to render his loan contract invalid and unenforceable; and as, in the view I take of this case, this question is not involved, I reserve the expression of any opinion for future examination when presented. It follows that in my opinion the Deyette judgment in respect to its consideration was good and valid. This was the very question upon which the case turned in the trial court. It held the judgment invalid because the consideration was invalid. This is evident, not only from its conclusion of law upon this point, but from the fact that it held the judgment good as to the claim for services.

In our former opinion, now adhered to by a majority of the court, we went further, and said that the judgment ought not to be enforced, because it was an effort on the part of an insolvent corporation to prefer Deyette as a creditor, and that an insolvent corporation could not do this. The same cause and the same reason would condemn the entire judgment, as well for services as for money loaned; but upon further reflection and a more thorough examination of the question I am unable to concur in the opinion that a corporation, by becoming insolvent merely, ipso facto loses its right to pay or secure one creditor in preference to another. We have declared the right of an individual debtor to make such preferences. Sandwich Mfg. Co. v. Max (S. D.) 24 L. R. A. 524. We said the right of a debtor to prefer one creditor over another was guaranteed to him by the express words of the statute. Section 4654. A corporation or a partnership becomes a debtor under the same circumstances as an individual. If the so called "trust fund doctrine" will prevent a corporation debtor from so preferring one creditor to another, I am unable to see why it should not have the same effect, and for the same reason, in case of a partnership. A corporation becomes insolvent just when the partnership or the individual becomes so,—when it is unable to pay its debts from its own means as they become due. Comp. Laws, § 4661. Is it well, then, unless required by prevailing authority, to adopt the rule that a private corporation, unable to meet its debts as they mature, has no right to pay one creditor until or more than it pays all others? It is often said in the books that the assets of an insolvent corporation are a trust fund for the payment of its debts, but this is also true of a partnership, and really of an individual; and for the same reason. Pomerooy says this doctrine of trust is just as applicable to a partnership and its assets as to a corporation and its assets, and that in either case the relation can only be so named by way of "analogy or metaphor." He further says: "It is plain that no constructive trust can arise in favor of the creditors unless the partners or directors, through fraud or a breach of fiduciary duty, wrongfully appropriate the property and acquire the legal title to it in their own names, and thus place it beyond the reach of creditors through ordinary legal means." 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1046. If the rule of disability applies to an insolvent corporation on the ground of its trust relations to its assets, it would seem that it should also apply to an insolvent partnership; but in Sandwich Mfg. Co. v. Max, supra, we sustained the right of Max & Baisch, an insolvent partnership, to make such preferences. I cannot see why, in the case either of a corporation or a partnership, the mere fact of insolvency, without more, should of itself change the character of what was the absolute property of the corporation or partnership into trust funds. Insolvency creates a condition which justifies a court with equity powers in laying hold of assets, and then so treating and disposing of them. While the assets remain undisturbed in the hands of the corporation or partnership, solvent or insolvent, it owns and may dispose of them as an individual owner may, in any manner not fraudulent as to its creditors, including stockholders in case of a corporation. Nearly all commercial credit is given to the individual, the partnership, or the corporation on the strength of its own assets, and in reliance upon a prudent management and an honest appropriation of them to the payment of its debts. In this sense the property of every debtor is a trust fund, with himself as trustee, for the payment of his debts. It is no more so simply because the debtor is a corporation, so long as it continues its active functions as such, and retains absolute control of its property. At no time does the trust attach to the property because it belongs to a corporation; but when the corporation becomes insolvent and unable to continue its active life it is so far civilly dead that its assets become subject to the administration of the courts. From that time on the assets coming into the hands of the court are treated as a trust fund for the benefit of creditors and stockholders, for they then constitute an estate to be administered. In Graham v. La Crosse & M. R. Co. 102 U. S. 148, 26 L. ed. 106, the learned Judge Bradley said: "When a corporation becomes insolvent, it is so far civilly dead that its property may be administered as a trust fund for the benefit of its stockholders and creditors. A court of equity, at the instance of the proper parties, will then make those funds trust funds, which, in other circumstances, are as much the absolute property of the corporation as any man's property is his."

This trust doctrine, as applied to the assets of corporations, solvent and insolvent, was fully discussed by Judge Brewer in Hollins v. Brierfield Coal & I. Co. 150 U. S. 371, 37 L. ed. 1113, and the construction of the court is thus stated in the headnote in 14 Sup. Ct. 127: "The expression, often used, that the property of a corporation constitutes a 'trust fund' for its creditors, only means that when the corporation is insolvent, and a court of equity has possession of its assets for administration, such assets must be appropriated to the payment of its debts before any distribution to the stockholders; but as between a corporation itself and its creditors, the former does not hold its property in trust, or subject to a lien in favor of the creditors, in any other sense than does an individual debtor." In Van Alstyne v. Cook, 25 N. Y. 489, the court, in speaking of the assets of an insolvent, limited partnership, said: "They are trust funds when the courts of equity are properly appealed to in behalf of the partners, or any partner or creditor, to protect and distribute the same upon equitable principles, and on such application assert the control over them. They are not trust funds in the hands of the partners any more than ordinary partnership property." The supreme court of Illinois declares the same doctrine in Roseboom v. Whittaker, 132 Ill. 81: "The mere insolvency of a corporation cannot have the effect of depriving creditors of their legal remedies, but they are at liberty, notwithstanding the insolvency, to sue the corporation in an action at law, and by means of such proceeding establish a specific lien upon the property seized by attachment or execution. Such lien, when perfected, will doubtless entitle the creditor acquiring it to a preference over other unsecured creditors. After the aid of a court of equity has been invoked, and that court has taken the assets of the insolvent into its hands, its jurisdiction becomes necessarily exclusive; and it will proceed, in administering the insolvent estate, upon the maxim that equality is equity." See also the later case of Peterson v. Brabrook Tailoring Co. 150 Ill. 290. In Town v. Bank of River Raisin, 2 Dougl. (Mich.) 530, it was held that a corporation has the same right to prefer one creditor over another than an individual has. This was followed in Kendall v. Bishop, 76 Mich. 634, and again in the recent case of Bank of Montreal v. J. E. Potts Salt & L. Co. 90 Mich. 845, where it was held that "a corporation may, in the absence of legislative restriction, deal with its property precisely as an individual may, and may prefer one creditor over another; and hence that the assets do not become a trust fund for pro rata distribution among all its creditors, until such time as steps are taken under the 'winding-up act.'" This "trust fund" doctrine is luminously discussed by Judge Mitchell in Hospes v. Northwestern Mfg. & Car. Co. 48 Minn. 174, 15 L. R. A. 470, who demonstrates that, unless prohibited by statute, an insolvent corporation has the same right as an individual to prefer creditors, and that there is no solid foundation for the doctrine that the insolvency of a corporation has the effect of converting its assets into a "trust fund," in any proper sense of that term. In Ang. & A. Corp. 843, it is laid down as an unqualified proposition of law that "the mere insolvency of a corporation neither impairs its power to manage its affairs nor converts its property into a trust fund for the benefit of its creditors." Almost precisely the same thing was said in Catlin v. Eagle Bank, 6 Conn. 233, and reiterated by the same court in Pondville Co. v. Clark, 25 Conn. 97. In the former case the court discussed the question at great length. In the course of its opinion, it says: "The cases of an individual and of a corporation in the matter under discussion, it appears to me, are not merely analogous, but identical, and I discern no reason for the slightest difference between them. . . . The insolvent banking corporation is just as much a trustee of the creditors, and no more, as the insolvent individual is the trustee of his creditors."

The same doctrine as to when the assets of an insolvent corporation become trust funds was declared by the supreme court of Missouri in La Grange Butter Tub Co. v. National Bank of Commerce, 122 Mo. 154. The court said: "In case of an insolvent corporation, a court of equity will make distribution of the corporation assets pro rata among the corporation creditors, and to that end will regard the corporation property as a trust fund. It is in this sense, and upon this principle, that the assets are trust funds. They are trust funds when a court of equity is appealed to in behalf of any member of the corporation or creditor to protect and distribute the assets upon equitable principles." And again, in Alberger v. National Bank of Commerce, 123 Mo. 313, Judge Barclay, in speaking of the notion that insolvency transforms the assets of a corporation into a trust fund, said: "This theory seems to have a singular fascination to some learned jurists, but, in our opinion, it is wholly untenable as applied to the facts of such a case as that before us, under the law of Missouri;" and, after a very thorough and instructive discussion of the question, he concludes that "the creditor of a corporation has the same right to secure, by superior diligence or persistency, and to retain, a preference for his claim against a private corporation, that he would have were his debtor an individual engaged in the same line of business, provided, always, that the transaction is honest,—that is to say, not a mere cover to a purpose to hinder, delay, or defraud other creditors of the failing debtor." Such is also the declared law in New Jersey. In Wilkinson v. Bauerle, 41 N. J. Eq. 640, the court said: "If there be no legislative prohibition against the transfer of corporate property or its use in preferring creditors after insolvency, no reasons can be given why such transaction should be invalidated, which would not also invalidate the like transactions of individuals. Both reason and authority establish the proposition that a corporation may sell and transfer its property, and may prefer its creditors although it is insolvent, unless such conduct is prohibited by law." The supreme court of Arkansas in the recent case of Worthen v. Griffith, 59 Ark. 562, holds the same way, and that "it is only when a court of equity, at the instance of a proper party, and in a proper proceeding, has taken possession of the assets of an insolvent corporation, that its assets may in this state be properly said to be a trust fund for its creditors." The same question as to the right of an insolvent corporation to make preferences was before the court in Gould v. Little Rock, M. R. & T. R. Co. 52 Fed. Rep. 680. Judge Caldwell said that it was the settled law in Arkansas—from which state the case came—that it might lawfully do so, and added this significant statement: "The established rule in that state is in harmony with the general, though not quite uniform, current of authorities in this country on the question." After referring to a large number of supporting authorities, he adds: "The cases which hold the contrary doctrine are bottomed on the erroneous theory that the insolvency of a corporation in effect dissolves it, and makes the directors mere trustees to distribute its assets ratably among its creditors. It is undoubtedly true that the property of a corporation is, in one sense, a trust fund for the payment of its debts; but this rule means no more than that the property of the corporation cannot be distributed among its stockholders, or applied to any purpose foreign to the legitimate business of the corporation, until its debts are paid. The rule, so far as it relates to the payment of debts, is satisfied whenever the property of a corporation is applied to the payment of any of its bona fide debts. The rule, as has been often pointed out, does not prevent a corporation, whether solvent or insolvent, from making preferences among its creditors, and exercising in good faith absolute dominion over its property in the conduct of its legitimate corporate business, so long as its right to do so is not restrained by statute or by judicial proceedings." In his opinion Judge Caldwell refers to the following authorities, none of which I have cited, as sustaining his conclusion: 2 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 802; Allis v. Jones, 45 Fed. Rep. 148; Coeert v. Rogers, 38 Mich. 363, 31 Am. Rep. 319; Coats v. Donnell, 94 N. Y. 168; Dana v. Bank of United States, 5 Watts & S. 223; Warner v. Mower, 11 Vt. 380; Whitwell v. Warner, 20 Vt. 426; Stratton v. Allen, 16 N. J. Eq. 229; Wilkinson v. Bauerte, 41 N. J. Eq. 685; Duncomb v. New York, H. & N. R. Co. 84 N. Y. 190, 88 N. Y. 1; Harts v. Brown, 77 Ill. 226; Reichwald v. Commercial Hotel Co. 106 Ill. 439; Buell v. Buckingham, 16 Iowa, 284, 85 Am. Dec. 516 (opinion by Judge Dillon); Garret v. Burlington Plow Co. 70 Iowa, 697; Smith v. Skeary, 47 Conn. 47; Planters' Bank v. Whittle, 78 Va. 737; Ashhurst's Appeal, 60 Pa. 314; Sargent v. Webster, 13 Met. 497, 46 Am. Dec. 743; Hallam v. Indianola Hotel Co. 56 Iowa, 178.

The supreme court of Alabama is equally pronounced against this "trust-fund" doctrine, and in a very able and elaborate opinion, filed as recently as April of the present year, it expressly repudiates such doctrine, and overrules a number of cases in which its existence had been recognized by that court. The learned judge who writes the opinion says: "There is nothing clearer in principle than the proposition that the property of a corporation, solvent or insolvent, bears identically the same relations to the creditors of such corporations as the property of an individual or copartnership, solvent or insolvent, sustains to the creditors of the individual or partnership, and is or is not to be impressed with a trust character upon the circumstances and under the same conditions in the first case as in the latter two." O'-Bear Jewelry Co. v. Volfer (Ala.) 28 L. R. A. 707. In the still more recent case of Thomson-Houston Electric Light Co. v. Henderson Electric & G. L. Co. (N. C.) 21 S. E. 951, the North Carolina supreme court deliberately rejected the "trust-fund" theory, and declared generally that the relation between a corporation creditor and the corporation, whether solvent or insolvent, is simply that of creditor and debtor, and that the creditor had no equitable claim upon the corporation assets either because it was a corporation or because it was insolvent. The supreme court of Indiana has lately made the same expression in emphatic terms in First Nat. Bank v. Dove-tail, B. & G. Co. (Ind.) 40 N. E. 810, and in the same further held (bearing upon the first question discussed in this opinion) that "the fact that one lending money to a corporation knew that it was to be used by the directors for a purpose involving a breach of trust does not impair the validity of the judgment against the corporation in his favor for the amount loaned, entered by the corporation's consent, with the purpose of creating a preference." In Burrill, Assignm. 5th ed. § 64, it is said: "It has been objected . . . that on the happening of its insolvency the corporation and its agents became trustees for the creditors, who were entitled to a ratable payment out of the trust fund in proportion to the amount of their debts. This position however, has not been sustained, and, apart from statutory provisions, no distinction exists between an individual and a corporation in regard to the exercise of the power of conferring preferences."

Without quoting from other cases, in which very wise and thoughtful judges have announced similar views, I am satisfied to say that to me they seem right in principle. If, for any reason, there should be a discrimination between different classes of debtors in respect to the right to make preferences among their creditors, as said by Judge Dillon in Buell 31 L. R. A.

v. Buckingham, supra, the rule should be declared by the legislature, which has the constitutional power to make and change the law, and not by the courts, which have no such power. It may be remarked, however, that as to some of the cases cited generally in support of the contrary doctrine they were controlled by local statutes which unfortunately are not mentioned, or at least not made prominent, in the opinion. For instance both Ohio and Texas cases are cited as opposed, and Rouse v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 46 Ohio St. 493, 5 L. R. A. 378, and Lyons & Thomas Hardware Co. v. Perry Stone Mfg. Co. 86 Tex. 143, 22 L. R. A. 802, do so read, but in each state there was a statute declaring that any transfer of property as a preference by a debtor who is insolvent "or in contemplation of insolvency" shall not be valid as against an assignment then in contemplation for the benefit of creditors. What influence, if any, this declared policy of the state law had upon the treatment of the general question by the courts we do not know. I have read with interest what Mr. Thompson says upon this question in his recently published work on Corporations. He is an author of acknowledged learning and ability. Upon all matters he expresses his personal views positively and clearly, and usually courteously and dispassionately; but his treatment of this question, his characterization of the deliberately declared opinions of eminent courts and judges as "the mouthings of judges" with "low conceptions," "destitute of a sense of justice," and other similar flippancies, evince such a degree of morbidity upon this subject as greatly to compromise the value of his opinion. He says (§ 6496) the "fallacy" of the conclusion to which these thoughtless judges have "jumped" is in overlooking "the fact that the analogy between an insolvent individual and an insolvent corporation wholly fails in this: That although an insolvent individual may turn over his property to certain of his creditors whom he desires to prefer, and may, by so doing, hinder and delay the others, yet he merely hinders and delays them: he does not, by that act, destroy himself; he still lives; and he may, and often does, get on his feet again, and acquire property, and discharge his previous obligations. But when a corporation becomes insolvent, and ceases to have the means of carrying out the objects of its creation, and disposes itself of all its property, it destroys itself, and becomes ipso facto dissolved." In his zeal to demonstrate the "fallacy," has not the learned author allowed himself to start from unstable premises? Is it entirely safe to build upon a foundation that when a corporation becomes insolvent, "and disposes itself of all its property, it destroys itself, and becomes ipso facto dissolved?" In § 6482 of the same book he has told us that "the assignment by a corporation of all its property for the benefit of its creditors does not extinguish it as a corporation, or disable it from maintaining an action, unless the subject-matter of the action passed from it by the assignment." In this latter statement he seems well supported by authority, though Judge Story, in a dissenting opinion in Beaton v. Farmers' Bank, 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 138, 9 L. ed. 1031, intimated a contrary opinion. See Burrill, Assignm. 5th ed. § 64; Ang. & A. Corp. § 770, and cases cited by each of these authors. The law is generally recognized to be, as stated by Mr. Thompson, that neither the insolvency of nor a general assignment by a private corporation works its dissolution. An individual debtor, stripped of his means for satisfying his debts, "still lives," but it is just as true of a corporation. Each is still a living debtor without present ability to pay his or its debts. It is probably true that an individual debtor is more likely to "get on his feet again," but that is incidental merely, and does not prove or tend to prove any difference in their legal status. The possession of property is no more essential to the existence of a corporation than it is to the existence of a man. If a corporation becomes insolvent, there is nothing to prevent its members, until its dissolution is legally declared, from furnishing more funds, and proceeding to use its corporate powers. Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 1010, and citations. My conclusion is that the hardware company, although insolvent, might legally prefer Deyette as a creditor, and that his judgment, founded on a good consideration, was not invalid or unenforceable on account of such preference.

As to Lewis and his judgment, the facts established by the findings are the same, except that at the date of his judgment and before—but how long before is not found—he was a director and secretary of the company. He, too, loaned money to the company for the purpose of buying the Trask stock, and, it not being shown that at the time of such loaning and purchase he had any connection with the company, he, as a creditor, would stand upon the same footing as Deyette, except that when his judgment was confessed he was a director and officer of the company. On the 9th day of May the company confessed these judgments,—one to Deyette, already considered; one to Foster, over which there seems to be no controversy; and one to Lewis, now in hand. Lewis himself executed these confessions as secretary of the company. Executions were issued on these judgments, and levied upon the personal property of the hardware company, but when issued or when levied does not appear. On the 12th, execution was also issued on respondent's judgment. The property was sold, and the proceeds, which are "not sufficient to pay the judgments against the Hicks-Trask Hardware Company prior to the judgment of plaintiff" (respondent), are held by the sheriff "to be applied on said executions according to the decree of this court." It not appearing that executions were issued on other judgments than those named, we understand from the language of the findings that the proceeds are insufficient to pay the three judgments first named. The Foster and the Deyette judgments being good, and entitled to be paid, the contest is over the balance in the hands of the sheriff, and between Lewis and the respondent. While the findings do not expressly show—as we wish they did—when the execution on the Lewis judgment was issued or levied, it must have been prior to the issuance of respondent's execution, for the property appears to have been sold under the Lewis, Foster, and Deyette executions. The fact that the company was insolvent, that it confessed these three judgments on the 9th, and that three days thereafter it confessed judgment to quite a number of other creditors, including respondent, and that executions were issued and levied on the first three judgments either prior to or on the 12th, the date of the subsequent judgments, and before respondent's execution, issued immediately upon obtaining its judgment, is very convincing, though perhaps not incontestible, evidence that it was intended that Foster, Lewis, and Deyette should be given a preference over other creditors. I have no doubt that it was so designed. So that the question now in hand is, Could the company legally prefer Lewis, a director, and one of its managing officers, on account of an indebtedness not contracted on the strength of such preference, but for a general antecedent indebtedness? I think we can hold that it could not, consistently with what I have already said in respect to the right generally of an insolvent corporation to prefer creditors. While the directors and officers of a corporation, solvent or insolvent, are not in any proper sense the trustees of the creditors, they do occupy a relation to them demanding the utmost good faith on their part in the handling of the corporation assets. To their honest and fair dealing with the property, and to their just and prudent management of the business, the creditors must look for their continued security. As in the case of others occupying a fiduciary position, they cannot innocently sacrifice the interests of those who trust them to their own personal advantage. As managers of the corporation and its property, they owe a duty to those dealing with them, which they violate when, to the detriment of those who confide in them, they make themselves preferred beneficiaries in the disposition of assets which, without such preference, would be available alike to all creditors. They hold in their hands the property of the corporation to which creditors must look for satisfaction of their claims, and come within the just principle that one who has possession and control of property for the benefit of others besides himself may not dispose of it for his own special advantage, to the injury of others, for whom it is also held.

The judgment in this case was confessed. Lewis himself as secretary of the company executed the confession to himself. It was not a hostile proceeding against the company in which he acted as a creditor only, but was a voluntary effort on the part of the company, executed through and by him as its secretary, to give himself an advantage over creditors generally, with no equities to justify such preference, except that he was a general creditor on account of an antecedent indebtedness. I do not think such a preference should be sustained.

In many of the states which recognize the general right of an insolvent corporation to make preferences among its creditors, such preferences in favor of its own directors on account of antecedent indebtedness, in the absence of special equities, are not sustained. See Gottlieb v. Miller, 154 Ill. 44, where a preference was sustained as to outside creditors, and set aside as to directors. See also Lippincott v. Shaw Carriage Co. 25 Fed. Rep. 577, where a large number of cases are cited to the point that directors and managing officers cannot be preferred. Montgomery v. Phillips (N. J.) 31 Atl. 622, followed in Mallory v. Kirkpatrick (N. J.) 38 Atl. 205; Henderson v. Indiana Trust Co. (Ind.) 40 N. E. 516; Corey v. Wadsworth, 99 Ala. 68, 23 L. R. A. 618. See also upon this a valuable note to Lyons-Thomas Hardware Co. v. Perry Stove Mfg. Co. (Tex.) in 22 L. R. A. 802, in which the editor's conclusion is thus stated: "On examination of the decisions, it is clear that the weight of authority is overwhelmingly in favor of the legality of preferences to ordinary creditors, except as restricted by statute, and overwhelmingly against the validity of such preferences when made in favor of directors."

The trial court held the Lewis judgment invalid, both because of the invalidity of its consideration and because it was the result of an attempt to give preference to a director. For reasons stated early in this opinion, I think the first ground untenable. As to the second ground, I am of the opinion that he, being a director and one of the managing officers of the company, ought not to get any advantage in the nature of a preference, but that the court was wrong in holding his judgment void and in denying him participation in the distribution of the proceeds of sale in the hands of the sheriff. This seems to be the policy of our statute. If, by a general assignment, this preference had been attempted in favor of Lewis, the preference would have failed, but he would still have been entitled to share ratably with other creditors. Comp. Laws, § 4660. I think there is much in the majority opinion that is sentimentally good and wholesome, but that the text from which it is elaborated cannot be found anywhere in the facts returned by the trial court, or of which we have any judicial knowledge.

Finally, I cannot quite understand how the court, having deliberately declared that the assets of this corporation, being insolvent, constitute a fund for ratable distribution among its creditors without preference, can affirm this judgment, which gives to this respondent creditor practically the entire assets of the corporation, in the face of the record showing other creditors, whose judgments were confessed at the same time and which must go unpaid. This is an equitable action in the nature of a creditor's bill in behalf of this plaintiff only, and the remark of Judge Thayer in Walker v. Miller, 59 Fed. Rep. 871, seems pertinent: "If this trust-fund theory is to be adopted to prevent the corporation from granting a preference because of its insolvency, we know of no reason why it should not be invoked to keep attaching creditors at bay, and thus relegate the disposal of the fund so far as judicial proceedings are concerned, to a court of equity." OREGON SUPREME COURT.

A. R. HEINTZ et al., Appts..

Joseph BURKHARD, Resp't.

(.....Or.....)

An oral contract to manufacture and furnish ironwork for a brick building according to special designs and measurements suitable only for use in that particular building is not within the statute of frauds as a sale of personal property.

(February 24, 1896.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of nonsuit entered by the Circuit Court for Multnomah County in an action to recover damages for breach of contract to purchase ironwork for a building. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. William T. Muir, for appellants:

An agreement to manufacture and furnish materials, according to certain specifications, is not within the statute of frauds, when, without the special contract, the articles to be manufactured and furnished thereunder would not have been manufactured at all, or would not have been manufactured in the particular manner, shape, or condition provided for in such contract. Such a contract is essentially one for special skill, labor, or workmanship, and need not be in writing.

carried out, is the sale and transfer of personal property from one person to another for a price not less than $50, is a contract within the statute of frauds, and therefore void, unless in writing signed by the parties to be charged. This is especially true where the essential consideration of the purchase is the product itself, rather than the work and labor to be performed thereon.

Fr. 4th ed. § 308a; 2 Benjamin, Sales, Rev. ed. 121; Gorham v. Fisher, 30 Vt. 428.

Bean, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought to recover damages for the breach of a contract to furnish the ironwork for defendant's building, and comes here on an appeal from a judgment of nonsuit. For the purposes of this appeal, it is sufficient to say that the evidence tended to show that in August, 1894, the plaintiff and defendant entered into an oral contract, by the terms of which the plaintiff was to manufacture, and furnish to the defendant, the ironwork for a brick building about to be erected by him, according to certain plans and specifications, for the sum of $2,825, but that defendant subsequently, and before any work was performed, wrongfully refused to allow plaintiff to proceed with the execution of its contract. The ironwork referred to was not to be of the kind manufactured by the plaintiff in the usual course of business, or for the trade, but of special designs and measurements, suitable only for use in the construction of defendant's building. The court below ruled that the contract was "an agreement for the sale of personal property," within the meaning of subdivision 5, § 785, of Hill's Annotated Laws, and void because not in writing, and this ruling presents the only question to be determined on this appeal.

To determine whether a given contract concerning personal property, which does not exist in specie at the time it is entered into, but must be manufactured and brought into being under the contract, comes within the statute of frauds, is not without difficulty, and the decisions are by no means reconcilable. The chief difficulty in all such cases is encountered in determining when the contract is substantially for the sale of personal property, to be executed in the future, and when for work and labor and material only. If the former, it is within the statute. If the latter, it is not. Thus far, the authorities, except in the state of New York, are substantially agreed; but there have been numerous decisions, and much diversity and even conflict of opinion, in relation to a proper rule by which to determine whether a contract is in fact for the sale of personal property, and therefore within the statute, or for work and labor and material furnished, and so without the statute. There appear to be substantially three distinct views upon the statute, which, for convenience, are generally designated as the English, the New York, and the Massachusetts rules, as represented by the decisions of their respective courts. In England, after a long series of cases in which various tests have been suggested, the rule seems to have been settled in Lee v. Griffin, 1 Best & S. 272, that "if the contract be such that, when carried out, it would result in the sale of a chattel the party cannot sue for work and labor, but, if the result of the contract is that the party has done work and labor which ends in nothing that can become the subject of a sale, the party cannot sue for goods sold and delivered." In that case the action was brought by a dentist to recover £21 for two sets of artificial teeth made for the defendant's testatrix. The court held the contract to be for the sale of chattels, and within the statute. But this decision seems to stand alone, and is in direct conflict with the previous decisions of the English courts. Towers v. Osborne, 1 Strange, 506; Clayton v. Andrews, 4 Burr. 2101; Rondeau v. Wyatt, 2 H. Bl. 63; Cooper v. Elston, 7 T. R. 14; Groves v. Buck, 3 Maule & S. 178; Garbutt v. Watson, 5 Barn. & Ald. 618; Smith v. Surman, 9 Barn. & C. 574. It is said to have been the result of Lord Tenterden's act, which expressly extended the statute to all contracts of sale, notwithstanding the goods "may not at the time of such contract be actually made, procured or produced or fit or ready for delivery, or some act may be required for the making or completing thereof to render the same fit for delivery." Meincke v. Falk, 55 Wis. 432, 42 Am. Rep. 722; Benjamin, Sales, 6th ed. 108. In this condition of the English authorities, we are not prepared to go to the full extent of Lee v. Griffin. It is an extreme case, and, unless the decision was made to conform to Lord Tenterden's act, it antagonizes the opinions of some of the most eminent jurists of England, and is open to the objection that it practically permits the fraud which theoretically the statute seeks to prevent. To say that a contract of a dentist to manufacture and furnish a set of false teeth for his customer is "an agreement for the sale of personal property," within the meaning of the statute, is certainly giving it the widest possible operation, and has not found general recognition in this country, as a correct exposition of the doctrine, although the simplicity of the rule has commended it to many of the judges. In New York the rule prevails that a contract concerning personal property not existing in solido at the time of the contract, but which the vendor is to manufacture or put in condition for delivery, such as the woodwork for a wagon, or wheat not yet threshed, or nails to be made from iron belonging to the manufacturer and the like, is not within the statute. Crookshank v. Burrell, 18 Johns. 58, 9 Am. Dec. 187; Downs v. Ross, 23 Wend. 270; Sewall v. Fitch, 8 Cow. 215; Parsons v. Loucks, 48 N. Y. 17, 8 Am. Rep.

517; Cooke v. Millard, 65 N. Y. 352, 22 Am. Rep. 619; Higgins v. Murray, 73 N. Y. 252. But this rule seems to be peculiar to that state. By the Massachusetts rule the test is not the existence or nonexistence of the commodity at the time of the contract, as in New York, or whether the contract will ultimately result in the transfer of the title of a chattel from the vendor to the vendee, as in England, but whether the article is such as the manufacturer ordinarily produces in the course of business, and for the trade, or as the result of a special order, and for special purposes. If the former, it is regarded as a contract of sale, and within the statute. If the latter, it is held to be essentially a contract for labor and material, and therefore not within the statute. Thus, it is held that an agreement to build a carriage of a certain design is not within the statute (Mixer v. Howarth, 21 Pick. 206, 32 Am. Dec. 256), but that a contract to buy a certain number of boxes of candles at a fixed price, which the vendor said he would thereafter finish and deliver, is a contract of sale, to which the statute applies. Gardner v. Joy, 9 Met. 177. The result of the decisions in that state has recently been stated thus: "A contract for the sale of articles then existing, or such as the vendor in the ordinary course of his business manufactures or procures for the general market, whether on hand at the time or not, is a contract for the sale of goods, to which the statute applies. But on the other hand, if the goods are to be manufactured especially for the purchaser and upon his special order and not for the general market, the case is not within the statute." Ames, J., in Goddard v. Binney, 115 Mass. 450, 15 Am. Rep. 112. And this doctrine seems to be the one most widely adopted in this country. As to the latter part of the rule, relating to goods made on special orders, there is little if any conflict in the American cases. Baker, Sales, § 96; 2 Schouler, Pers. Prop. § 448; Browne, Stat. Fr. § 308; 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law. p. 707; note to Flynn v. Dougherty (Cal.) 14 L. R. A. 280; Meincke v. Falk, 55 Wis. 427, 42 Am. Rep. 722; Finney v. Appgar, 81 N. J. L. 266; Phipps v. McFarlane, 3 Minn. 109 (Gil. 61), 74 Am. Dec. 748; Hight v. Ripley, 19 Me. 187; Cason v. Cheely, 6 Ga. 554; Abbott v. Gilchrist, 88 Me. 260.

Until legislation shall assert itself more positively, the courts are put to their election as between these three rules, which, though each has its own merits, are not to be reconciled with one another. In the absence of a statute substantially the same as Lord Tenterden's act, we are unwilling to go to the extent of the doctrine of Lee v. Griffin, 1 Best & S. 272; and in this case it is unnecessary for us to give a preference to either the New York or Massachusetts rule, because the contract in question is valid under either. It would be excluded from the operation of the statute by the rule adopted in New York, because the subject-matter of the contract did not exist in solido, or at all, at the time it was made; and it is not within the statute under the Massachusetts rule and the generally accepted American doctrine, because the ironwork was to be manufactured especially for the defendant, and upon his special order, according to a particular design, and was not such as the plaintiffs, in the ordinary course of their business, manufactured for the general trade. It follows that under either view the court below was in error in holding that the contract was void because not in writing.

The judgment must therefore be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

PEOPLE of the State of New York, Respts.,
v.

ADELPHI CLUB of the City of Albany,
Appt.

(149 N. Y. 5.)

- 1. The construction placed upon a statute penal in character by public officers charged with the duty of executing its provisions, for many years, may properly be considered in determining the legislative intention.
- 2. The distribution of intoxicating liquors to members of a social club upon the written order of a member at a price fixed by the officers of the club, designed to cover the purchase price and disbursements in serving, where the club was incorporated for a legitimate purpose to which the furnishing of liquors to its members is merely incidental, does not constitute a sale within the meaning of N. Y. Laws 1892, chap. 401, prohibiting sales of such liquors without a license, but making no provision whereby such a club can obtain a license.

(April 7, 1896.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Third Department, affirming a judgment of the Court of Quarter Sessions for Albany County convicting defendant of selling liquor without a license. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Matthew Hale and Albert C. Tennant, with Mr. David Muhlfelder, for appellant:

Messrs. Eugene Burlingame and John T. Cook, for respondents:

The title to all this property was vested in the corporation as such. A purchasing member did not receive the liquor as a partial division or distribution of the liquor among its members for he paid of his individual money the price or value of the liquor delivered to him, and the money which he delivered to the club became part of its assets in place of the liquor he received from the club. So that in any event it was a sale pure and simple.

This is not a case where the omission of the officers of the law to enforce its plain command, or where the long and continued violation of the law by clubs without being prosecuted, can be relied upon as a legitimate argument that usage or custom or practical construction should be regarded by the court as any advantage in determining the meaning of this statute.

Haight, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The offense of which the defendant stands convicted is that of selling strong and spirituous liquors to be drunk upon the premises, without a license, in violation of § 31, of chap. 401, of the Laws of 1892.

On the 28th day of January, 1895, one Leopold M. Stark made a written order upon a piece of paper for five glasses of liquor, and delivered the same to the steward of the defendant, who filled the order from the stock of liquors belonging to the club, and the same was served to Stark and his associates, who drank it upon the premises. They were all members of the club. The following evening Stark paid the steward therefor 50 cents, which went into the treasury of the club.

The defendant was regularly incorporated on the 10th day of February, 1881, as a social club, to establish and maintain a library, reading and assembly rooms, and to promote social intercourse among its members. It is managed by a board of trustees with a membership limited to one hundred and fifty persons of full age and residents of the city of Albany. A person can be admitted as a member only when proposed by some member to whom he is personally known, and upon the recommendation of the board of trustees, and by an election by the members at a regular meeting of the club by a two-thirds vote. The initiation fee is $50, and the annual dues $30.

The defendant maintains a clubhouse at the corner of Division and South Pearl streets, in the city of Albany, in which there are parlors, a ballroom, diningroom, kitchen, library, cardrooms, billiard, pool and storerooms, with apartments for the janitor. Meals, cigars and liquors are served to members of the club upon their written orders at a price fixed therefor by the house committee of the board of trustees which is charged to the member, who pays therefor monthly. The money so paid in by the members, together with the annual dues, is used in defraying the general expenses of the club, its library, reading-rooms, servants, lights and fuel, and in keeping up its stock of provisions, cigars, and liquors. Its business is conducted solely for the entertainment and recreation of its members, and not for the purpose of deriving a profit beyond the defraying of its expenses. Residents of the city of Albany may be introduced to the club by any member thereof once a year. Nonresidents may in like manner be introduced, not to exceed ten times a year. A member introducing a visitor is required to register his name in a book kept for that purpose, and to be responsible for his conduct while in the club-house. From ten to twelve entertainments,—social, literary, musical, and dramatic,—are given annually, to which the female friends of members are invited.

The statute under which the defendant was indicted provides as follows: "Any person who, without having a license granted to him in pursuance of a law of this state permitting him to sell either strong or spirituous liquors, wines, ale, or beer, shall sell strong or spirituous liquors, wines, ale, or beer in quantities of less than five gallons at a time, or shall sell any strong or spirituous liquor, wine, ale, or beer in quantities of five gallons or more at a time to be drunk or used on the premises where the same shall be sold, or in any garden or enclosure communicating with such premises, or in any public street or place contiguous thereto, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor."

Upon the trial the defendant asked the court to direct the jury to find a verdict of acquittal on the grounds: First, that the facts proved do not constitute a crime. Second, that the facts proved do not show that the defendant has violated § 31, chap. 401, of the Laws of 1892 or any of the provisions of said chap. 401 of the Laws of 1892. The court refused to so direct, and an exception was taken by the defendant.

The court was then asked by the defendant to charge that "the disposing of wines and liquors by the defendant is not a sale of the same within the meaning and intent of the provisions of chap. 401, Laws of 1892, or of the laws amendatory or supplementary thereto, and that the furnishing of wines and liquors by the defendant to its members, as shown by the evidence, is not a violation of § 31, chap. 401, Laws of 1892, nor a violation of any of the provisions of said act." This was refused and an exception was taken.

Much has already been written with reference to the liability of social clubs under excise laws. An impression has prevailed that they were not brought within the provisions of the statute, and, consequently, thousands of clubs have been organized all over the country, by hotel and saloonkeepers who had been refused a license, for the purpose of evading the laws with reference thereto. The devices adopted by these so-called clubs were numerous, and in many instances ingenious. It, however, has not been difficult to ascertain the true purpose and intent of their organization. And the courts thus far have not failed to unmask such schemes, and hold the organizers thereof responsible for a violation of the law. But this defendant is conceded to be a legitimate club, regularly organized, of many years' standing, and conducted for the purposes mentioned in its articles of incorporation.

The first question is, Has the liability of such a club ever been determined by this court? Upon this question the counsel for the respective parties differ with reference to what was decided in the case of People v. Andrews, 115 N. Y. 427, 6 L. R. A. 128. In that case the general term held that social clubs, organized for legitimate purposes, were authorized by the statute; that the property of the club was in effect the joint property of the members, and that the furnishing of liquors of the club to its members by the steward was not a violation of the statute. There was evidence, however, in that case tending to show that the club was a fraudulent concern, organized for the purpose of evading the law by a saloon keeper who had been refused a license; that any person could join the club upon the payment of 50 cents, which was returned to him upon his withdrawal, and that the only object and purpose of the organization were the sale of strong and spirituous liquors. The general term reached the conclusion that the trial court should have submitted to the jury the question as to whether the organization was a scheme or a device to evade the excise law. 50 Hun, 592, 595.

Upon this question the court of appeals differed with the general term, holding that the question of sale under the statute depended upon the character of the act. The opinion calls attention to the evidence in much detail, tending to show the fraudulent character of the organization; that the sales were made for cash, and the business conducted in every respect as in an ordinary saloon,—and then concludes: "Whatever may be the merits of the scheme prescribed by the organization it has no effect here. It did not control or govern the parties."

We are aware that it has been generally understood that this court in that case intended to hold clubs liable under the statute, and that the general terms in several instances have subsequently so held, resting their decisions upon that case. People v. Sinell, 34 N. Y. S. R. 898; People v. Bradley, 33 N. Y. S. R. 562; People v. Luhrs, 7 Misc. 503. But such was not the intention of this court, and to that extent its determination has been misunderstood. The question here presented must therefore be regarded as undecided and still open for consideration.

In 11 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 727, it is said that "the distribution of liquors by a bona fide club among its members is not a sale within the inhibition of a liquor law, even though the person receiving the liquor gives money in return for it, and the law prohibiting the sale of liquor on Sunday does not apply to such a club. It is otherwise, however, where such club is simply a device resorted to as a means of evading the statute."

Black on Intoxicating Liquors, at §142, after referring to the authorities in the different states upon the subject, concludes as follows: "Upon the whole, therefore, notwithstanding some conflicting rulings, the rational conclusion is that the intent must govern. On the one hand, if the object of the organization is merely to provide the members with a convenient method of obtaining a drink whenever they desire it, or if the form of membership is no more than a pretense, so that any person, without discrimination, can procure liquor by signing his name in a book or buying a ticket or a chip, thus enabling the proprietor to conduct an illicit traffic, then it falls within the terms of the law. But on the other hand, if the club is organized and conducted in good faith with a limited and selected membership, really owning its property in common, and formed for social, literary, artistic, or other purposes, to which the furnishing of liquor to its members would be merely incidental, in the same way and to the same extent that the supplying of dinners or daily papers might be, then it cannot be considered as within either the purpose or letter of the law."

In Graff v. Evans, L. R. 8 Q. B. Div. 373, the appellant was a manager of a club under the supervision of trustees, in whom all the property of the club was vested. The club was not licensed for the sale of intoxicating liquors, but these were supplied at fixed prices to members for consumption, the money produced thereby going to the general fund of the club. The manager in the course of his employment supplied liquors to a member. It was held that it was not a sale within the meaning of the licensing act. Field, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "The question here is, 'Did Graff, the manager who supplied the liquor to Foster, effect a sale by retail? I think not. I think Foster was an owner of the property, together with all the other members of the club. Any member was entitled to obtain the goods on payment of the price. A sale involves the element of a bargain. There was no bargain here, nor any contract with Graff with respect to the goods. Foster was acting upon his rights as a member of the club, not by reason of any new contract, but under his old contract of association, by which he subscribed a sum to the funds of the club and became entitled to have ale and whiskey supplied to him as a member at a certain price.'"

In State Bell, v. St. Louis Club, 26 L. R. A. 573, 125 Mo. 308, it was held that the distribution of wines or other liquors among the members of a social club which is a bona fide organization with limited membership, admission to which is only on a vote of the governing board, and with common ownership of property, is not a sale of liquor within the meaning of the Missouri dramshop act. This is a recent case, and the opinion contains a review of all of the decisions upon the subject.

The courts in our sister states are in conflict upon the question discussed in the above cases. Many of the decisions are based upon local statutes differing materially from our own, and other cases are disposed of upon the ground of the fraudulent character of the organization. For a full and elaborate discussion of the cases we refer to Black on Intoxicating Liquors, § 142, and to State. Bell, v. St. Louis Club, supra. A further discussion of them here we do not deem necessary or profitable, for the question presented must be determined upon a construction of our own statute. It first provides for the creation of boards of excise in towns and cities, prescribes their powers and duties, and then, in § 19, provides that "a board of excise may, when authorized by law, and not otherwise, grant," etc., a license. It then specifies the cases in which a license may be granted: First, to the keeper of an inn, tavern or hotel; second, to the keeper of a saloon; third, to the keeper of a saloon for the sale of ale and beer only; fourth, to the keeper of a store; and fifth, to the keeper of a drug store. The statute contains no provision authorizing the issuing of a license to a club or an organization of the character of the defendant. And it was conceded on the part of the learned district attorney upon the argument that the defendant was not an inn, tavern, or hotel, a saloon, store, or drug store within the meaning of the act which permitted boards of excise to issue a license to it. We are thus brought to a consideration of the provisions of § 31, under which the defendant was indicted. It is prohibitory as to form and character of the sale of strong and spirituous liquors wines, ale, or beer by a person without having a license. It provides that a person offending shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. This section doubtless must be considered in connection with § 19, which, as we have seen, regulates the sale of strong and spirituous liquors by requiring persons who engage in that business to first procure a license, and specifies the kinds of license which the board of excise may issue. The fact that clubs of the nature of the defendant are not included within its provisions has an important bearing upon the meaning to be placed upon the provisions of § 31. In this connection the construction placed upon a statute penal in character, by public officers charged with the duty of executing its provisions for many years, may properly be considered in determining the legislative intention. Potter's Dwarrr. Stat. 183, 184; People, Williams, v. Dayton, 55 N. Y. 367-378; Brown v. United States, 113 U. S. 568, 28 L. ed. 1079. Upon this subject the evidence shows that clubs in this state have existed for a long period, that they have not been required to take out a license, and yet it is a well-known fact that they have kept on hand stocks of liquors which they distributed to their members. Was it then intended that the distribution of liquors by a club among its members should be a sale within the contemplation of the statute? If so commissioners of excise, police officers and district attorneys have for many years neglected their official duties.

As we have seen, the defendant is a social club organized under the statute for a legitimate purpose, to which the furnishing of liquors to its members is merely incidental and is not unlike the supplying of diners or articles which the member may desire for his own comfort and entertainment. The defendant has a limited and selected membership. And while the property and supplies are technically owned by the club, each member is, in equity, an equal owner in common. It was not organized for the purpose of engaging in a business for profit, or for the traffic in liquors. It engages in no business other than that which pertains to the maintenance of its library, reading-rooms, and the social intercourse and comfort of its members. Liquors, as well as other supplies, are distributed to its members upon the written order of the member at a price fixed by the officers of the club designed to cover the purchase price and disbursements in serving. These orders pass to the steward or treasurer of the club and are charged against the member, who settles therefor monthly. We think that the transaction with Stark did not amount to a sale within the meaning of the statute. It was but a distribution among the members of the club of the property that belonged to them. The fact that a payment was made does not change the character of the act, for it was but the means adopted by which each member could receive his own and not that belonging to his fellow member. The payment went into the treasury to ultimately restore that which he had taken.

We think the court erred in refusing to charge as requested that the act charged against the defendant was not a violation of the statute, and that the judgment of the General Term and Court of Sessions should be reversed, and the defendant discharged.

All concur.

1. The power of the legislature over the subject of marriage as a civil status is unlimited and supreme except as restricted by the Constitution.
2. A statute providing that a sentence to imprisonment for life shall operate as an absolute dissolution of the marriage of the party does not violate the provision of Const. art. 4, § 24, that the legislature shall never grant any divorce.
3. The reversal of a sentence to imprisonment for life on account of error, but not for want of jurisdiction, does not operate to restore the marriage relation of the convict, which had been dissolved by the sentence, under Rev. Stat. § 2385.

I. In general.

At common law, independent of statutory enactment, the conviction and sentence of either husband or wife was not a ground for divorce or an annulment of the marriage relation.

In most of the states of the Union, however, such conviction and sentence have been made a statutory ground for a decree a vinculo.

There are some few states, however, which make the commitment and sentence a ground for an absolute annulment of the marriage without any proceedings by way of divorce or otherwise. This will be found to be the case in Maine, Michigan, Rhode Island, and Wisconsin.

In Alabama imprisonment in any state penitentiary for two years, the sentence being for seven years or longer, is a ground for divorce. Civil Code, ed. 1886, § 2322, p. 523.

And in Arizona conviction of a felony after marriage, and imprisonment in any prison, are a ground for divorce, but cannot be prosecuted until six months after conviction, provided that one is not convicted on the evidence of the other, and a pardon does not take away the right. Rev. Stat. ed. 1887, § 2111, p. 374.

So, in Arkansas, conviction of felony or other infamous crime entitles the innocent party to a divorce. Dig. Stat. ed. 1884, chap. 52, § 2558, p. 580.

And in California the conviction of a felony is 31 L. R. A.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Ashland County, convicting him of adultery. Reversed.

Statement by Pinney, J.:

This case comes before the court upon exceptions under § 4720, Rev. Stat. from which it appears that the defendant was tried and convicted in the circuit court for Ashland county upon an information charging him with having on the 6th of May, 1893, at the county of Ashland, and thence continuously up to October 3, 1893, committed adultery with Lucy French, then and there the lawful wife of William G. French, who was then and there still alive, etc. The case was submitted to the jury on a stipulation of facts, namely: That William G. French and Lucy M. French were married about the year 1875, and are both still living; that in June, 1891, William G. French was convicted of murder in the first degree, and sentenced to imprisonment for life, and said sentence was executed; that May 22, 1893, the supreme court of Wisconsin reversed such ground for divorce. Deer. Civ. Code, ed. 1886, § 92, p. 32.

By the Colorado statutes the conviction of a crime or infamous offense entitles the innocent party to a divorce. 1 Mills' Anno. Stat. chap. 43, p. 1035, § 1562.

So, in Connecticut among the statutory grounds for which divorce may be granted will be found, sentence to imprisonment for life, and the conviction of an infamous crime involving a violation of conjugal duty, subjecting the offender to imprisonment in the state prison. Gen. Stat. ed. 1888, p. 612, § 2802.

So, under the Revised Code of the District of Columbia of 1857 sentence of imprisonment for life or for seven years or more was a statutory ground for divorce, but it would seem that by the act of June 19, 1860, chap. 158, and June 1, 1870, chap. 116, the same is not now a ground of divorce. Rev. Stat. § 738, p. 88.

And under the laws of Delaware the conviction in or out of the state after marriage, of a crime made such under the state law, no matter whether such crime was perpetrated before or after marriage, is a ground of divorce. Del. Laws, ed. 1893, chap. 75, § 1, p. 595.

In Georgia, under the Code, a sentence of imprisonment for two or more years for an offense involving moral turpitude is a ground for total divorce. Code, ed. 1882, p. 395, § 1712, subd. 8.

So, in Idaho the conviction of a felony entitles the innocent party to a divorce under the laws of that state. Rev. Stat. ed. 1887, § 2457, p. 304.

So, the Revised Statutes of Illinois make the conviction of felony or other infamous crime a ground of divorce. 1 Starr & C. Anno. Stat. ed. 1885, p. 885, chap. 40, ¶ 1, § 1.

And the Revised Statutes of Indiana make the conviction after marriage in any country, of either party, of an infamous crime, a ground. 1 Rev. Stat. Myer's ed. 1888, § 1033.

In Iowa the conviction of felony after marriage works a divorce under the Code. 1 McClain's Anno. Code, ed. 1888, p. 891, § 3414.

And in Kansas the conviction of felony and imprisonment therefor subsequent to the marriage is made a ground of divorce. 2 Gen. Stat. ed. 1889, p. 1563, § 4749.

sentence, and granted a new trial; that on May 6, 1893, said Lucy M. French and the defendant were married, and lived together as man and wife up to the time of his arrest for this offense; that before such marriage the defendant had been advised by counsel that the conviction and sentence of William G. French constituted a legal separation, without further judicial proceedings, entitling him to marry her without the intervention of a decree of divorce; that the marriage was consummated on said facts and advice, and had no reference to proceedings in the supreme court; that the defendant at the time of the marriage knew of the proceedings then pending in such court for a new trial; and that, after the reversal of the sentence, defendant was advised by counsel that such reversal did not restore William G. French and Lucy M. French to their marital rights, and that the defendant would testify that such marriage was made by him in good faith. The prosecution and defense thereupon rested. Defendant moved the court to direct a verdict in his favor, on the ground that the state had failed to prove a case, but the court refused such direction. The court charged the jury: (1) That if they found the facts stipulated against the defendant by him to be true, and they were satisfied therefrom of defendant's guilt, they should convict him; (2) That if the conviction and sentence of William G. French had been legal, it would have been a complete defense, but the supreme court reversed the judgment of sentence, and held the same to be invalid; (3) That as a matter of law, the conviction of William G. French being illegal, it was no defense which would be of any avail or benefit to the defendant. Exceptions were taken to the refusal to instruct the jury as requested, and for giving each of the several instructions stated.

Messrs. Tomkins & Merrill, for appellant:

The provision of the statute is that on the happening of a certain event then the marriage tie shall be dissolved, that is, the relation of husband and wife shall cease to exist. This relation is not a contractual relation but a status.

Under the General Statutes of Kentucky condemnation for felony in that state or elsewhere is a ground. Stat. ed. 1894, chap. 66, art. 2, § 2117, p. 768.

So, in the Louisiana Code condemnation to an infamous punishment, or where the party, being charged with an infamous offense, flees from justice, is made the ground for a divorce from bed and board. Rev. Code, ed. 1889, title 5, art. 138, p. 68.

And by article 139 of the same, married persons may claim reciprocally a divorce for the causes named in the prior section, but except where, inter alia, there have been a conviction and sentence no divorce can be granted unless a judgment of separation has been decreed and a year has expired without reconciliation.

Under Maine Rev. Stat. ed. 1883, chap. 60, § 1, p. 520, the sentence of either party to imprisonment for life and confinement under it dissolves the marriage without legal process.

The Public Statutes of Massachusetts make provision for a divorce when either party has been sentenced to confinement at hard labor for life, or for five years or more in the state prison, or in a jail or house of correction, and also declare that a pardon granted to the guilty party after such a divorce will not restore the conjugal rights. Pub. Stat. ed. 1887, chap. 146, § 2, p. 813.

Under the Revised Statutes of Michigan the sentence of imprisonment for life in any prison, jail, or house of correction absolutely dissolves the marriage without a divorce, and a pardon does not restore the party's rights. 2 How. Stat. ed. 1882, title 23, chap. 237, § 6227, p. 1621.

And in Minnesota the sentence of imprisonment in a state prison subsequent to the marriage is a ground for divorce, and a pardon does not restore the conjugal rights. 1 Gen. Stat. ed. 1878, chap. 62, title 1, §§ 6, 7, p. 823.

And a similar provision is contained in the Mississippi Code, which makes the sentence to the penitentiary a ground for divorce, provided the guilty party is not pardoned before being sent there. Anno. Code, ed. 1892, chap. 36, § 1562, p. 419.

So, the Revised Statutes of Missouri make the conviction and sentence during marriage of a felony or infamous crime a ground for divorce. 1 Rev. Stat. ed. 1880, chap. 53, § 4501, p. 1029.

And the Montana Code provides for a divorce upon the conviction of felony or other infamous crime without subsequent cohabitation. Comp. Stat. ed. 1887, chap. 58, p. 919, § 999.

Under the statutes of Nebraska the sentence of imprisonment in any prison, jail, or house of correction for three years or more is a ground for divorce, and no pardon restores the conjugal rights. Consol. Stat. ed. 1893, chap. 13, § 1422, p. 410.

And under the same section imprisonment for life is also a ground, and a pardon has no effect. Ibid.

The Nevada laws provide for divorce in case of conviction for felony or infamous crime.

So, under the General Laws of New Hampshire the conviction of either party of crime punishable in that state with imprisonment for more than a year is made a ground for divorce, provided the guilty party be actually imprisoned under such conviction. Pub. Stat. ed. 1881, chap. 175, § 5, p. 496.

And conviction for a felony is a ground for divorce in North Dakota. Rev. Code, ed. 1895, § 2737, p. 611.

So, the Revised Statutes of Ohio make the imprisonment of either party in a penitentiary under sentence thereto a ground for divorce where the petition is filed during the imprisonment. 2 Rev. Stat. ed. 1896, title 1, div. 7, chap. 6, § 5680, p. 1426.

The conviction of felony is also made a ground of divorce under the General Laws of Oregon. 1 Hill's Anno. Laws, ed. 1892, chap. 5, title 7, § 495, p. 452.

And under the laws of Pennsylvania of May 8, 1854 (Pamph. Laws, 644), the sentence of either party for a felony to the county prison for any term exceeding two years or to the penitentiary for a life term entitled the innocent party to a divorce.

And now by the act of June 1, 1891 (Pamph. Laws, 142), the conviction of forgery or other infamous crime either theretofore or thereafter, within or without the state, and sentence to any term exceeding two years, provided that if convicted out of the state the crime be one punishable within the state by imprisonment for two years or more, is a ground for divorce.

The Public Statutes of Rhode Island provide for divorce in case either party be deemed or treated to be civilly dead by reason of the commission of a crime. Pub. Stat. 1882, title 20, chap. 167, § 1, p. 423.

Messrs. W. H. Mylrea and L. K. Luse, for the State:

The reversal of the sentence of imprisonment of French for life related back to the time of sentence.

Crouch v. Crouch, 30 Wis. 667; R—— v. R——, 20 Wis. 332; Everett v. Everett, 60 Wis. 200.

Pinney, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The exceptions present questions of some difficulty and of great importance, namely: (1) In respect to the validity and effect of § 2355, Rev. Stat. which provides that "when either party shall be sentenced to imprisonment for life, the marriage shall be thereby absolutely dissolved, without any judgment of divorce or other legal process, and no pardon granted to the party so sentenced shall restore such party to his or her conjugal rights." (2) Whether the marriage of the defendant with the former wife of French, which took place after his conviction and sentence to imprisonment for life, and while he was imprisoned under it, but before the reversal of the sentence, was rendered void by such reversal, and French was thereby restored to his former conjugal rights. The statute in question has been in force ever since the Revision of 1849, and has not hitherto been the subject of consideration in this court. Such or similar statutes exist in Michigan and Maryland, and perhaps in other states.

the laws of that state renders the party infamous, and also upon the conviction of any crime which by the laws of that state is declared a felony, whereof the offender has been sentenced to confinement in the penitentiary. Code, ed. 1884, § 3306, p. 611.

The Revised Statutes of Texas make provision for a divorce in favor of either one of the parties when the other has been convicted subsequent to marriage of a felony and imprisoned in the state prison, but provide that no such divorce shall be sustained on account of such conviction for felony until twelve months after final judgment of conviction, nor even then where the governor has pardoned the convict, provided the husband has not been convicted on the testimony of the wife, nor the wife on the testimony of the husband. 1 Sayles, Civ. Stat. chap. 4, art. 2861, p. 895.

So, the laws of Utah make provision for divorce upon the conviction of felony subsequent to marriage. Comp. Laws, ed. 1876, § 2, p. 375.

And the Revised Statutes of Vermont also contain provisions for divorce when either party has been sentenced to confinement at hard labor in the state prison for life or for three years or more, and is actually confined at the time, and no pardon restores the rights. Rev. Laws, ed. 1880, title, 16, chap. 123, § 2362, p. 477.

The Code of Virginia contains the provision for divorce when either of the parties is confined in the penitentiary (and a pardon does not affect the rights of the innocent party); and also where, previous to marriage, either the husband or the wife without the knowledge of the other has been convicted of an infamous crime; and also in cases where the party charged with an offense punishable with death or confinement in a penitentiary has been indicted and is a fugitive from justice absent for two years. Code, ed. 1887, p. 561, § 2267.

And under the Code of Washington imprisonment in the penitentiary entitles the innocent party to a divorce provided the petition is filed during the term of imprisonment. 2 Hill's Stat. & Codes, chap. 17, § 764, p. 363.

So, under the Code of West Virginia the sentence to confinement in the penitentiary and the conviction of an infamous offense prior to marriage, where such offense has been committed without the knowledge of the other party, is made a ground for divorce, and a pardon has no effect. Code, ed. 1891, chap. 64, § 5, p. 612.

tence of imprisonment for life a ground for the absolute dissolution of the marriage, without any judgment or decree, and declare a pardon of no effect to restore the conjugal relation, and also provide for divorce in case of sentence of imprisonment for three years or more, with a like result as to pardon. 1 Sanborn & Berryman, Anno. Stat. §§ 2355, 2356, p. 1365.

So, under the laws of Wyoming, sentence to imprisonment for felony in any prison is made a ground for divorce, and a pardon has no effect. Rev. Stat. ed. 1887, chap. 3, p. 419, § 571.

The Revised Statutes of New York (Birdseye's ed. vol. 2, p. 1416, § 5), provide that "a person sentenced to imprisonment for life is thereafter deemed civilly dead," and the same provision is found in § 708 of the Penal Code of that state.

And with respect to outlawry, it is provided in the same statutes (Birdseye's ed. § 6, p. 2142), that the defendant is thereupon deemed civilly dead, and forfeits to the people of this state during his lifetime, and no longer, all freehold estate in real property of which he was seised in his own right at the time of committing the treason, or at any time thereafter, and all his personal property; and the same provision is found in § 819 of the Code of Civil Procedure of that state.

In Re Deming, 10 Johns. 232, it was stated that the effect of a pardon was to acquit the offender of all the penalties annexed to the conviction, and to give him a new credit and capacity, the limitation of the operation on his antecedent rights being such that he could not divest any person of any right or interest which the law had permitted to be acquired and vested in consequence of the judgment, and therefore such pardon could not annul or affect the validity of a second marriage of the wife.

Although there is no direct statutory enactment in that state making the conviction and imprisonment for a crime a direct ground for divorce and annulment of the marriage, yet it would seem from the above case that such imprisonment would have the effect of annulling the marriage, although the proceedings in that case did not directly involve the question of the legality of the second marriage of the wife, the action being brought by the husband, after he was pardoned, to restore him to the rights and duties appertaining to his position as parent.

In Johnson v. Johnson, Walk. Ch. (Mich.) 300, 312, it was held that sentence to hard labor in any

Prior to the adoption of the state Constitution, the district courts of the territory had jurisdiction to grant divorces, on bills filed for that purpose, for specified causes (Territorial Stat. 1839, p. 140), and the territorial legislature exercised at the same time a power of granting divorces by special acts, twenty-four of which were granted at the last session of the territorial legislature. By § 24, art. 4, of the Constitution, it is provided that "the legislature shall never authorize any lottery, or grant any divorce;" and ever since the adoption of the Constitution the courts have had power to grant divorces from the bonds of matrimony for specified causes, and, among others: "When either party subsequent to the marriage has been sentenced to imprisonment for three years or more; and no pardon granted after divorce for that cause shall restore the party sentenced to his or her conjugal rights." Similar statutes to the last have existed from an early period in other states. The contention on the part of the state is that § 2355, Rev. Stat. is void, in that, in effect, in the case specified it grants a divorce, and that, if valid and operative, the subsequent reversal of the sentence of French avoided the marriage of his wife with the defendant, which had taken place in the meantime, and restored French to his former conjugal rights, and rendered the subsequent cohabitation of the defendant with Lucy M. French criminal.

The relation of two married persons to each other is not a mere personal relation, or a mere contract between them, though it comes into existence in pursuance of a contract; but it is a status or legal condition established by law, involving, not only the wellbeing of the parties, but also the highest interests of society and the state, and having more to do with the morals and civilization of a people than any other institution. It has always been subject to the control of the legislature; and it has always been competent for the legislature, in the absence of constitutional restriction, to put an end to the relation in the interest of the parties as well as of the state. Subject to this qualification, and saving the rights of property already vested in either party, the state that created the relation can change or abrogate it; and, as it is not a prison, jail or house of correction for three or more years was a good ground for divorce under the Michigan statute, and that upon the dissolution of a marriage by reason of such sentence, the wife was entitled to the possession of the property as though her husband were dead.

Where, in proceedings for divorce upon the ground of the husband's confinement in the penitentiary for horse stealing, the facts were proved, and in the record of conviction his name was stated differently, but in the divorce proceedings witnesses proved that he was one and the same man, the decree was awarded. Utsler v. Utsler, Wright (Ohio) 827.

In Foy v. Foy, 13 Ired. L. 96, it is stated that if a husband is accused of a crime, or if he is guilty of it, it is not sufficient cause for his wife to refuse to live with him, and she is not thereby justified in a violation of her marriage vow, as she agreed to take him for better or for worse.

The conviction of an assault with intent to commit a rape, will not authorize a divorce under the Pennsylvania act of June 1, 1890, making a conviction of an infamous crime a cause for a divorce. Wheeler v. Wheeler, 2 Pa. Dist. R. 567, 10 Lanc. L. Rev. 267.

And where, after the husband had been convicted and sentenced for the crime of adultery, the wife cohabited with him in prison with knowledge of the offense, it was held she was not entitled to a divorce. Delliber v. Delliber, 9 Conn. 233.

In Lucas v. Lucas, 2 Tex. 112, it was held that the word "outrage" as used in § 31 of the Texas statute of 1841, relating to divorce and alimony, could not be construed so as to include cases of alleged commission of theft or other crime which related solely to outrages to the person.

So, in Wright v. Wright, 6 Tex. 3, it was held that even the commission of a felony or other capital crime was not a cause for divorce under the Texas statute in the absence of some other finding of facts, such as murder of a child of the marriage, such murder being an outrage upon the feelings of the parent.

The fact that the husband had been convicted and sentenced for forgery was held not to be sufficient ground for divorce under the Texas statute, which granted divorce upon the grounds of adultery, intentional abandonment of three years, and such cases of cruel treatment or outrages of one towards the other as would render their living together insufferable, the court stating that the fact that he had committed forgery could not of itself raise the most remote presumption that he would inflict violence on the wife or do her bodily harm. Sharman v. Sharman, 18 Tex. 521.

II. Necessity of a conviction.

Before either of the parties can claim a dissolution of the marriage upon the ground of the commission of a felony, it must be shown that the party charged has been actually convicted. See the statutes of the several states, supra.

In Thomas v. Thomas, 51 Ill. 162, it was held that the commission of a larceny without conviction was no ground for a divorce under the Illinois statute.

So, in Vinsant v. Vinsant, 49 Iowa, 630, in order to secure a divorce upon the ground of a conviction of felony under § 2223 of the Iowa Code, it must be shown that such conviction is final and absolute, and it must further be shown that no appeal is pending or has been prosecuted.

In that case the court stated that the statute did not refer to a conviction from which an appeal had been prosecuted, and which was liable to reversal, but to a conviction which was final and absolute, either because of affirmance in the appellate court or because no appeal had been prosecuted.

And in Handy v. Handy, 124 Mass. 394, it was held that as soon as the husband had been convicted and sentenced the right of the wife to apply for an absolute divorce was complete.

And see Foy v. Foy, 13 Ired. L. 96, supra, 1.

III. Effect of an appeal from conviction.

It has been held that if a conviction is appealed from it cannot be regarded as a ground for divorce pending the appeal. Vinsant v. Vinsant, 49 Iowa, 630; Rivers v. Rivers, 60 Iowa, 378, 65 Iowa, 568.

Where a divorce was sought upon the ground of a felony committed by the defendant, and such divorce was refused upon the ground that an appeal had been taken from the conviction, it was held that such action was no bar to a subsequent action for divorce under the Iowa statute, upon the same ground, where the conviction was affirmed upon appeal, inasmuch as the ground for a divorce had no existence at the time of the institution of the first proceedings, as there was then no conviction which was a cause of divorce. Rivers v. Rivers, supra.

contract or a vested right, the law putting an end to the relation, and extinguishing the status of the parties as husband and wife, does not fall within the prohibition against the impairment of the obligation of contracts or the divesting of vested rights. The power of the state, within these limitations, over the civil status of its own citizens, is supreme and absolute, and the legislative will is a sufficient reason for its action. Cookey, Const. Lim. 111. 112; 1 Bishop, Mar. & Div. §§ 11-15, 1426 et seq. 1492; Cook v. Cook, 56 Wis. 207, 43 Am. Rep. 706; Shafer v. Bushnell, 24 Wis. 373; Maynard v. Hill, 125 U. S. 205, 31 L. ed. 657; Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 734, 24 L. ed. 573; Cronise v. Cronise, 54 Pa. 255, 261; Maguire v. Maguire, 7 Dana, 181, 183; Star v. Pease, 8 Conn. 541; Ditson v. Ditson, 4 R. I. 87; Noel v. Eving, 9 Ind. 37. In Niboyet v. Niboyet, L. R. 4 Prob. Div. 11, Brett, L. J., said that "marriage is the fulfilment of a contract satisfied by the solemnization of the marriage; but marriage, directly it exists, creates by law a relation between the parties and what is called a status of each. The status of an individual, used as a legal term, means the legal position of the individual in or with regard to the rest of a community. That relation between the parties, and that status of each of them with regard to the community which are constituted upon marriage are not imposed or defined by contract or agreement, but by law." In Maynard v. Hill, supra, the same conclusion was reached, and it was there held that marriage is an institution of society, regulated and controlled by public authority, and that legislation affecting it and annulling the relation between the parties is not within the prohibition of constitutional provisions against the impairment of contracts by state legislation; and the validity of legislation, whether general or special, dissolving the relation on particular grounds, is within the competency of legislative authority, unless restrained by constitutional provisions. The opinion of the court in this case by Mr. Justice Field, is an elaborate and learned exposition of the law on the subject under consideration. The power of the legislature over the subject of marriage as a civil status is unlimited and supreme, subject only to the re-

But where the libel alleged and proved that the defendant was actually imprisoned in the state prison under a sentence for more than a year, it was held that the defendant's actual imprisonment under such judgment was a cause for divorce even though a bill of exceptions for the reversal of the judgment was pending, for the reason that the statute (N. H. Gen. Stat. chap. 163, § 3) did not recognize the reversible character of such judgments as a means for suspending their operation in divorce proceedings. Cone v. Cone, 58 N. H. 152.

See also, as supporting the same doctrine, the main case of STATE v. DUKET.

IV. Effect of commutation of the sentence or of a pardon.

With respect to the effect of a pardon, the statutes of most of the states make express provision that a pardon does not revive the marriage relation or restore conjugal rights, and such provisions will be found in the statutes of Arizona, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Mississippi, Nebraska, Vermont, Virginia, West Virginia, Wisconsin, and Wyoming. See supra, 1.

But in Young v. Young, 61 Tex. 191, under the Texas statute authorizing the granting of divorces in favor of either the husband or wife when the other had been convicted, after marriage, of a felony, and imprisoned in the state prison, provided that no suit for divorce should be sustained because of the conviction of either party of felony until twelve months after final judgment by conviction, nor then if the governor shall have pardoned the convict, and also provided that the husband had not been convicted on the testimony of the wife nor the wife on the testimony of the husband, it was held that the effect of the commutation of the punishment was not equivalent to a pardon of the party convicted, and therefore did not relieve such party from the consequences attached to the conviction.

See also Re Deming, 10 Johns. 232, supra, 1.

V. Conviction in another state.

In some few states the statutes make an express provision and declare that the conviction and sentence in another state or country is sufficient to found the divorce, such is the case in Delaware, Indiana, Kentucky, Michigan, Minnesota, Nebraska, Pennsylvania, and Wyoming. See supra, 1.

relating to divorce (Pub. Stat. chap. 146, § 2), do not apply to a case where the defendant has been committed and sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison of another state. Leonard v. Leonard, 151 Mass. 151, 6 L. R. A. 632.

The term "the state prison," when used without further description, in the Revised Statutes, as well as in the more recent legislation of the state of Massachusetts, has been held to mean the state prison of that commonwealth. Beard v. Boston, 151 Mass. 96.

So, it is no ground for a divorce under the New Hampshire statute, upon the ground of conviction of crime and actual imprisonment in the state prison, where the conviction and imprisonment are not within the jurisdiction of the court. Martin v. Martin, 47 N. H. 52.

And under the New Hampshire statutes it has been held that the term "the state prison" is limited so as to exclude the state prison of another state. Ibid.

In Kluttz v. Kluttz, 5 Sneed, 423, it was held that the Tennessee statute of 1842, chap. 133, § 3, did not apply to causes of conviction and sentence to a penitentiary out of the state, the express language of the statute being "that if any person, being husband or wife, has been, or shall be, convicted of any crime, which by the laws of this state is declared to be a felony, and sentenced to confinement in the penitentiary," the same shall be a good cause for a divorce from the bonds of matrimony.

In the above case the crime committed was felony by the laws of Tennessee as well as by the laws of Kentucky, where the conviction was had, and was punishable in both states by confinement in the penitentiary, and the court stated that although reason and policy would require the enlargement of the language of the act so as to extend to cases of conviction of felony in another state or country, yet the extension must be done by the legislature, and not by the courts.

Under the Pennsylvania act of June 1, 1891 (Pamph. Laws 142) supra, 1, it has been held that the fact that a husband was indicted, sentenced, and imprisoned for forgery in Kansas under two indictments for a period of one year on each indictment from the day of his reception by the warden of the penitentiary was no ground of divorce even though the concurrent sentence was cumulative, as it did not exceed two years. Frantz v. Frantz, 11 Pa. Co. Ct. 467, 1 Pa. Dist. R. 241.

striction in the Constitution that the legislature shall never "grant any divorce." This statute does not grant a divorce to any one, either absolutely or conditionally. It provides that "when either party shall be sentenced to imprisonment for life, the marriage shall be thereby absolutely dissolved without any judgment of divorce or other legal process;" that is to say, the termination of the matrimonial status is unconditional, for the reason that the party against whom it has been pronounced is no longer capable of performing the duties, public and domestic, of the matrimonial relation. The dissolution of the marriage is consequent upon the sentence, and results from the operation of a general law, acting uniformly, and affecting alike all persons under the conditions specified in the statute, and not by special grant, or in a particular instance. The legislature had the power to enact general laws prescribing the result of such a sentence upon the civil status of the defendant, as well as the matrimonial status of any one to whom he might be united in marriage. By the common law certain consequences resulted from judgment given in capital cases, namely, attainder, "by which the defendant was no longer of any credit or reputation. He cannot be a witness in any court, neither is he capable of performing the functions of another man; for, by an anticipation of his punishment, he is already dead in law." And the consequences of attainder were forfeiture and corruption of blood, which worked forfeiture of his real and personal estates. 4 Bl. Com. 380, 381. There is no such thing as civil death in this country, and no conviction in this state can work corruption of blood or forfeiture of estate. Const. art. 1, § 12. Yet by general laws in this as well as other states, it has been provided that certain consequences shall result from conviction or sentence for crime. We are not aware that the power to enact such laws has ever been judicially questioned. Certainly we see no ground for doubting the validity of such acts so long as they relate only to subjects within the undoubted scope of legislative power. Constitutional disqualification to exercise the right of suffrage exists, as that no "person convicted of treason or felony shall be qualified to vote at any election unless restored to civil rights." Wis. Const. art. 3, § 2. This is a law, merely, in its operation, but is embodied in the Constitution to give it a sanction and permanency not incident to ordinary legislation, to secure the purity of the ballot box. And it is provided that laws may be passed excluding from the right of suffrage all persons who have been or may be convicted of any infamous crime, and depriving every person who shall make or become directly or indirectly interested in any bet or wager dependent upon the result of any election of the right to vote at such election. Const. art. 3, § 6; Rev. Stat. § 12, subd. 4. By § 4935 it is provided that, when any person sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison is holding at the time any office under the Constitution and laws of the state, such office shall be deemed vacated from the time of his commitment to prison, but, if the judgment is reversed, he shall be restored to his office, with its rights, etc., but not by reason of being pardoned. The intent of the constitutional provision that the legislature shall not "grant any divorce" was not to restrict the legislature in the enactment of appropriate general laws, but the mischief sought to be suppressed was the granting of divorces by the

And it has also been held under the same statute that even though the crime be punishable in the state of Pennsylvania by a sentence for two years or more, yet it was no ground of divorce where the sentence in the other state was only for two years or less. Ibid.

VI. Retroactive effect of statute.

In Greenlaw v. Greenlaw, 12 N. H. 200, it was held that the New Hampshire statute did not apply to a case where the conviction and imprisonment existed before the passage of the act, the court stating that a construction of the statute which would convert existent matter into a cause of divorce, when its origin furnished no grounds for a dissolution of the marriage, and its continuance was without the volition of the party, was, in effect, to give the statute a retrospective operation, which was not its true construction.

But it would seem that the Pennsylvania act of 1861, supra, I, relates to both past and future convictions.

VII. Allegation of infamous crime.

In Polson v. Polson, 140 Ind. 310, the complaint alleged that the defendant "was convicted of the crime of rape upon a little girl, the daughter of the plaintiff" and it was contended upon behalf of the defendant that such allegation was insufficient upon the ground that it did not charge that the crime was infamous, but the court held that the infamy was sufficiently apparent, and would support a decree in divorce under § 1044 of the Revised Statutes of Indiana of 1894, being § 1032 of the Revised Statutes of 1881.

VIII. Where crime is prior to marriage.

Express provision is made in some of the state statutes upon the question; thus, in Delaware, Pennsylvania, and West Virginia a divorce will be granted whether the crime was before or after marriage. See the state statutes, supra, I.

Where at the time of a marriage the libelant knew or had good reason to believe that the libelee would be sentenced to imprisonment for life in the state prison upon a prior conviction of murder, it was held that the subsequent affirmance of such conviction raised no ground for divorce under the Vermont statutes. Caswell v. Caswell, 84 Vt. 557.

IX. Conviction as desertion.

It has been held that if the husband's desertion is not voluntary, but due to imprisonment or coercion, it is no ground for a divorce upon the ground of desertion. Frantz v. Frantz, 11 Pa. Co. Ct. 467, 1 Pa. Dist. R. 241.

So, the imprisonment of a husband does not amount to an obstinate and wilful remaining away from her within the meaning of the New Jersey statutes, for the reason that the husband was not able to return. Wolf v. Wolf, 38 N. J. Eq. 128.

In Wolf v. Wolf, supra, a divorce was refused where the husband had abused his wife and forced her to return to her parent's home where he followed her and shot at her, for which offense he was subsequently tried and convicted and sentenced to imprisonment and was released after divorce proceedings were instituted, the court holding that his absence since the date of his brutal treatment of the wife did not amount to wilful continuance and obstinate desertion within the meaning of the New Jersey statutes.

legislature in special instances, by special laws,—in view of the ease and facility with which such divorces might be procured, a power likely to be capriciously, improvidently, and sometimes unjustly exercised. By the Constitution of the state of Michigan, in 1836, it was provided that “divorces shall not be granted by the legislature, but the legislature may by law authorize the higher courts to grant them under such restrictions as they may deem expedient;” and under this provision an act was passed authorizing the circuit court in St. Joseph county to grant a divorce between parties named therein, under the general provisions of the statute, provided it should be made to appear satisfactorily that the wife had been for the term of five years preceding the time of filing the petitioner’s bill, and still continued to be, hopelessly and incurably insane; but before any decree was rendered the Constitution was amended, declaring that “divorces shall not be granted by the legislature,” and subsequently the divorce was granted pursuant to the act. It was held that the divorce, in effect, was a legislative one, though granted by the court, but this was upon the ground that the law in this special instance assumed that the power which it vested in the court was the power which the legislature itself was inhibited from exercising, and that it was equivalent to the granting of a divorce in a particular case, and for a particular cause for which no general law of the state authorized one to be granted. Teft v. Teft, 3 Mich. 67.

The constitutional provision that the legislature shall not “grant any divorce” must be construed with reference to and limited by the mischiefs against which it was evidently aimed,—the granting of divorces by special acts in particular cases,—and it was not intended to otherwise limit the power of the legislature, or restrict it in the enactment of just and proper laws affecting all persons alike in their matrimonial status or condition. In considering the provision “with a view to its interpretation, the thing which we are to seek is the thought which it expresses. To ascertain this, the first resort in all cases is to the natural signification of the words employed.” Coolsey, Const. Lim. 1st ed. 57. Says Marshall, Ch. J.: The framers of the Constitution, “and the people who adopted it, must be understood to have employed words in their natural sense, and to have intended what they have said.” Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 188, 6 L. ed. 68. When we examine the very clear and direct provision in question, we look in vain to find any expression or intimation forbidding or restraining the legislature from passing a law such as the one under consideration, general in its terms, operating alike upon all persons falling within its provisions, which does not grant or authorize the granting of any divorce, but which provides a general consequence attendant upon the life sentence of any married person, namely, that his marriage “shall be thereby absolutely dissolved.” It might with as much propriety be said that the statute prescribing the punishment for murder in the first degree was a statute to imprison French during the term of his natural life, as that the statute in question was a legislative divorce granted to him from the bonds of matrimony. If it was not such divorce, it is clearly established by the authorities referred to that the legislature might lawfully enact the statute, as a law affecting in the future the status of all married persons, citizens of the state, who should by life sentence of imprisonment be brought within its provisions.

2. The statute was self-executing. Upon sentence given, the marriage between French 1813 In Townsend v. Townsend, L. R. 3 Prob. & Div. 129, 42 L. J. Mat. 71, 20 L. T. N. S. 254, 21 Week. Rep. 964, a husband who, having committed several thefts, separated from his wife with her knowledge and consent for the purpose of avoiding arrest, was subsequently arrested and imprisoned, and, having committed other thefts after his release, was again imprisoned. While in prison, and also in the intervals between his imprisonments, he kept up a correspondence with his wife and made repeated endeavors to return to cohabitation, which she refused and never resumed. Upon the wife presenting a petition for a dissolution of the marriage on the ground of adultery coupled with desertion, the court held that there was no desertion the separation being involuntary on the part of the husband.

But in Hews v. Hews, 7 Gray, 279, the question was whether a divorce from the bond of matrimony could be granted for desertion for a term of five years consecutively under the Massachusetts statutes of 1838, chap. 126, where, during a part of such period, the guilty party had been several times committed to the house of correction, the first commitment being a few months after the first desertion, there being very short intervals afterwards between the terms of his imprisonment, and the court held that such desertion was wilful and within the provisions of the statute, as it was shown to have commenced before the imprisonment and to have extended during the intervals between the commitments.

spondent left his wife, stating that he was going for a week’s shooting, but in fact went to Australia in order to escape arrest for embezzlement, and there committed adultery. He was subsequently arrested, brought back to his native country, tried and sentenced to ten years’ penal servitude. It was held that the circumstances under which he left his wife constituted desertion which continued notwithstanding the fact that he was brought back to the country in custody and was prevented by his imprisonment from returning to his wife.

X. Classed with cruelty.

Where a husband commits a felony and is convicted and imprisoned, it revives the right to sue for a divorce a vinculo matrimonii, although condonation may have intervened, such an act of his by disgracing himself and family is a cruelty towards the wife and the reverse of conjugal kindness. Hoffmire v. Hoffmire, 3 Edw. Ch. 173.

XI. Conviction as a bar to divorce by the party convicted.

Where a husband has been convicted and sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor in the state prison for five years or more, which constitutes a ground of divorce under the Massachusetts statutes, chap. 107, § 6, he cannot sustain a petition for divorce against his wife on the ground of her subsequent adultery, since his conviction is classed with adultery and other causes which are grounds for a divorce from the bonds of matrimony, as an offense of the same class and degree as adultery. Handy v. Handy, 124 Mass. 304. E. W.

and his wife was "absolutely dissolved." Nothing whatever remained to be done to make the dissolution operative; neither judgment of divorce nor other legal process. It was not a dissolution of the marriage, nisi, dependent upon condition subsequent, express or implied, but was without restriction or condition. It did not suspend the conjugal relation, but extinguished it; and the language of the statute expressly excludes any implication that the reversal of the sentence might operate to restore the sentenced party to his or her conjugal rights, whatever might otherwise be the operation and effect of a reversal by the common law. The statute goes upon the ground that social and public necessities of the marriage relation, and the competency of parties to contract it, require the dissolution to be final, absolute. The statute having executed itself in the present case, French and his wife became in law as utter strangers to each other. The new status of each was the result of the statute, and was not dependent for continuance upon the continued existence of the sentence of French, as in the case of a judicial divorce. The reversal of the sentence cannot operate to restore the parties to their former matrimonial relations, as in the case of reversal of a valid judgment of divorce for mere error in its rendition. In states where sentence to imprisonment in the state prison for a term of years is made ground for an action of divorce, it has been held that as soon as the sentence has been given the right of the other party to apply for a divorce is complete (Handy v. Handy, 124 Mass. 394), and that such right is not suspended by a bill of exceptions, on which the conviction and sentence may be reversed (Cone v. Cone, 58 N. H. 152). The statute declares that "no pardon granted to the party so sentenced shall restore such party to his or her conjugal rights." A pardon reaches both the punishment prescribed for the offense and the guilt of the offender; and, when the pardon is full, it releases the punishment, and blots out of existence the guilty so that in the eye of the law the offender is as innocent as if he had never committed the offense. . . . If granted after conviction, it removes the penalties and disabilities, and restores him to all his civil rights; it makes him, as it were, a new man, and gives him a new credit and capacity. . . . But it does not restore offices forfeited, or property or interests vested in others in consequence of the conviction and judgment." Ex parte Garland, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 333, 380, 18 L. ed. 866, 370. As a pardon granted could not restore French to his conjugal rights, manifestly it was not intended that the reversal of his sentence should have that effect. Evidently the dissolution of the marriage freed both French and his wife from its obligations, and she was free to marry the defendant, and her subsequent marriage with him would not be in any way affected or invalidated by such reversal. It is understood that they were both citizens of this state at the time of the sentence, and subject, as to their matrimonial status, to its laws. Says Mr. Bishop: "Taking one party out of the marriage, by whatever means, leaves the other single. A husband without a wife, or a wife without a husband, is unknown to the law." 2 Bishop, Mar. Div. & Sep. §§ 1613, 1615. It was error for the court to instruct the jury that this court had held the sentence of French to be illegal or invalid. On the contrary, this court held that the court pronouncing sentence had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the information against French, and of his person, and it denied his application to be discharged from imprisonment under the sentence, holding that the sentence was valid, and could be avoided only on writ of error. Re French, 81 Wis. 597. And the sentence was reversed for error and not for want of jurisdiction. French v. State, 85 Wis. 400, 21 L. R. A. 402. Until it was so reversed, it was a valid and operative sentence. The cases relied on to show that the reversal of the sentence restoring French to his former conjugal rights were all cases where the validity of the second marriage depended upon the validity of a former decree of divorce, and, with a single exception, the decree relied on was a nullity for want of jurisdiction in the court granting it, or was void by reason of gross fraud practiced on the court or opposite party by the one claiming its protection. The case of Crouch v. Crouch, 30 Wis. 667, was such a case. We hold, therefore, (1) that § 2355 of the Revised Statutes is a valid enactment, and not one in conflict with § 24, art. 4, of the Constitution, and operated to absolutely dissolve the marriage relation between French and his wife upon his being sentenced to imprisonment for life; and (2) that the marriage thereafter of the defendant with the former wife of French was valid, and was not avoided by the subsequent reversal of the sentence against French.

The defendant's exceptions are therefore sustained, and his conviction is set aside, and the cause is remanded to the circuit court for a new trial.

Judgment is ordered accordingly.

ness of itinerant merchants to be carried on without a license is not invalid as a regulation of interstate commerce as applied to one who purchases bankrupt stocks wherever he can, obtaining them to the best advantage, and sometimes buys them in other states, when it makes no discrimination between merchants whose goods are imported into the state and those whose goods are manufactured or purchased in the state, and does not impose any burden on sales in original packages brought into the state.

3. An ordinance requiring itinerant merchants to pay a license fee is not limited to peddlers but applies to a merchant who takes his stock of goods from city to city doing business for a few weeks only in each place.

4. A license fee of $10 for each day's business carried on by an itinerant merchant, without any discrimination on account of the extent of business or the length of time it may be carried on, is invalid because unnecessarily burdensome and in general restraint of trade and prohibitory of the business.

Trining v. Elgin, 38 Ill. App. 361.

A license fee imposed upon persons engaged in a given business, as that of a broker or itinerant merchant, is not in violation of any constitutional provision when such fees are uniform as to all persons of the same class within the limits of a city.

An ordinance passed under general power must be: (1) reasonable, consonant with the general powers and purposes of a corporation,

A peddler is an itinerant merchant. The term "itinerant merchant" cannot be applied to a merchant who rents a storeroom in a city, places therein a stock of goods of large value, and conducts his business within the building so rented by him, whether he comes to the city to carry on business for a week, or for three weeks, or for a year.

Any attempt under the general law to discriminate as between peddlers, auctioneers, or other persons temporarily residing in a city, and those permanently residing there, or any attempt to discriminate in the matter of licensing and taxing liquor dealers, has been invariably held to be ultra vires and void.

Carter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal is taken from a judgment of the circuit court of Green county rendered against appellant for costs, and in bar of its action on a cause brought to that court by appeal from the judgment of a justice of the peace imposing a fine of $3 and costs on appellee for the violation of an ordinance of the city of Carrollton. The ordinance provided that any person or corporation making sales of goods, wares, merchandise, or other things, except farm or dairy produce, etc., upon the streets or sidewalks of the city, or who should engage in the business of hawker or peddler, or who should temporarily reside therein, and vend at auction any goods, wares, merchandise, or other thing anywhere in the city, or engage in the business of itinerant merchant, without having first obtained a license therefor in accordance with the provisions of the ordinance, should be fined not less than $100. The ordinance authorized the mayor to revoke any license, in his discretion, on tendering back the unearned license money. Section 3 established the following schedules of license fees: "Itinerant merchants at retail or auction, $10 per day. Foot peddlers and soliciting agents $2 per day. . . . All other cases not specifically provided for, $2 per day." Appellee applied for and obtained a license to sell books, notions, watches, etc., for the period of three weeks, for which he paid a license fee of $30. The license provided that it was subject to revocation by the mayor. Soon after commencing business, appellee began to sell many different kinds of goods and wares not embraced within the classes mentioned in the license, both at auction and in due course of trade, at retail. His license was revoked by the mayor, and the license fee tendered back to him, but he refused to accept it. He was notified by the mayor that, for the business he was then engaged in, he would be required to take out a license as itinerant merchant, and pay therefor $10 per day. Appellee refused to procure such license or pay the amount demanded, but continued to sell as before. Complaint was made under the ordinance, charging him with temporarily residing in said city, and vending at auction goods, wares, and merchandise, and for engaging in the business of itinerant merchant in said city, without a license. A fine of $3 and costs was assessed by the justice of the peace. When the ordinance was offered in evidence on the trial in the circuit court, it was objected to by appellee on the ground that, both the ordinance and the statute authorizing it, approved June 10, 1887, providing that cities, etc., "shall have power to license, tax, regulate, suppress, or prohibit itinerant merchants and transient vendors of merchandise" (Rev. Stat. Meyer's ed. 1895, p. 232) were "unconstitutional and void; that they are unreasonable, in restraint of trade, tend to create monopolies, objectionable as class legislation, and discriminate between residents and nonresident auctioneers and merchants, and, as applied to the facts in this case are an attempted interference, by state regulation, with interstate commerce." The objection was sustained by the court, as to the first charge in the complaint, and later in the trial, at the close of the evidence, the court sustained the motion of the defendant to exclude the ordinance altogether from the jury, and to instruct them to find for the defendant. The jury returned their verdict as instructed, and, after overruling appellant's motion for a new trial, judgment was rendered against the city for costs.

It was insisted by the defendant that the evidence showed that he was not a resident of this state, and that he was engaged in the purchase of bankrupt stocks of goods in other states, and shipping them into this state for sale, and that, as applied to the facts of this case, the ordinance was an attempted regulation of interstate commerce, and void for that reason also. The evidence showed that the defendant purchased such stocks of goods wherever he could obtain them to the best advantage, and sold them out at retail,—sometimes at auction and sometimes in due course of trade; that for this purpose he opened stores or places of business in different cities and villages, shipping from one to another, usually continuing in business only a few weeks at a time in any one place. Both the ordinance and the license itself provided for the revocation of the license by the mayor, and we are of the opinion that, under the evidence, there was no abuse of this power by the mayor.

But assuming that the license granted to sell books, notions, and watches was properly revoked because the sales of appellee embraced a large class of merchandise not designated in the license, the question arises whether that part of the ordinance which provides that no person shall temporarily reside in said city, and vend at auction any goods, wares, or merchandise, or engage in the business of itinerant merchant in said city, without first having obtained a license therefor, and fixed the license fee at $10 per day, was within the power of the city council to pass. Waiving the question that the ordinance, as set out, seems to confine the license fee of $10 to those coming within the second class mentioned above,—that is, to itinerant merchants,—we are of the opinion that the city council had no power to make any discrimination between residents and nonresidents of the city, or between those temporarily residing in the city and those permanently residing there, in requiring licenses, or in the fees to be paid for such licenses. This part of the ordinance confines its operation to those who temporarily reside in the city, and would seem to have no reference to the temporary character or to the permanency of the business. Under the provision in question any one permanently residing in the city could engage in the business mentioned, either temporarily or permanently, without a license, while a temporary resident would, in either case, be subject to a fine. The city council had no power to make such a discrimination, and that part of the ordinance was properly held to be invalid. Beach, Pub. Corp. 1235; Braceville v. Doherty, 30 Ill. App. 645. But, as the provision relating to itinerant merchants had no necessary connection with or dependence upon the first-mentioned provision, it may be separately enforced, unless found to be also invalid upon other grounds held sufficient in the court below to invalidate it. The power of the legislature to authorize cities and villages in this state to license and regulate various kinds of business and occupations carried on within their limits, and to require the payment of license fees, has so often been the subject of review, and so often sustained, by this court, that no extended discussion of the general subject will here be attempted. It has been held that such power is inherent in all governments; that, except so far as limited or restrained by the Constitution of the state or of the United States, the legislature has such power, as being the repository of all the power of the people not taken from it. And by repeated decisions of this court it has been held that a mere license fee imposed by the municipal authorities under authority of an act of the legislature is not a tax. Chicago Pkg. & P. Co. v. Chicago, 88 Ill. 221, 30 Am. Rep. 545; Wiggins Ferry Co. v. East St. Louis, 102 Ill. 560, and cases there cited. And since the adoption of the Constitution of 1870, containing the provision in § 1 of art. 9, that "the general assembly shall have power to tax peddlers, auctioneers, brokers, bankers, merchants, commission merchants," . . . in such manner as it shall from time to time direct, by general law uniform as to the class upon which it operates," and §§ 9 and 10 of the same article, requiring uniformity in taxation as to persons and property, the same view has been maintained, and that these provisions of the Constitution have not changed the power of the legislature to authorize municipalities to require and collect such license fees. Wiggins Ferry Co. v. East St. Louis, 102 Ill. 560. In the case cited it was said by Mr. Justice Walker, in delivering the opinion of the court (p. 567) that: "The latter words in the first section, requiring the tax to be by general law, and uniform as to the class upon which it operates, have no operation upon this case, because this, as shown by the cases cited, is not a tax, but a license. The Constitution has not prohibited the general assembly from imposing, or authorizing the imposition of, the duty to procure a license to pursue any calling, nor has it limited the power or limited its exercise. In this respect the power of the legislature is the same as it has ever been since the organization of the state government, and no one, we presume, will question the legislative power to require persons engaged in various avocations to procure a license for the purpose, and thus regulate the exercise of an avocation." While, in numerous other cases in which it was urged that the license fees exacted were taxes, and within the provisions of the Constitution above referred to, the question whether the ordinances conformed to those provisions was discussed, yet the doctrine announced by this court in previous cases has not been departed from. Bowland v. Chicago, 108 Ill. 496; Timm v. Harrison, 109 Ill. 598; Braun v. Chicago, 110 Ill. 186; United States Distilling Co. v. Chicago, 112 Ill. 19; Kinsley v. Chicago, 124 Ill. 359.

The ordinance appears to have been framed upon the same theory as other license ordinances, and not upon the theory of levying taxes in the ordinary acceptation of that term. And if, under the statute in question authorizing cities to "license, tax, regulate, suppress, or prohibit itinerant merchants and transient vendors of merchandise," it should be conceded the city of Carrollton had power to tax itinerant merchants, as distinguished from the power to require them to pay a license fee, we are of the opinion that the ordinance was framed under the former, and not under the latter, power. We shall therefore consider the objections urged against the validity of the ordinance, and of the statute under which it was passed, without reference to the provisions of the Constitution above mentioned, relating to taxation. It is urged with much force that the statute itself is unconstitutional,—that the legislature has no power to suppress itinerant merchants or transient vendors of merchandise, or to prohibit them from following their avocation; and, as applied to the facts of this case, it is insisted that, even regarding the exercise of the power as one to license and regulate, it is in violation of the Federal Constitution, and the legislation of Congress thereunder, as an attempted regulation of interstate commerce, and to the latter phase of the question the arguments of counsel have been chiefly addressed.

We do not think that the latter contention can be sustained. The ordinance makes no discrimination between such merchants whose goods are imported into this state from other states, and those whose goods are manufactured or purchased in this state, and shipped from place to place for the purpose of sale. Nor does it impose any tax upon, or require the payment of any license fee for, the sale in the original package of any articles imported from another state. But the effect of the ordinance is to impose the burden, not on those engaged in importing goods into the state for sale, nor on the goods, as such imports, but upon those who are engaged in the business of selling goods as itinerant merchants, after such goods, if imported, have been so acted upon by the importer as that they have become mixed up with the mass of other property in the state. The evidence in this case showed that the goods were purchased at assignees' and other bankrupt sales; some in this and some in other states; and that the stock in question was composed of such goods, a part of which had been left unsold, and brought from some other city or village in the state, where appellee had last carried on his itinerant merchandising. We think it too clear for extended argument that there was no interference with, or attempted regulation of, commerce between the states in the enforcement of the ordinance in question. This question was discussed and the previous decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States reviewed by Mr. Justice Gray in Emert v. Missouri, 156 U. S. 296, 39 L. ed. 430, 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 68, to which reference may be had for the doctrine of that court on this question.

But was the ordinance void for any of the further reasons urged against it? We do not think it necessary to consider here whether or not the legislature had the power to prohibit, or to authorize municipalities to prohibit, merchants, whether permanent or itinerant, from carrying on the business of merchandising. It must, however, be presumed that it was not intended, by the act of 1887, to authorize cities and villages to suppress itinerant merchants, or prohibit them from carrying on their business, unless there should be, in the character of the goods sold, or in the manner of conducting the business, something detrimental to the public good health, morality, comfort, or convenience. No such grounds for the suppression or prohibition, as a police regulation, of the business of appellee, appeared or was shown. Nor can it be said, we think, as a general proposition, that there was anything in the business in which appellee was engaged that authorized its suppression by law. The Constitution provides that "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law;" and we have recently held that the right to contract with reference to one's own labor is a property right, and cannot be taken away by mere legislative enactment. Ritchie v. People, 155 Ill. 98, 29 L. R. A. 79. The right to buy, sell, barter, and exchange property is a necessary incident to its ownership, and, subject to reasonable regulations, is as much protected by this provision of the Constitution as is the ownership itself. The grounds upon which the sale of intoxicating liquors may be prohibited have no application to the business of the ordinary merchant. In Scheuchow v. Chicago, 68 Ill. 444, it was said that the restraints which the law applies to the liquor traffic "are not like such as restrict the ordinary avocations of life, which advance human happiness, or trade and commerce—that neither produce immorality, suffering, nor want. This business is, on principle, within the police power of the state, and restrictions which may rightfully be imposed upon it might be obnoxious as an illegal restraint of trade when applied to other pursuits." Similar views were expressed in Dennedy v. Chicago, 120 Ill. 627. In Laundry v. Chicago, 111 Ill. 291, 53 Am. Rep. 625, an ordinance requiring licensed pawnbrokers to make out, and deliver to the superintendent of police, every day, a copy from a book to be kept by them of all personal property and other valuable things received on deposit or purchased during the preceding day, with a description of the persons from whom received, was held a reasonable exercise of the police power for the prevention and detection of crime; and it was there said the business might be prohibited altogether, under the power conferred on the city. It was not, however, put upon the ground that the city might absolutely suppress a lawful and harmless business, but that the power might be exercised for the prevention of crime. We must therefore conclude that it was not the intention of the legislature to authorize municipalities to arbitrarily suppress merchants, or prohibit them from carrying on their business, within the corporate limits, on the ground that they are itinerant or transient, instead of permanent, as applied to their business in the municipality.

As applied, then, to the case under consideration, we must consider the ordinance as one to license and regulate itinerant merchants, without authorizing the suppression or prohibition of their business. Appellee contends that he was not an itinerant merchant, within the meaning of the statute and the ordinance. He insists that an itinerant merchant and a peddler mean the same thing. We do not think so. Neither the statute nor the ordinance has furnished any definition. But it cannot be supposed that the legislature would have passed the act in question, authorizing the licensing of itinerant merchants and transient vendors of merchandise, if the power had already been conferred in the provision in the general incorporation law relating to peddlers and hawkers. We think the words used very clearly express the meaning of the law-making power, and that they would generally be well understood. The word "merchant" has a well-known meaning; but whether a particular trader is a merchant, or not, might, under the facts of the particular case, be somewhat difficult to determine. But it cannot be doubted that appellee was a merchant. He opened a store, stocked it with various articles of merchandise, and sold as other merchants do. And the only difference, aside from selling sometimes at auction, was that his business was not permanent in the particular city or village in which, for the time, it was carried on. It was not intended to be permanent,—it was intended to be, and was, transitory. He took his stock of goods from city to city, sold his goods, and transacted business as a merchant, for a few weeks only in each place; and we cannot conceive of a more appropriate designation, as applied to his case, than that of itinerant merchant. Without finding it at all necessary here to undertake to give any precise definition of the term, applicable to other cases that may arise, we hold that appellee was an itinerant merchant. A different conclusion seems to have been reached by the supreme court of Georgia in Gould v. Atlanta, 55 Ga. 678, where it was held that a trader who opened a store, and proceeded there to sell out a large stock of goods, and did not convey any of the goods from place to place in the city, and sell in that way or by sample, but waited for customers to come to his place of business, was not an itinerant trader, within the meaning of the charter of the city and the laws of that state. But in that case the court defined the terms "itinerant trader" and "peddler" to mean substantially the same thing, as they had theretofore been used in the same sense in the statutes and decisions of that state. But the reasoning there employed cannot control here, and, without stopping here to point out further distinctions between the two cases, we must hold that appellee was, within the meaning of our statute, an itinerant merchant. A conclusion similar to the one here arrived at was reached by the appellate court of the second district in the case of Twining v. Elgin, 38 Ill. App. 361.

Holding, then, that the city of Carrollton had the power to license and regulate the business of appellee, but not to suppress or prohibit it, the question is presented whether or not the requirement of the payment of a license fee of $10 per day was unreasonable, oppressive, and prohibitory in its character; for it must be conceded that, if the city had no power to suppress or prohibit directly, it had no power to do so indirectly, by the imposition of unreasonable and oppressive burdens. In Braun v. Chicago, 110 Ill. 196, it was said: "Nor is the objection well taken that no business can be regulated, or burthens imposed on its pursuit, unless there be power to suppress the business. In the case of Wiggins Ferry Co. v. East St. Louis, 102 Ill. 560, it was held the legislature had power to authorize the city to regulate the ferry, and impose a license fee for each boat used by the company, notwithstanding the franchises the companies were exercising were granted by charter from the legislature. Yet no one will claim that the legislature could repeal the charter or impair its franchise, or authorize the city to do so. This case was affirmed in the Federal Supreme Court. 107 U. S. 365, 27 L. ed. 419. Until of comparatively recent date our legislature required all merchants of every kind to pay for and procure a license to vend their goods, wares, and merchandise, under a penalty. Nor are we aware that the power was ever questioned. And similar laws have been in force in the various states of the Union, from their organization until a recent date, if not until the present time. In the case of Horland v. Chicago, 108 Ill. 496, it was held that the legislature had power to authorize the city to require a keeper of a livery stable to procure a license for the purpose, under a penalty for failing to do so. Such an occupation is a natural right, as legitimate as is that of either of these appellants." And in Kinsley v. Chicago, 124 Ill. 363, after stating the rule laid down by other authorities, that the license fee should be such fee only as will legitimately assist in the regulation, it was said that this court has always applied a more liberal rule of construction in reference to license fees, and that such fees, in quite large amounts, and manifestly, in part at least, for revenue, have been sustained. But it has not been held, as supposed by counsel for appellant, that in such cases, where the business may not be prohibited altogether, the amount of the burden to be imposed rests entirely in the discretion of the municipal authorities imposing it. Counsel for appellant cite United States Distilling Co. v. Chicago, 112 Ill. 19, as supporting their contention in this regard. The license fee required by the city of Chicago for carrying on the business of distiller or brewer was $500 per annum, and this court, following other cases, held that while such a license fee was not a tax, in the constitutional sense of that term, still it might be imposed for substantial revenue; and it was said that, "observing constitutional restrictions, the amount would seem to be within the discretion of the body imposing it." The limitation to the discretion of the body imposing the license fee, as expressed in that case, is substantial and important. It is a constitutional limitation. If the constitutional provision that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law forbids the suppression or prohibition of appellant's business on the sole ground that it is transitory, instead of permanent in the municipality, then it also forbids its destruction by the imposition of unequal and excessive license fees, prohibitory in their character. A liberal rule in construing grants of power to municipalities in respect to the imposition of license fees has been adopted by this court, but it has never been held that, where there is no power to suppress or prohibit, they have unlimited discretion in fixing the amount of such fees. In Wiggins v. Chicago, 68 Ill. 373, it was said: "The power conferred by the charter to tax, license, and regulate auctioneers, authorized the city to adopt any reasonable ordinance for the purpose. The charter points out no particular mode. The city may tax, may license, and may regulate the business of auctioneers. The city may not directly prohibit the business, nor can it adopt such unreasonable regulations as would produce such results, or even be oppressive, and highly injurious to the business." And a license fee of $200 per annum imposed by ordinance on auctioneers was held not an unreasonable exercise of the power conferred by the charter. See also Gartide v. East St. Louis, 43 Ill. 47. In the case of Sipe v. Murphy, 49 Ohio St. 536, 17 L. R. A. 184,—somewhat analogous to the case at bar,—it was held that the imposition of a license fee of $25 a day by the city of Columbus, for selling any goods, wares, etc., at auction, imported into such city for the purpose of being so sold, was an unreasonable 31 L. R. A.

exercise of the power conferred by the statute, although the statute purported to give cities the power "to regulate, license, or prohibit" the business, and that the effect of the ordinance was largely to prohibit, under the name of a license, the sale at auction of goods brought into the corporation for that purpose, which entered into the daily use and consumption, and which would not be excluded by any police regulation as being detrimental to the public health, comfort, and convenience, and that the ordinance was in restraint of trade, and opposed to the public policy of the state. See also Brooks v. Mangan, 86 Mich. 576. Under the liberal rule adopted by this court, such license fees, while imposed under the general police power, may, as we have seen, be imposed, not only as a mere means of regulation, but also for revenue. Under such a rule, it becomes a question not always easy of solution to determine whether or not the imposition of a certain amount to be paid as a license fee is an oppressive exercise of a statutory power; having the effect, whether so designed or not, to suppress and prohibit the business upon which it is imposed, rather than merely to license and regulate it, and require it to bear its due share of the public burdens. And it must be admitted that the question, so far as it comes within the discretion of the municipal authorities, is one for them, and not for the courts, to determine. It is only when the ordinance is plainly unreasonable and prohibitive in its character, where there is no power to prohibit, that the courts may interfere and pronounce it invalid. 2 Beach, Pub. Corp. § 1234; Cooley, Const. Lim. 200. We are, however, of the opinion that the ordinance in question is of that character. A license fee of $10 for each day making no discrimination on account of the extent of the business, or the length of time during which it is carried on, would appear to be unnecessarily burdensome, in such a case, in general restraint of trade, and prohibitory of the business. The business of itinerant merchant would have to be much more remunerative than ordinary merchandising in small cities, to survive under a burden of this character, amounting to more than $3,000 per annum. We are therefore of the opinion that the ordinance is void, and that the learned judge of the circuit court did not err in so holding, and in instructing the jury to find the defendant not guilty.

But there was error in rendering judgment against appellant for costs. The city was not liable for costs in such a case. Anderson v. Schubert, 158 Ill. 75. We think this question was correctly decided by the appellate court in the following cases: Nokomis v. Horkey, 31 Ill. App. 107; Petersburg v. Whitnack, 48 Ill. App. 668; Fosselman v. Springfield, 38 Ill. App. 296.

For the error indicated the judgment is reversed.

MINNESOTA LUMBER COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

WHITEBREAST COAL COMPANY.

1. A contract for its "requirements" of coal for a certain season, made by a lumber company, is not void for uncertainty and for want of mutuality, when it is evidently meant to call for the amount of coal which the corporation should need in its business for such season, and not merely what it might choose to require of the other party.
2. A contract for the privilege of ordering any quantity of coal not exceeding 12,000 tons is not an option contract in violation of Crim. Code, § 130, where it is made as a modification of a prior disputed contract, with the intention of limiting the quantity to be ordered, without relieving the purchaser from an obligation under the prior agreement to purchase the amount required in a certain business.

(October 11, 1895.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Court, Second District, affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for De Kalb County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the contract price of coal alleged to have been sold and delivered by plaintiff to defendant. Reversed.

Statement by Magruder, J.:

This is an action of assumpsit brought by appellee against appellant. The declaration consists of the common counts only. The bill of particulars is an account for coal aggregating $19,739.97, at the price per ton named in the contract hereinafter set forth, upon which amount are credited payments and freight credits aggregating $10,485.61, leaving balance, claimed to be due, of $9,254.36. The pleas were the general issue, and the two special pleas of set-off hereinafter set out. Demurrers were filed to the two special pleas and sustained by the circuit court. The defendant elected to stand by its special pleas. A jury was then waived by agreement, and the cause was submitted to the court for trial without a jury. The findings were in favor of the plaintiff, and judgment was rendered in its behalf for said balance of $9,254.36. The appellate court has affirmed the judgment, and the present appeal is prosecuted from such judgment of affirmance.

The second plea, or first special plea, alleges that plaintiff is indebted to defendant for damage because of its neglect and refusal to deliver to defendant coal, according to the contract of plaintiff with defendant, dated August 4, 1886, in words and figures as follows, to wit:

Polo, Ill. Aug. 4, 1886.

Memorandum of contract between the Whitebreast Coal Company, by S. G. Russell, agent, and Minnesota Lumber Company: The said Minnesota Lumber Company agrees to buy its requirements of anthracite coal for season of 1886-1887 (upon condition named hereafter) of said Whitebreast Coal Company which is to furnish the same as ordered (best quality of Scranton coal), at following prices f. o. b. cars at Milwaukee or Chicago, at option of said M. L. Co., to wit: $4.35 per ton for egg and grate, and $4.60 for stove and nut up to November 1, after which time said prices shall be advanced five cents per ton for the remaining term of this contract. Other sizes at proportionate prices. Payments on shipments to be settled on the 15th of each month following shipment, in a sixty day acceptance of said M. L. Co., without interest. In the event of lower prices than the above on standard anthracite coal being offered said M. L. Co., the said Whitebreast Coal Company agrees either to accept such lower prices on balance of coal not shipped or release said M. L. Co. from further liability on this contract. It is further agreed that the prices last herein made shall apply to orders up to January 1, 1887. It is agreed that this contract shall be binding on both parties, provided the said M. L. Co. shall confirm the same by telegraph any time during this or the following day.

Whitebreast Coal Co.,

By S. G. Russell, Sales Agent.

Minnesota Lumber Co.,

By Geo. W. Perkins, Sec'y.

That defendant's requirements of anthracite coal for the season between the dates of August 5, 1886, and January 1, 1887, were 25,000 tons, and that it did confirm said contract by telegraph during the day following the making of said contract; that, in pursuance of said contract, it did order a large quantity of said coal to be shipped in cars from Milwaukee and from Chicago; that plaintiff failed and neglected to fill any of said orders, although defendant avers that it was ready, willing, and able, and offered, at all times, to fulfil its part of the contract, whereby damage accrued to defendant, to wit, said sum of $25,000; that at and before the making of said contract defendant was extensively engaged in the purchase, use, and sale of anthracite coal in the ordinary course of its business, and that its requirements for such coal, in the ordinary course of its business, for the season of 1886 and 1887, were a very large amount, to wit, the amount of 50,000 tons, all of which was well known by plaintiff.

The third plea, or second special plea, alleges that plaintiff is indebted to defendant for damage because of the neglect and refusal of plaintiff to deliver to defendant a large quantity, to wit, 10,000 tons of coal, according to the contract of plaintiff with defendant, which contract, dated August 4, 1886, and the modification thereof dated August 21, 1886, are in words and figures as follows, to wit: (Here follows, verbatim et literatim, the contract of August 4, 1886, as the same is above set out in the second plea). After so setting out the contract of August 4, 1886, the third plea proceeds to give the modification thereof as made on August 21, 1886, in the words and figures following, to wit:

Whereas, a dispute has arisen between the parties to the within instrument, it being claimed by the Whitebreast Coal Company that the said instrument does not constitute a valid engagement upon their part to furnish coal, which claim is denied by the said Minnesota Lumber Company:

Now, therefore, in order to arrive at an amicable settlement of the dispute pending, it is mutually agreed by the said Whitebreast Coal Company and the Minnesota Lumber Company that the said alleged contract shall be performed upon the following conditions and exceptions: Coal shall be billed and paid for at the rate of $4.45 per ton for egg and grate and $4.70 for stove and nut and No. 4. As soon as convenient hereafter, each of the parties hereto shall choose an arbitrator, they to choose a third, which three arbitrators, upon a hearing of the respective claims of each of the parties, shall decide whether the Minnesota Lumber Company is entitled to its coal at the prices named in the within alleged contract of August 4. In case of an affirmative decision of this question, the Whitebreast Coal Company shall rebate to said Minnesota Lumber Company the difference between said contract prices and the amended prices mentioned herein; in case of a negative decision, the said amended prices shall be in final settlement of the coal. It is agreed that the coal shall be settled for in sixty days' paper, as before mentioned, and it shall also be decided by said arbitrators whether the paper shall be with or without interest. It is agreed that this arbitration shall be made under the statute of the state of Illinois. It is agreed that the Whitebreast Coal Company shall pay the Minnesota Lumber Company the difference between the prices fixed by arbitration and the cost price upon all coal ordered by the Minnesota Lumber Company between August 4, 1886, and the date hereof. It is also agreed that the Minnesota Lumber Company shall have the privilege, under this contract, of ordering any quantity of coal not in excess of 12,000 tons, which agreement is in lieu of stipulation for requirements,—this amount of coal ordered between August 4 and date not to exceed 200 tons. It is distinctly understood and agreed that neither party hereto waives any of the respective rights heretofore claimed.

Polo, Ill., August 21, 1886.

Minnesota Lumber Company,

By Geo. W. Perkins, Sec.

Whitebreast Coal Company,

By C. K. Pittman, Gen. Agt.

The plea further averred that the sole and only cause of action in plaintiff's declaration is for the price of coal delivered in part performance of said contract; that the modification dated August 21, 1886, was made and assented to by defendant at the request of plaintiff, and for the purpose of limiting and restricting defendant to the amount of 12,000 tons of coal which it should have, and had, the right to purchase under said contract, as amended, for the season of 1886 and 1887; that plaintiff, after having delivered a small portion of the coal contracted to be delivered by said contract, to wit, 2,000 tons, neglected and refused to ship and deliver to defendant the balance of said 12,000 tons upon the order and request of defendant, although defendant was at all times ready, willing, and able to, and did, keep and perform the terms of said contract on its part; that it did at divers times request plaintiff to deliver the balance of said 12,000 tons according to said contract, which plaintiff neglected and refused to do, whereby damage accrued to defendant, to wit, said sum of $25,000; that at and before the making of said contracts defendant was extensively engaged in the purchase, use, and sale of anthracite coal in the ordinary course of its business, and that its requirements for such coal in the ordinary course of its business for the season of 1886 and 1887 were a very large amount, to wit, the amount of 50,000 tons, all of which was well known by plaintiff at the time of making said contracts.

Both pleas tender set-off of the alleged damages, and pray judgment.

Messrs. John P. Wilson and Carnes & Dunton, for appellant:

The word "requirements" is not uncertain and ambiguous in the light of the knowledge that the parties had at the time of the making of the contract.

National Furniture Co. v. Keystone Mfg. Co. 110 Ill. 427; Smith v. Morse, 20 La. Ann. 220.

When the meaning used in a contract is doubtful or susceptible of two senses, that is to be adopted which would give effect to the intent, as a legal contract, rather than that which would render it inoperative.

If this contract should be construed to give appellant an option as to whether it should order any coal or not, even then it was not a gambling contract, and was not within the prohibition of the statute.

If the court should be of the opinion that the modification brought the contract within the prohibition of our criminal law, then this modification should be rejected entirely, and the rights of the parties should be determined under the Russell contract as plead in the first plea of set-off.

The disability of the plaintiff to recover grows out of the fact that its cause of action arises out of an illegal transaction. The ground upon which courts refuse to enforce rights arising out of an illegal transaction is one of public policy and as affecting the public interest, which policy or principles is not affected by the order of the proof.

Mr. William McNett, for appellee:

The use of the word "requirements," taken in connection with the context, amounts to what the law denominates a patent ambiguity in the contract, and so cannot be helped, either by averment or extrinsic evidence.

Mr. William Barge, also for appellee:

The contract in the second plea is uncertain, and is not aided, in this respect, by any averment in that plea. It is therefore void for uncertainty.

Extrinsic evidence is not admissible to remove a patent ambiguity, and the instrument is inoperative and void.

1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 529.

The agreement in the second plea does not bind appellant to require any coal, and is therefore void for want of mutuality.

Magruder, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The first point discussed by counsel on both sides is whether the trial court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the second plea, which sets up the contract of August 4, 1886. It is insisted by appellee that the demurrer to that plea was properly sustained upon the alleged ground that the contract of August 4 was void for uncertainty and for want of mutuality.

After a careful consideration of the terms of the contract, we do not think that it can be regarded as void for the reasons stated.

It is said by counsel for appellee that the amount or quantity of appellant's "requirements" of anthracite coal for the season of 1886-1887 is not fixed by the contract, and that, for this reason, it is wanting in certainty; and that the contract does not bind appellant to "require" any coal, and for this reason is wanting in mutuality.

Contracts should be construed in the light of the circumstances surrounding the parties, and of the objects which they evidently had in view. The circumstances, which both parties had in view at the time of making the contract may be referred to for the purpose of determining the meaning of doubtful expressions. Courts will seek to discover and give effect to the intention of the parties, so that performance of the contract may be enforced according to the sense in which they mutually understood it at the time it was made; and greater regard is to be had to their clear intent than to any particular words which they may have used to express it. Doyle v. Teas, 5 Ill.

202; Torrence v. Shedd, 156 Ill. 194. The parties representing the companies who entered into the contract of August 4, 1886, were practical business men. The word "requirements," as used by them, evidently meant the amount or quantity of coal which appellant would need in its business for the specified season. Appellant agreed to buy such anthracite coal as it should need in its business for the season of 1886-1887, of appellee at a certain price per ton, and appellee agreed to furnish said amount of coal, free on board the cars at Chicago or Milwaukee, at said price per ton, as it should be ordered by appellant during said season.

The plea avers that defendant was engaged in the purchase, use, and sale of coal in its business, and that its requirements therein for that season were very large, and that such fact was well known to the plaintiff. The parties will be presumed to have contracted with reference to the knowledge which they then had upon that subject, and upon the supposition that appellant would need the same quantity of coal which it had theretofore been in the habit of using. The word, "requirements," evidently has the same meaning as the word, "needs." The amount of coal which was "required" for the business of that season was the amount of coal which was "needed" in the business of that season.

If the word, "requirements," as here used, is so interpreted as to mean that appellee was only to furnish such coal as appellant should require it to furnish, then it might be said that appellant was not bound to require any coal unless it chose, and that therefore there was a want of mutuality in the contract. But the rule is that where the terms of a contract are susceptible of two significations, that will be adopted which gives some operation to the contract, rather than that which renders it inoperative. Thrall v. Newell, 19 Vt. 202, 47 Am. Dec. 682; Evans v. Sanders, 8 Port. (Ala.) 497, 33 Am. Dec. 297. A contract should be construed in such a way as to make the obligations imposed by its terms mutually binding upon the parties, unless such construction is wholly negated by the language used. Torrence v. Shedd, supra. It cannot be said that appellant was not bound by the contract. It had no right to purchase coal elsewhere for use in its business, unless, in case of a decline in the price, appellee should conclude to release it from further liability.

A contract somewhat similar to the one now under consideration came before this court for construction in National Furnace Co. v. Keystone Mfg. Co. 110 Ill. 427. The following language there used is, with appropriate changes, applicable to the present case: "We do not regard the contract void on the ground stated. It is true that appellee was only bound by the contract to accept of appellant the amount of iron it needed for use in its business; but a reasonable construction must be placed upon this part of the contract, in view of the situation of the parties. Appellee was engaged in a large manufacturing business, necessarily using a large quantity of iron in the transaction of its business. It is not to be presumed that appellee would close its business and need no iron, but, on the contrary, the reasonable presumption would be that the business would be continued, and appellee would necessarily need the quantity of iron which it had been in the habit of using during previous years. It cannot be said that appellee was not bound by the contract. It had no right to purchase iron elsewhere for use in its business. If it had done so, appellant might have maintained an action for a breach of the contract. It was bound by the contract to take of appellant, at the price named, its entire supply of iron for the year,—that is, such a quantity of iron, in view of the situation and business of appellee, as was reasonably required and necessary in its manufacturing business. Such contracts are not unusual. A foundry may purchase its supply of coal for the season, of the coal dealer. A hotel may do the same. A city, for the use of the public schools, may engage its supply of coal for the winter, at a specified price. Such contracts are not uncommon, and we have never understood that they were void. Smith v. Morse, 20 La. Ann. 220, is a case in point. In this case Smith agreed to furnish Morse all the ice he might require for the use of his hotel for five years, at a certain price. Smith undertook to avoid the contract on the ground that Morse was not bound, but the court held the contract valid and binding on both parties."

For the reasons stated, we are inclined to think that the demurrer to the second plea should have been overruled.

The second point discussed by counsel is, whether or not the contract of August 4, 1886, as changed by the modification of August 21, 1886, is in violation of § 130 of the Criminal Code of this state. That section provides, that "whoever contracts to have or give to himself or another the option to sell or buy, at a future time, any grain or other commodity, stock of any railroad or other company, or gold, . . . shall be fined, . . . and all contracts made in violation of this section shall be considered gambling contracts, and shall be void." (1 Starr & C. Stat. p. 791.) It is claimed by appellee, that the demurrer to the third plea was properly sustained upon the alleged ground that the modified contract of August 21, 1886, as therein set out, is void as being a contract for an "option" within the meaning of § 130.

The modification of August 21, 1886, contains the following provision, to wit: It is also agreed that the Minnesota Lumber Company shall have the privilege under this contract of ordering any quantity of coal not in excess of 12,000 tons, which agreement is in lieu of stipulation for requirements."

If this provision stood alone, it might be said, with some plausibility, that it was a mere contract for the option to buy coal at a future time, and that, so, it came within the meaning of § 130. But the provision must be construed in connection with the rest of the agreement of August 4, as modified by the amendment of August 21. Language used in a contract should be so construed as to give effect to the instrument as a legal agreement. Thrall v. Newell, supra. The intention of the parties, which courts will seek to discover in giving construction to a contract, is to be gathered, not from particular words and phrases, but from the whole context of the agreement. The supplemental contract of August 21 was entered into for the purpose of settling a dispute which had arisen as to the validity of the contract of August 4. It was not designed to supersede the latter contract, but to modify it. It recites upon its face "that the said alleged contract shall be performed upon the following conditions and exceptions." It made two changes. In the first place, it increased the price of the coal 10 cents per ton over the price named in the old agreement. It provided, that the coal should be billed and paid for at this increased price, leaving it to be determined by arbitration whether appellee should retain the benefit of such advanced price, or should refund the same to appellant. In the second place, it limited the amount of coal which appellant was entitled to order to 12,000 tons. By the original agreement, appellant was entitled to order all the coal which was required or needed in its business for the season named; by the modified contract, appellant was restricted to the privilege of ordering 12,000 tons. It was not the intention here to contract for the mere option or privilege of buying coal at a future time, but simply to limit the quantity to be bought. As, by the original contract, appellant had agreed to buy and appellee had agreed to sell and deliver, as ordered, all the coal which would be needed in the business for the season, so, by the modification, appellant agreed to buy and appellee agreed to sell and deliver, as ordered, an amount of coal not to exceed 12,000 tons. The supplemental contract was not intended to relieve appellant from its obligations under the original contract, but simply to limit its rights thereunder; it was not intended to be an option contract, as it was not optional with defendant whether it should or should not perform the contract of August 4.

In Pearce v. Foote, 113 Ill. 228, we said (p. 284): "The true idea of an option is what are called, in the peculiar language of the dealers, 'puts' and 'calls.' A 'put' is defined to be the 'privilege of delivering or not delivering' the thing sold, and a 'call' is defined to be the 'privilege of calling for or not calling for' the things bought. 'Optional contracts,' in this sense, are usually settled by adjusting market values, as the party having the 'option' may elect. It is simply a mode adopted for speculating in differences in market values of grain or other commodities. It must have been in this sense the term 'option' is used in the statute. Such a contract is obviously fictitious, having none of the elements of good faith, as in a contract where both parties are bound, and is defined by statute as a 'gambling contract.'" It was said in Tenney v. Foote, 4 Ill. App. 594, and approved on appeal in Tenney v. Foote, 95 Ill. 99: "In practice on the stock exchange, it was often the intention of the parties that no stock should be delivered, but the transaction settled upon differences. This became common, and the English statute was aimed at its repression because it was, in effect, gambling. Our statute is directed against the same evil, and extends to transactions in grain and other commodities as well as stocks. So that the word 'option' as used in the statute here, taken with the context, means a mere choice, right, or privilege of selling or buying; and it is the contracting for such choice, right, or privilege of selling or buying, at a future time, any commodity the statute was intended to prohibit, as contradistinguished from an actual sale or purchase, with the intention of delivering and accepting the commodity specified." This extract from Tenney v. Foote, 95 Ill. 99, was quoted with approval in Schneider v. Turner, 180 Ill. 28, 6 L. R. A. 164. In the recent case of Preston v. Smith, 156 Ill. 359, we said (p. 363): "In all the cases where a contract has been held void under the statute, it will be found either the option to deliver the subject of the contract remained in the vendor, or the option to accept the article remained with the purchaser."

If these definitions of an optional contract be applied to the contract of August 4 as amended by the modification of August 21, it will appear that the latter contract does not come within the meaning of § 130 of the Criminal Code. It is the duty of courts to give a reasonable construction to the contracts of parties, and to effectuate their intention if possible. By no reasonable construction can it be said that the modified agreement of August 21 was the contracting for a mere choice, right, or privilege of selling or buying coal at a future time. The parties agree to make actual sales and purchases with the intention of delivering and accepting the coal. As an evidence of this, there occur such expressions as the following: "The said Minnesota Lumber Company agrees to buy . . . of said Whitebreast Coal Company, which is to furnish the same as ordered . . . at following prices." "Payments on shipments to be settled on 15th of each month following shipment in a sixty-day acceptance." "It is agreed that this contract shall be binding upon both parties." "It is mutually agreed . . . that the said alleged contract shall be performed." "Coal shall be billed and paid for at the rate," etc. "It is agreed that the coal shall be settled for in sixty days' paper as before mentioned," etc.

Upon the trial before the court of the issue formed by the filing of the general issue, it appeared from the testimony that appellee shipped to appellant about 400 tons of the coal in September, 1,600 tons in October, 1,100 tons in November and 1,000 tons in December, or about 4,000 tons in all, leaving about 8,000 tons, stipulated for in the contract and ordered by appellant, unshipped.

It follows from the foregoing considerations that the demurrer to the third plea should have been overruled.

A third question is elaborately discussed in the arguments of counsel, and that relates to the right of appellee to recover for the value of the coal delivered, irrespective of the character of the contract upon which it was delivered, as to alleged uncertainty or want of mutuality therein. That is to say, assuming that the modified contract of August 21 was illegal and criminal under said § 130, appellee insists that, under the common counts put in issue by the plea of the general issue, it was only bound to show the orders of appellant for the coal, the shipments of the coal, and the value of the coal so shipped; that it was not necessary for it to prove the contract in order to recover the value of the coal; that as the declaration is not upon the illegal contract, nor to enforce it, but to recover the value of coal sold and delivered, it was sufficient to establish a prima facie case without introducing the contract; and that, having established such prima facie case, its right to recovery was not affected by the introduction of the illegal contract by the appellant, accompanied by proof that the coal was sold and delivered thereunder. Appellee contends, in other words, that the test as to whether a demand connected with an illegal transaction is capable of being enforced by law, is whether the plaintiff requires the aid of the illegal transaction to establish his case. On the other hand, appellant claims that, if the contract is illegal and criminal, the maxim in pari delicto applies, no matter which party is the first to urge it upon the court; and that, whenever it appears that the property, whose value or price is sued for, was delivered under an illegal contract, whether it is so made to appear by the testimony of the plaintiff or the defendant, the plaintiff cannot recover, upon the ground that in such case the court will aid neither party.

If the contract was illegal and criminal, then, under the contention of appellee upon this branch of the case, appellant would be obliged to pay for such of the coal as was actually delivered to it, without being allowed to show, as an offset, any damages suffered by it for the nondelivery of the balance of the coal. Upon the assumption of the illegality of the contract, appellant's contention would leave appellee without payment for the coal which it parted with. The apparent injustice of either contention is obviated by the view already taken of the modified contract. As the contract is herein held to be valid, the plaintiff will be entitled, upon another trial, to recover for the coal delivered, except so far as the defendant may be able to show damages as aforesaid as an offset, either partial or entire, to the amount of coal received by it. Appellant will have the right to offset the damages, if it can prove any; but if it fail in such proof, appellee will recover the value of the coal delivered. In view of the disposition thus made of the special pleas, it is unnecessary to discuss the third question raised by counsel, and we pass no opinion upon it.

The judgments of the Appellate and Circuit Courts are reversed, and the cause is remanded to the circuit court for further proceedings in accordance with the views herein expressed.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

CITY ELECTRIC STREET RAILWAY COMPANY, Appl.,

v.

FIRST NATIONAL EXCHANGE BANK.

(.....Ark.....)

1. The president and secretary of a corporation have no inherent power to execute negotiable notes in its name.
2. A usage to be good and of which the courts will take judicial notice must be general and of such long standing as to have become a part of the law itself.
3. The exercise of the power to make negotiable notes by officers of a corporation does not raise a presumption of their authority to do so, in the absence of a usage or custom from which such authority can be implied.
4. Corporations are not bound by false and simulated entries upon their records unless they have estopped themselves to deny their truth.

(February 8, 1896.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Pulaski County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enforce payment of a negotiable note which had been executed by defendant's president and secretary. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John McClure for appellant.

Wood, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The bank sued the railway company on a negotiable promissory note purporting to have been executed by the company payable to H. G. Allis and George R. Brown and indorsed by them before maturity for value, and delivered to the First National Bank, and by it indorsed and delivered to the plaintiff. The answer, in substance, sets up that the defendant was a corporation, organized under the laws of Arkansas (Sand. & H. Dig. chap. 47); that the note was executed by the president and secretary of the defendant corporation, without any authority from or knowledge of its board of directors; that the charter and by-laws of the corporation gave no such authority; that the president and secretary had the records to show that they were duly authorized to issue the note, but that such record entry was false, and the directors had no knowledge of such entry until long after the maturity of the note; that the directors had never ratified the unauthorized acts of the said officers; that the said secretary and president had never indulged in a course of dealing, between the corporation and third parties, so as to lead strangers to believe that they (the president and secretary) had power to issue negotiable paper in the name of the company, nor had the corporation ever received any consideration for said notes. A demurrer to this answer was sustained, and the defendant refusing to plead further, judgment was rendered against it for the amount of the note, which this appeal seeks to reverse.

The answer presented a good defense unless it can be said (1) that the authority of the president and secretary to issue the note in suit must be presumed from the fact that they have exercised it, or (2) that the corporation is bound by the false record showing that the directors had conferred such authority upon the president and secretary.

1. Unless the authority is expressly conferred by the charter or given by the board of directors, it may be stated, as a general proposition, that the president and secretary of a corporation are not empowered to bind it by their signatures to commercial paper. They have no inherent power to execute negotiable notes in the name of the corporation. Tiedeman, Com. Paper, § 121; Cook, Stock, Stockholders & Corp. Law, § 716; McCullough v. Moss, 5 Denio, 567; 4 Thomp. Corp. § 4619; Life & F. Ins. Co. v. Mechanic F. Ins. Co. 7 Wend. 31; Hyde v. Larkin, 35 Mo. App. 365; Pierce, Railroads, 32-34; *Walworth County Bank v. A. 356, and authorities there cited; National Bank of Commerce v. Atkinson, 55 Fed. Rep. 465. Where the authority of the president and secretary to bind the corporation is challenged, as it has been by the answer in this case, that authority should be shown by the proof, and not be presumed as a matter of law. Mount Sterling & J. Turnp. Road Co. v. Looney, 1 Met. (Ky.) 550; Bacon v. Mississippi Ins. Co. 31 Miss. 116; 4 Thomp. Corp. 4619; Craft v. South Boston R. Co. 150 Mass. 208, 5 L. R. A. 641; First Nat. Bank v. Hogan, 47 Mo. 472; Dabney v. Sterens, 40 How. Pr. 341; 1 Waterman, Corp. 445; Hallowell & A. Bank v. Hamlin, 14 Mass. 180; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. James, 22 Wis. 197; Bliss v. Kaweah Canal & Irrig. Co. 65 Cal. 504. We are aware that there are authorities, contra, and counsel for appellee have cited us to American Ech. Nat. Bank v. Oregon Pottery Co. 55 Fed. Rep. 265, where it is held that, "if the president and secretary sign" a negotiable promissory note, "their authority is inferred from their official relation." This case is analogous, the question being presented (as in the case at bar) on demurrer to an answer which negated the authority of the president and secretary to issue such paper. But the court, to sustain its position in that case, cited only two cases, viz.: Merchants' Nat. Bank v. State Nat. Bank, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 644, 19 L. ed. 1018; and Crowley v. Genesee Min. Co. 55 Cal. 273. In the case in 10 Wall., supra, the court uses this language: "It should have been left to the jury to determine whether, from the evidence as to the powers exercised by the cashier, with the knowledge and acquiescence of the directors, and the usage of other banks in the same city, it might not be fairly inferred that Smith [the cashier] had authority to bind the defendant." True, it is also said that, "if the contract can be valid under any circumstances, an innocent party in such a case has a right to presume their existence, and the corporation is estopped to deny them." But we submit that the broad dicta of the latter quotation, in view of the fact that there was a usage of other banks, and a usual course of dealing, with the knowledge and acquiescence of the directors, shown, were unnecessary for the determination of the question before the court. It was the very language doubtless which caused the learned circuit judge in American Exch. Nat. Bank v. Oregon Pottery Co. supra, to hold, as a matter of law, that the authority of the president and secretary would be presumed from the fact that they had exercised it. So, also, in the California case cited to support the ruling in 55 Fed. Rep. supra, it was admitted that the president, whose authority was being questioned, "was the superintendent and general managing agent, having full control of the business of the corporation." The difference, therefore, between those cases and the one at bar, and the one in which they were cited, is too obvious for further notice. The facts of the case of Gelpcke v. Dubuque, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 175, 17 L. ed. 520 (where the language above quoted from Judge Swayne in 10 Wall. was first used by him), and in Marshall County Supers. v. Schenck, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 772, 18 L. ed. 556; Lexington v. Butler, 81 U. S. 14 Wall. 296, 20 L. ed. 813; Tod v. Kentucky Union Land Co. 57 Fed. Rep. 47-53; and National Bank of the Republic v. Young, 41 N. J. Eq. 531,—also cited by counsel for appellee, where this dictum has been repeated, did not justify such a sweeping declaration of law. For an examination of these will show that, in some of the cases, municipal or county bonds were in controversy, which showed upon their face authority for their issue; and in other cases, that the contracts or transactions made or performed by the agent of the corporation were such as had been frequently or usually made or performed by him before in the course of the business of the corporation; or, that the corporation had received some benefit from the unauthorized act. But the doctrine announced in American Exch. Nat. Bank v. Oregon Pottery Co. 55 Fed. Rep. 265, is unsound, and not supported by the weight of authority. Besides, the principle it seeks to establish is in conflict with the doctrine announced by the Supreme Court of the United States in Western Nat. Bank v. Armstrong, 152 U. S. 346, 38 L. ed. 470, where it was held "that the vice president of a bank, however general his powers, could not exercise such a power unless specially authorized so to do, and . . . that persons dealing with the bank are presumed to know the extent of the general powers of the officers." Mr. Morawetz, in speaking of these dicta in those cases where they have been incautiously used, said: "They must be considered in view to the facts of the particular cases in which they were made. Taken alone, as statements of a principle or rule of law, they are certainly not in accordance with the decisions, and cannot be supported upon any sound principle." 2 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 608. The rule that, "if the president and secretary sign, their authority is inferred from their official relation," provided they might have had power under any circumstances to issue such paper for the corporation, is begging the question where the authority itself is challenged. This rule, too, ignores a fundamental principle of the law of agency, whether applied to natural persons or corporations: for corporations can only act through agents. It is said by Mr. Mechem, in his work on Agency (§ 289), that "every person dealing with an agent is bound to ascertain the nature and extent of his authority. He must not trust to the mere presumption of authority, nor to any mere assumption of authority by the agent." Judge Miller, of the Supreme Court of the United States, in The Floyd Acceptances, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 666, 19 L. ed. 169, said: "The person dealing with the agent, knowing that he acts only by virtue of a delegated power, must, at his peril, see that the paper on which he relies comes within the power under which the agent acts. And this applies to every person who takes the paper afterwards; for," said he, "it is to be kept in mind that the protection which commercial usage throws around negotiable paper cannot be used to establish the authority by which it was originally issued." This language is exceedingly apposite to the case at bar.

It must be presumed that the answer in this case denies in toto the authority of the president and secretary to issue negotiable paper. Hence, this case bears no analogy to that line of cases where the authority exists for some purposes, but is exercised for different purposes than that for which it was conferred. Where the authority to issue negotiable paper exists at all in the president and secretary, then the innocent holder would have the right to assume that it was properly and lawfully issued. Our statute for the incorporation of business corporations expressly confers the management of their business affairs upon "not less than three directors." Sand. & H. Dig. §§ 1330-1335. Another section makes it a felony for the president or secretary of a corporation to "wilfully and designedly sign with intent to issue a promissory note without authority from the charter or by-laws of such corporation." Sand. & H. Dig. § 1604. Surely the legislature would not have made it a felony for these officers to issue negotiable notes if they had such power virtute officii. From the above provisions it appears that the president and secretary of corporations are not general agents. Whatever power they may have to act for the corporation at all in business matters must be delegated and special. We note, en passant, that the statute defines the duty of the secretary to be that of "keeping the books of the corporation." Sand. & H. Dig. § 1332. See Taylor, Corp. § 236; 1

Beach, Priv. Corp. § 202, and authorities cited in note; Life & F. Ins. Co. v. Mechanic F. Ins. Co. 7 Wend. 31. Those cases which hold that the president and secretary, or any other officer, of a corporation will be presumed to have authority where they have exercised it, provided, under any circumstances, it might have been conferred upon them, proceed upon the theory of a usage or custom from which authority will be implied.

But such a theory cannot be maintained as to electric street railways in this state, for the reason that no such usage as to them exists. A usage, to be good, and of which the courts will take judicial notice, must be general, and of such long standing as to have become a part of the law itself. Mussey v. Eagle Bank, 9 Met. 313; Merchants' Nat. Bank v. State Nat. Bank, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 604, 19 L. ed. 1008 (dissenting opinion). The incorporation of electric street railways in the state of Arkansas is of comparatively recent date, and such corporations do not yet exist to any general extent throughout the state. Moreover, it can scarcely be conceived how a usage of the kind mentioned could have sprung up in view of our statutory provisions, and especially that one making it a felony for the president or secretary of a corporation to wilfully and designedly issue promissory notes, without authority from the charter or by-laws. Sand. & H. Dig. § 1604. Manifestly, if the broad dictum of Mr. Justice Swayne in 10 Wall., supra, is the law, then that numerous class of individuals who have invested their means in corporate property would have no protection whatever from the dishonest acts of their agents, whom they have intrusted with office. But the rule as we have declared it, while protecting the shareholders, is just to the innocent holder; for in each case it may be shown by any competent evidence that the corporation is liable, (1) where the board of directors or the by-laws have conferred upon the president and secretary the authority to issue negotiable paper; (2) where the corporation, through its directors, has permitted these officers to habitually do such an act in the course of its business,—in other words, has clothed them with the apparent authority to so act; (3) where the directors have ratified the unauthorized acts of its officers; (4) where the corporation has received the proceeds or any benefit from the transaction. But all of these things were negatived in the answer. Hence, it was sufficient to call for the proofs.

The entries upon the books of the corporation are prima facie evidence against it, as admissions. The records and books of a corporation become conclusive evidence against it when they are the books and records of the corporation, and the entries upon them have been duly made by the recording officer. But corporations are not bound by false and simulated entries upon their records in any case, unless, knowing that they are such, they have neglected to correct them, and some innocent third party, having had proper access to them or knowledge of them, has been misled thereby to his prejudice. But a corporation is not bound to a third party by a false entry upon its records, unless such party, not knowing the entry was false, has acted upon the faith that the entry was the true record of the proceedings. This is the holding of the supreme court of Massachusetts in Holden v. Hoyt, 134 Mass. 181, and authorities there cited.

Reversed, with directions to overrule the demurrer.

To determine the sense in which the word "servants" was used by the legislature the court will consider the object the legislature desired to accomplish by preferring the wages of servants to other debts of a decedent, and the considerations which led them to prefer the claims of such persons. The inferior, humble sphere in which domestic servants move, and their dependence on their masters, entitle them to legal protection and preference.

Beeston v. Collyer, 4 Bing. 309; Waterhouse v. State, 21 Tex. App. 663; Wakefield v. State, 41 Tex. 558.

Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The sole question presented by the record in this case is whether, in the classification of demands against the estate of a deceased person, the wages of a clerk employed by the decedent in his store for a period prior to his last illness are to be included, under the provisions of § 80, chap. 37, of the General Statutes of 1889, in the second class. The first part of the section reads as follows: "All demands against the estate of any deceased person shall be divided into the following classes: (1) Funeral expenses. (2) Expenses of the last sickness, wages of servants, and demands for medicines and medical attendance during the last sickness of the deceased and the expenses of administration." Is a clerk a servant, within the meaning of this language, and, if so, are the wages confined to those accruing during the last illness of the deceased? No direct authority is cited or known to us on the question. The legislature, in more than one enactment has manifested a purpose to secure to all wage earners their hire, and to prefer their claims to those of most other creditors. It is conceded that the term "servant," in its usual acceptation, especially in the law, is broad enough to include a clerk; but it is argued that the word is here used in a restricted sense, and means only menial or household servants. We are loath to recognize any such classification in Kansas as menial servants. The word is broad enough to include a clerk, and we think the legislature intended it should do so. Nor do we think the wages referred to are limited to those earned during the last illness of the deceased. In this particular case the amount of wages conceded to be due is unusually large, but that fact cannot affect the general rule. Though the language used might perhaps be held to restrict the time to the period of the last sickness we think it as capable of the other construction, and that the legislature intended to classify all wages of servants ahead of debts due the state, judgments and demands of the fifth class.

The judgment of the District Court will be modified by classifying the demand allowed the plaintiff in the second class, instead of the fifth.

Judgment will be entered in this court in favor of the plaintiffs in error for costs.

All the Justices concur.

v.

COLLEGE OF PHYSICIANS AND SUR-GEONS OF BALTIMORE CITY et al.

(81 Md. 358.)

1. A coroner may lawfully order a post-mortem examination without the consent of the family of the deceased, where death has followed an injury which seems to him insufficient alone to produce death.

2. A post-mortem examination made by a medical examiner in the exercise of his duty, when required by a coroner, does not render him liable for mutilating the body without consent of the family of the deceased, if the work was done with ordinary decency, without wantonly disfiguring the body.

3. Testimony of a funeral director that he never received a body after post-mortem examination that was in condition for the family to see without being prepared is admissible in an action for unlawfully cutting and mutilating a body by post-mortem examination.

(June 8, 1895.)

NOTE.—The power of a coroner to order a post-mortem examination.

- I. Coroners in general.
- II. Justices of the peace, etc.

The decision in the principal case of YOUNG v. COLLEGE OF PHYSICIANS AND SURGEONS is in keeping with the prior cases.

As to the rights and duties in regard to the burial of the dead, and to control the disposition of a body, see note to Larson v. Chase (Minn.) 14 L. R. A. 85, and also the later case of Hackett v. Hackett (R. I.) 19 L. R. A. 358.

As to the propriety and necessity of a coroner's inquest, see note to Lancaster County v. Holyoke (Neb.) 21 L. R. A. 304.

I. Coroners in general.

A coroner is a public officer charged with the duty of holding inquests, and is clothed with general powers for that purpose, among which is the power to summon physicians to make scientific examinations of the body when the jury shall deem such examination requisite. Pueblo County Comrs. v. Marshall, 11 Colo. 84, 87.

It is not the duty of a coroner to inquire of sudden deaths, unless there is reasonable ground to believe that they are the result of violence or unnatural means, and his authority is to be exercised within the limits of a sound discretion, and when exercised the presumption is that the coroner has acted in good faith on sufficient cause. Clark County v. Calloway, 52 Ark. 361.

And where a death has been caused by violence, it is the coroner's duty to order a post-mortem examination by a competent medical authority. Com. v. Harman, 4 Pa. 209.

In the above case it was stated that there ought to be a post-mortem examination in all cases of death by violence.

By the imposition of the duty cast upon the coroner, 31 L. R. A.

ner, he is authorized to do all things whatsoever reasonably necessary to discharge that duty. St. Francis County v. Cummings, 55 Ark. 419.

The presumption is that the coroner acts in good faith and on sufficient cause, in the exercise of his discretion in the holding of an inquest, and in such discretion he may order a post-mortem examination. Lancaster County v. Mishler, 100 Pa. 624, 627.

He has power to order a post-mortem examination. Pickett v. Erie County, 19 W. N. C. 60; Allegheny County v. Watt, 3 Pa. 462; Com. v. Harman, supra; Northampton County v. Innes, 26 Pa. 156; Allegheny County v. Shaw, 34 Pa. 301.

In Marvin Shaft Inquest, 3 Pa. Co. Ct. 10, the court admitted the power of a coroner to order a post-mortem examination of a body, and held the county liable for the expenses thus incurred.

So, in Gaston v. Marion County Comrs. 3 Ind. 497, it was held that the coroner had power to order such an examination when necessary.

And in Van Hoevenbergh v. Hasbrouck, 45 Barb. 197, it was held that a coroner had a right to employ a physician to attend to inquests.

So, it has been stated that a thorough examination, aided by professional skill, is in general absolutely necessary to the proper administration of justice. Northampton County v. Innes, 26 Pa. 156.

Such an examination is frequently necessary for the detection and punishment of crime. Fears v. Nacogdoches County, 71 Tex. 337; Frio County v. Earnest (Tex.) 16 S. W. 1036.

In taking an inquisition of death, the coroner as the agent of the public has authority to order a post-mortem examination. Allegheny County v. Watt, 3 Pa. 462.

And the power is incident to the coroner's duty. Dearborn County Comrs. v. Bond, 88 Ind. 102; Jay County Comrs. v. Gillum, 92 Ind. 511; Dubois County Comrs. v. Wertz, 112 Ind. 208; Lang v. Perry County Comrs. 121 Ind. 133.

So, in the exercise of his discretion and power in APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful mutilation of the dead body of plaintiff's deceased husband. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Andrew H. Mettee and R. B. Tippet & Bro., for appellant:

In a very recent case, on all fours with this, on the question of recovery for mental anguish, where such right has been violated, the court of appeals unanimously decided that an action would lie.

Larson v. Chase, 47 Minn. 307, 14 L. R. A. 85; Re Beekman Street, 4 Bradf. 503; 3 Chicago Leg. News, 378; 4 Alb. L. J. 56.

Let it once be ascertained that a party is entitled to a right, then any one who hinders or disturbs him in the exercise and enjoyment of it is liable to an action.

Ashby v. White, 2 Ld. Raym. 953.

The invasion of the appellant's right by the fraudulent act of the appellees entitles the appellant to damages.

Store v. Heywood, 7 Allen, 123; Meagher v. Driscoll, 99 Mass. 285, 96 Am. Dec. 759; Elbin v. Wilson, 33 Md. 140.

The coroner and his jury do not constitute a court, and are not clothed with judicial powers, as was the case at common law.

State, Grice, v. Cecil County Comrs. 54 Md. 426; Blaney v. State, 74 Md. 153; United States L. Ins. Co. v. Vocke, 129 Ill. 569; Flour- noy v. Jeffersonville, 17 Ind. 173, 79 Am. Dec. 468; Tillotson v. Cheetham, 2 Johns. 71; Grider v. Tally, 77 Ala. 423, 54 Am. Rep. 65.

The jurisdiction of the coroner in Baltimore city is limited.

City Code, p. 78, § 151; Pub. Gen. Laws, art. 22, §§ 3, 4; Lancaster County v. Holyoke, 37 Neb. 328, 21 L. R. A. 394.

The coroner has nothing to do with investigating the death of any person, unless such person is supposed to have come to his death by unlawful means.

To entitle even a judicial officer of inferior rank to immunity from liability he must have jurisdiction.

Grove v. Van Dugn, 44 N. J. L. 660; Rodrigas v. East River Sav. Inst. 63 N. Y. 464, 20 Am. Rep. 555; Perkin v. Proctor, 2 Wils. 384; Piggott v. Ramey, 2 Ill. 147.

Even though the coroner in this case had acted in the best of faith, he having no jurisdiction, and being a ministerial officer, much less than a judicial officer, he is liable.

Mechem, Pub. Off. §§ 524, 630, p. 412; Wright v. Rouss, 18 Neb. 234; Rouss v. Wright, 14 Neb. 457; Estopinal v. Peyroux, 37 La. Ann. 477; Patzack v. Von Gerichten, 10 Mo. Motive has nothing to do with it.

Rerill v. Pettit, 3 Met. (Ky.) 819; Clarke v.

the employment of such skill, it would seem that the coroner is not limited by the boundaries of his own county. Jameson v. Bartholomew County Comrs. 64 Ind. 524, 530.

In that case a chemical analysis of the contents of the stomach of the deceased was allowed to be made outside of the county, the deceased's death being attributed to poison.

And for that purpose he has authority to employ a chemist, who is neither a surgeon nor a physician, to make an analysis for the purpose of discovering poison, even though such chemist lives in neither county. Bartholomew County Comrs. v. Jameson, 86 Ind. 154.

The court in Jameson v. Bartholomew County Comrs. 64 Ind. 524, 530, held that the provisions of the Indiana statute should be liberally construed with a view to the accomplishment of the end desired, and in such a manner as to enable the coroner, where the death of a human being has apparently been caused by criminal agency, to employ such scientific means and persons skilled therein as may be necessary to ascertain the cause of such death, using his judgment according to the particular case in hand.

And in the same case the court further stated that the welfare of society and the interest of public justice, alike, demanded that such an inquiry or inquest should be thorough and complete, so that if death had been caused by a criminal agency the guilty party might be discovered and receive a just punishment.

So, a coroner has power to compel the attendance of all witnesses, by attachment. Re Application of Coroner, 1 W. N. C. 372.

And parol evidence is admissible to prove that the coroner did employ a physician or surgeon to make a post-mortem examination. Jay County Comrs. v. Gillum, 92 Ind. 511.

A coroner may summon a physician to testify, and compel him to swear to his opinion on a superficial view of the body, but he cannot compel him 31 L. R. A.

to touch it or do the more nauseous and dangerous work of opening it; yet, as he is authorized to ascertain the truth concerning the death, he must in such cases employ a physician to make the autopsy and ascertain the cause of death, as in that case such a course is the only proper means by which the truth can be ascertained. St. Francis County v. Cummings, 55 Ark. 419.

And the right of a coroner in this respect cannot be precluded by the county commissioners. Allegheny County v. Shaw, 34 Pa. 301.

So, the county board has no control over such right. Dearborn County Comrs. v. Bond, 88 Ind. 102; Jay County Comrs. v. Gillum, 92 Ind. 511; DuBois County Comrs. v. Wertz, 112 Ind. 288; Lang v. Perry County Comrs. 121 Ind. 133.

As the coroner possesses the power to bind the county by the employment of a physician or surgeon for the purpose of making a post-mortem examination, it follows that the board of commissioners upon whom no such duty rests cannot discharge the duty for him, nor exempt the county from liability by reason of such employment. Dearborn County Comrs. v. Bond, supra.

The point as to whether or not a post-mortem examination should take place before the coroner impaneled a jury, was said to be a debatable one, yet it was settled that the post-mortem examination should not be made in the presence of the jury. People v. Fitzgerald, 105 N. Y. 146, 50 Am. Rep. 483.

In the case of Re Coroner's Inquest, 1 Pa. Co. Ct. 14, 3 Kulp, 451, the court recognized the power of a coroner to order a post-mortem examination of the body of the deceased by one physician, but disallowed the expenses of two.

A physician summoned by a coroner to make a scientific examination of a body has a right to rely upon the official act of the coroner, as it is a general principle to presume that public officers act correctly until the contrary is shown. Pueblo County Comrs. v. Marshall, 11 Colo. 84, 87.

May, 2 Gray, 412; Vosburgh v. Welch, 11 Johns. 177.

The coroner has no absolute right to hold an inquest in every case in which he chooses to do so.

When a person puts another in his place to do certain acts in his absence, he necessarily leaves him to determine for himself, according to his judgment and discretion and to the circumstances and exigencies that may arise, when and how the act is to be done, and trusts for its proper execution, and is liable for the act, both in the manner and occasion of doing it.

And it is the duty of such a physician to obey such summons, without an investigation as to whether the jury deemed it requisite to make such an examination. Ibid.

The Indiana statute provides that when a surgeon or physician is required to attend an inquest held by a coroner and make a post-mortem examination, the coroner shall certify such service to the board of county commissioners, who shall order the same to be paid out of the county treasury. 2 Gavin & H. Stat. 17, § 8.

In Cook v. Walley, 1 Colo. App. 163, an action was brought by the daughters of the deceased, whose husband was yet alive, against the undertakers who had charge of the body and the physician who performed the post-mortem examination, to recover damages occasioned by reason of such post mortem, but the court held they were not liable inasmuch as the city ordinance required a doctor's certificate of the cause of death before the burial could be allowed, the circumstances of the case showing that such certificate could not be granted by the physician without such examination being made in order to ascertain the cause of death, the examination being made in a decent and scientific manner without an undue exposure of the body.

One of the reasons assigned for the denial of the remedy in the above case was that the plaintiffs were not the sole heirs of the deceased, inasmuch as she left a husband surviving whose duty it was to attend to the burial of the wife.

The New York Penal Code, § 311, provides that a person who removes the dead body of a human being, or any part thereof, from a grave, vault, or other place where the same has been buried, or from a place where the same has been deposited while awaiting burial, without authority of law, with intent to steal the same, or for the purpose of dissection, or for the purpose of procuring a reward for a return of the same, or from malice or wantonness, is punishable by imprisonment for not more than twenty years, or by a fine not exceeding $500, or both.

In People v. Fitzgerald, 105 N. Y. 146, 50 Am. Rep. 483, decided under the above statute, the prisoner was indicted and convicted of the crime of body stealing, and the facts showed that, after the deceased had been interred, upon application sup-

It would seem poor law that would allow a corporation to act thus, holding out these two individuals in their respective capacities as coroner and post-mortem physician, recognizing the benefit derived from their actions and doings by being an advantage to students, thus increasing the number of said students, and thereby swelling their resources, without incurring at the same time a liability for the wrongful acts of their servants.

N. S. 813.

If corporations are not to be held responsible for injuries to persons done in the transported by affidavit setting forth a sufficient ground to give the coroner jurisdiction, he directed the body to be exhumed for the purpose of a post-mortem examination in order to discover the cause of death, whether by murder or otherwise, and that the body was exhumed and an examination taken without a jury being impaneled. The court held that even though the proceedings by the coroner might have been irregular, yet an indictment would not lie under the above section of the Penal Code, the statute not being intended to apply, the exhumation being made by legally constituted public authorities for the purpose of ascertaining whether a crime had been committed which produced the death of the person whose body was exhumed.

In the above case it was further stated that when the examination was made, not secretly, but publicly, on an open application to the officer of justice charged with the duty of inquiring into the cause of the death of any person whose body was brought within his jurisdiction, it was a total misapplication of the statute against body stealing to use it for the purpose of imposing its punishment on all persons concerned in the exhumation, in case any proceedings of the officer, under whose direction it was made, should be found to be irregular.

In that case the irregularity charged was neglect of the coroner to impanel a jury before ordering the post mortem.

Under § 4109 of the Revised Code of Georgia of 1873, the coroner has power to order a post-mortem examination only in cases of death from poison, the act of 1863 superseding that of 1850. Farrell v. Floyd County Comrs. 57 Ga. 347.

In Kelly v. Brooks, 50 Ga. 582, it was held that, under the laws of Georgia, a coroner had no vested right to hold an inquest upon dead bodies, unless the laws of the state required himso to do, or unless the alleged facts were sufficient to make it his duty under such law.

Under the Revised Statutes of Indiana (2 Rev. Stat. 1876, p. 21, § 8) when a surgeon or physician is required to attend such inquest and make a post-mortem examination, the coroner must certify such service to the board of county commissioners.

In Jameson v. Bartholomew County Comrs. 64 Ind. 524, 626, the court held that it was the intent and purpose of the provision of the Indiana stat-action of a series of wrongful acts, such an immunity would have wide scope.

Messrs. Richard M. Venable, Rich & Bryan, and Edwin G. Baetjer, for appellees: There are no rights arising out of a dead body which are known to the law of torts.

ute to clothe the coroner of the county, whenever he should be notified that the dead body of any person, supposed to have come to his death by violence or casualty, was within his county, with the necessary power to properly inquire, and if possible ascertain when and in what manner and by whom such person came to his death, and whether any one was guilty of such death, and the degree of guilt.

And under §§ 5878 and 5879 of the Revised Statutes of Indiana of 1881, it is the duty of a coroner to make all inquests, and for the purpose of ascertaining in what manner death was caused he is authorized to require a physician or surgeon to attend and make a post-mortem examination; and for the services rendered under the certificate of a coroner it is the duty of the board of commissioners to pay the same out of the county treasury.

In construing the above sections of the Revised Statutes, the court, in the case of Dearborn County Comrs. v. Bond, 88 Ind. 102, stated that such duty was imposed upon the coroner, and for the purpose of enabling him to discharge it he was empowered to employ such means and to select such physician or surgeon as in his judgment would enable him to ascertain the cause of death, the duty thus imposed necessarily conferring the authority to make his own selection in the faithful discharge of his duties, and in that respect he could not be superseded by the board of commissioners upon whom no such duty rested.

Under § 368 of the Iowa Code a coroner, when he or the jury deem it necessary, has power to cause a post-mortem examination, and a justice of the peace acting for him has like power. Cushman v. Washington County, 45 Iowa, 255; Sanford v. Lee County, 49 Iowa, 148.

Under the New York Statute of 1873, it is discretionary with the coroner to cause a dissection to be made, and to select the surgeons. Crisfield v. Perine, 15 Hun, 200, 203, 81 N. Y. 622.

In Crisfield v. Perine, supra, the real question was whether a post-mortem examination conducted by surgeons employed by a coroner holding an inquest was a part of the inquest in such a sense as that every person had a right freely to attend it, and the court held that it was not, the statute (Laws 1873, chap. 833, § 2, Laws 1874, chap. 535, § 2) authorizing a coroner to cause the examination to 31 L. R. A.

II. Justices of the peace, etc.

Under the Pennsylvania act an alderman was held to have power to hold an inquest and order a post-mortem examination in the absence of the coroner, he being ex officio a justice of the peace within the meaning of the Pennsylvania statute. Pickett v. Erie County, 19 W. N. C. 60.

So, a justice of the peace has power to hold an inquest under the Indiana statutes where the coroner is absent from the county, or in cases in which he is unable to attend, and such justice has full power to perform all the duties pertaining to the office of coroner, including the procurement of a physician or surgeon to make a post-mortem examination. Stevens v. Harrison County Comrs. 46 Ind. 541.

And in Dubois County Comrs. v. Wertz, 112 Ind. 268, the court construed § 5888 of the Indiana Revised Statutes of 1881, concerning the duties of coroners, as applying to a justice of the peace of the county. Such justice has power to perform all the duties of a coroner in connection with it.

The New York Laws of 1864, chap. 379, provide that a justice of the peace may hold an inquest in case the attendance of a coroner cannot be procured within twelve hours after the discovery of a dead body, and further that "in all cases in which the cause of death is not apparent, it shall be the duty of the justice to associate with himself a regular licensed physician to make a suitable examination for the discovery of said cause;" and in the case of Crisfield v. Perine, 15 Hun, 200, 203, 81 N. Y. 622, it was held that such act had no application to an inquest held by a coroner.

An injury to the family relations means an interference with some right which arises out of the family relations, and which the law of torts recognizes as a legal right.

The law does not recognize all the rights which the family relations create.

Pollock, Torts, 196; Lynch v. Knight, supra.

The only rights which the law thus recognizes are:

(a) The right of the husband to the consortium of the wife.

Pollock, Torts, 196.

(b) Possibly the right of the wife to the consortium of the husband.

Cooley, Torts, 267; Pollock, Torts, 197.

If the right of consortium or the service has ceased, then the husband, wife, or parent has no rights which the law protects.

It is clear that the dead body is not property in any sense.

The statutes conferring upon coroners the right to hold autopsies should, in view of the importance and necessity of the autopsies, receive a liberal construction. The coroner has the right to determine when an autopsy should be held.

Jameson v. Bartholomew County Comrs., Bartholomew County Comrs. v. Jameson, and St. Francis County v. Cummings, supra; Beard v. Hoffman, 18 Md. 479, 81 Am. Dec. 618; Allegheny County v. Shaw, 34 Pa. 301; Allegheny County v. Watt, 3 Pa. 462.

There was no evidence that the college of Physicians and Surgeons in any way participated in the commission of the wrong charged in the declaration.

The body was in the possession of the coroner; the college had the right to assume that the coroner was in rightful possession of the body and acting lawfully; he had the undoubted right to prevent the removal or interference until he had decided whether or not an inquest was necessary.

Jameson v. Bartholomew County Comrs. supra.

Even if the person performing the autopsy did have authority to act on behalf of the college, there is no evidence that they exercised it and performed the autopsy on behalf of the college.

When a question arises as to the capacity in which a person has acted in doing a particular act, he is presumed to have acted in that capacity in which it was his legal duty or in which he was authorized to act.

Phelps, Principles of Eq. § 212; Jameson v. Bartholomew County Comrs. supra.

Roberts, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff below (who is now appellant) brought suit against the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Baltimore City, Dr. Nathaniel G. Keirle, and Dr. Edwin Geer. In her declaration she averred that the body of her deceased husband was wrongfully and unlawfully taken in charge by the defendants, and cut and mutilated, and used as a subject for the students of the defendant college, without warrant in law; and that the defendants wrongfully and unlawfully detained the dead body from burial, when demanded for that purpose by the plaintiff; and that the cutting and mutilation of the body were done secretly and clandestinely, in order to afford instruction to the students of the college, and without the consent of plaintiff, or any one acting for her.

The damage alleged to have been caused by these acts was great mental excitement and distress and bodily suffering on the part of the plaintiff. Demurrers by each of the defendants presented to the court below the question whether the facts alleged entitled the plaintiff to a cause of action. The court overruled the demurrers, and the case was tried before a jury. The verdict and judgment were in favor of the defendants and the plaintiff appealed.

Of course, even if errors were committed by the court in the course of the trial, we could not reverse the judgment, if it were manifest to us that the declaration showed no right of recovery on the part of the plaintiff. We shall not, however, further advert to this matter at present. But inasmuch as the acts laid to the charge of the defendants impute grave moral delinquency, it seems to us just that we should, in the first instance, carefully examine the grounds on which these accusations are made. The deceased, George W. Young, while engaged in coupling cars on the Northern Central Railroad, sustained a very severe injury; his right leg was mashed below the knee, and the injured portion almost severed from his body, retaining its connection with it, only by a few threads of tissue. The wounded man was a strong stout man, of good nerve and able to work.

His widow testified that he never lost any time from his work; and one of his fellow laborers testified that he had worked with him five years, and that he lost no time. He was sent to the city hospital in Baltimore where he died the next day. The College of Physicians and Surgeons supplies the medical and surgical service to the city hospital; and the patient was under the care of a resident physician who was appointed by the college. After his death a post-mortem examination was ordered by Dr. Geer, one of the defendants, and was conducted by Dr. Keirle, another of the defendants. The post mortem was made in a room belonging to the College of Physicians and Surgeons, where such examinations are usually made; and the two physicians just named are connected with the college, Dr. Keirle being a member of the faculty. The post mortem was without the consent of the plaintiff, the widow of the deceased, or of any member of his family. Evidence was offered on the part of the plaintiff for the purpose of showing that the body was wantonly cut, mutilated, and disfigured, and the feelings of the relatives of the deceased inhumanly outraged. On the part of the defendants it was shown that Dr. Geer was one of the coroners of the city of Baltimore, and that Dr. Keirle was the medical examiner appointed by the board of health; also that the post mortem was ordered by Dr. Geer, as coroner, and performed in obedience to his orders, by Dr. Keirle.

Dr. Geer testified that he ordered the autopsy because he wished to know the cause of death; that it had been reported to him that the man's leg had been cut off by the train and that he had died within thirty-six hours after he was brought to the hospital, and that he did not think that the loss of the leg in this way sufficiently accounted for the death, and that he could not give the death certificate without having a post mortem. Dr. Keirle testified that he did not think that in the majority of cases persons in ordinary health when the leg was crushed below the knee would die from shock. Dr. Welsh testified that if a healthy man should have his leg crushed off he would not think it a sufficient cause to explain the death, and in such case if his official duty required him to give a death certificate he would make every effort to obtain a post mortem, and that it was so unusual for a death to occur from accident under the conditions surrounding the deceased that other explanations were more probable. Dr. Michael testified that when a man's leg is cut off below the knee, and he dies within thirty-six hours after the injury, the accident would not be an entirely satisfactory explanation of the death, if the man was ordinarily healthy and muscular; and if he was required to determine definitely the cause of death in such a case he would not consider that he had done his duty without having an autopsy.

Dr. Keirle described his proceeding in making the autopsy, the taking out the brain, the opening the body, the removing and cutting into the different organs, the liver, spleen, kidneys, lungs, and heart. He testified that you have to examine all the vital organs to see the cause of death, and that the cause of death was persistent heart shock; that the deceased had fatty kidneys, and fatty degeneration of the heart; that the injury itself was not of such a nature as should have caused persistent heart shock, unless there was something else besides the injury which helped to produce it; that the crushing of a man's leg below the knee was not such a thing, in his opinion, as would produce persistent heart shocks. Dr. Welsh and Dr. Michael testify that to make a complete examination it is necessary to remove and open the brain. Without going into minute details we may say that the professional testimony in this case tends to show that the autopsy was conducted in the usual manner.

By the act of 1878, chapter 347, the governor is authorized to appoint four coroners for the city of Baltimore. This act is codified among the public local laws as article 4, §§ 149, etc. Inquests are required to be held whenever a person is found dead and the manner and cause of death shall not be already known as accidental or in the course of nature. There are other duties which coroners in the city of Baltimore are required to perform. The municipality has the power to pass ordinances to preserve the health of the city and to prevent introduction of contagious diseases therein. In pursuance of this power a board of health has been established, and many ordinances have been passed for the purpose of detecting and preventing the causes of diseases and removing them when they are found to exist. The board of health is authorized and required to appoint a medical examiner, and it is made his duty to make post-mortem examinations in any part of the city when called upon by either of the coroners of the board of health. Baltimore City Code of 1892, art. 23, §§ 1-7. Furthermore, it is enacted that "when any person shall die in the said city it shall be the duty of the physician who attended during his or her last illness, or the coroner, when the case comes under his notice, to furnish within forty-eight hours after the death . . . a certificate setting forth, as far as the same can be ascertained, . . . the cause, date, and place of death." City Code of 1892, art. 42, § 2. The object of this last provision is obvious. The spread of infectious and contagious diseases is very apt to occur in thickly settled communities.

It is therefore the part of wisdom to watch with vigilance every indication of their approach, and to investigate the causes which might, in any probability, produce them.

The causes of death must be ascertained, so that means may be adopted for the prevention of other deaths from the same sources. The evidence before us exhibits the case of a public officer whose duty it is to find out and certify the cause of a death which is brought to his notice. The accident preceding his death, and disabling him, is not, in his opinion, sufficient to cause the death of a healthy person. There must therefore, as he thinks, be some diseased condition of the injured man, which contributed to bring about this result. His opinion is shared by other reputable physicians who have testified in the case. He could not honestly and conscientiously give the certificate which the law required him to give, unless he made proper inquiry into the case. In his judgment, and in the judgment of the professional witnesses, proper and sufficient inquiry could not be made without an autopsy. So far as the evidence in the case shows, or any rational inference from it, the coroner did simply his plain and positive duty in ordering the autopsy. And the medical examiner, Dr. Keirle, was equally obliged by his duty to obey the order of the coroner. On the prayer of the defendants the court gave to the jury the three following instructions:

"1. There is no evidence in this case to show that the College of Physicians and Surgeons did any of the alleged wrongful acts mentioned in the declaration or ratified the same, and therefore their verdict must be for the said defendant, the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Baltimore City.

"2. That there is no evidence legally sufficient to show that the defendant Geer participated in any way in the commission of the alleged wrongful acts mentioned in the declaration, further than as coroner of the state of Maryland to order the post mortem examination to be performed, and that there is no evidence legally sufficient to show that in ordering the post-mortem examination to be performed he acted wantonly, maliciously, or corruptly, and therefore the verdict must be for this said defendant, Edwin Geer.

"3. If the jury believe that the defendant Keirle performed the post mortem upon the body of George W. Young, deceased, at the order of Coroner Geer, as the city examining physician, and that in performing said post-mortem he treated the body with ordinary decency and did not wantonly disfigure the same, he acted within the scope of his official duty, and the verdict must be for the defendant, Keirle."

The College of Physicians and Surgeons permitted its room to be used for the post-mortem examination, but appears to have had no further connection with the matter. The post mortem was a lawful proceeding. If anything irregular or improper occurred in the prosecution of it, the college took no part in it. The same thing may be said in reference to the coroner. The question regarding the charges which alleged the wanton mutilation of the body was fairly left to the jury in the last instruction. The prayers offered on the part of the plaintiff were inconsistent with those granted by the court, and were properly rejected. As the jury have acquitted the defendants of the charges made against them, it would seem to be rather an abstract question to consider what would have been their responsibility in a civil action if they had been found guilty. It is to be hoped that few persons in a civilized country would wantonly mutilate a dead body, or would without warrant of law attempt to prevent surviving friends and relatives from performing the rites of Christian sepulture. Such acts would manifest a great depth of depravity.

Two exceptions were taken to the admission of testimony given by Mitchell, a funeral director. He was asked, "Did you ever have in your professional capacity anything to do with the preparing for burial persons upon whom post-mortem examinations had been made? To which he replied that he had. He was then asked, "When the body is turned over to the funeral director for burial is it or is it not, after a post-mortem has been performed on it, fit to be seen by the family without shocking their sensibility? To which he replied: "I never received a body from the hands of the coroner or where a post-mortem examination had been made, that was in a condition for the family to see, without being prepared." The testimony showed the effect produced on a dead body by a post mortem examination. We cannot see any objection to proving this fact; it might almost be inferred from common knowledge that the use of the surgeon's knife would disfigure the human body and give it an appearance which would shock the sensibilities of the family of the deceased.

The judgment must be affirmed.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

John B. GILFILLAN, Respt.,

v.

Anton SCHMIDT et al., Appts.

(.....Minn.....)

* 1. The lands of the defendants were situated immediately north of those of the plaintiff, those of both parties sloping to the south at a grade of 9 feet to the mile. The north part of defendants' lands formed a watershed, the surface waters from which naturally drained into a large pond or marsh, which was fed entirely by surface water. This pond or marsh had a natural outlet at its south end, whence, in the wet seasons of the year, its waters flowed, through a fairly well-defined channel or waterway, southerly to and across plaintiff's land, into a small lake, and thence into Lake Minnetonka. This was the natural and only feasible drainage of defendants' lands. In wet seasons the pond or marsh on defendants' lands filled with surface waters from the surrounding watershed, covering 30 or 40 acres, but at other seasons ran off, evaporated, or was absorbed by the soil, until the water only covered a few acres, to the depth of from 2 or 3 feet down to only a few inches. Much of the adjacent land, although wet and marshy, was susceptible of valuable improvement by drainage, but the waters stood on them so late in the season as to render them valueless. About fifteen years ago, the defendants, for the purpose of draining these lands, deepened the outlet of this pond or marsh and the natural waterway thence south towards plaintiff's land about 2 feet, thus draining and reclaiming much land which would otherwise be valueless. They did not divert any of the water from its natural course, but merely aided the natural system of drainage. Neither have they done anything more than was necessary in the interests of good husbandry. In July, 1892, there was a very unusually heavy rainfall, which filled up the pond or marsh on defendants' lands, from which the waters flowed in great volumes through the outlet and channel deepened by the defendants; and when it reached the north side of plaintiff's land, large quantities of this water left its natural course, and overflowed, in another direction, upon plaintiff's meadows, greatly damaging his crop of hay. There is no evidence that the water has thus overflowed either before or since, or that it is likely ever to occur, except under exceptional circumstances, in case of unusual rainfalls. Assuming that this overflow was caused by defendants' deepening the natural line of drainage, it does not appear that plaintiff cannot protect himself against its recurrence at small expense compared with the benefits resulting to the defendants by reason of the improved drainage of their lands. Held, that the evidence does not justify the conclusion that the overflow and consequent damage to plaintiff were caused by the acts of the defendants in deepening the natural outlet and way for these waters.

2. But even if such acts will, in case of unusually heavy rains, render the water more liable to overflow, or cause greater quantities of it to overflow upon plaintiff's meadows, yet, under the modified common-law rule as to the disposition of surface waters adopted in this state, and within the rules laid down in Sheehan v. Flynn (Minn.) 26 L. R. A. 632, the defendants had a right to do what they did in the reasonable improvement of their own lands.

Messrs. Gilfillan, Willard, & Willard, for respondent:

Hogenson v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 31 Minn. 224.

The order in this case will have to be affirmed unless Sheehan v. Flynn prevents such a result. That case can be distinguished from this one in several ways:

1. The water there was surface water.

Schaefer v. Marthaler, 34 Minn. 487, 57 Am. Rep. 73; Pinney v. Luce, 44 Minn. 367; Tillotson v. Smith, 32 N. H. 90, 64 Am. Dec. 355.

2. There is nothing to show in the findings or the evidence but that the injury to the respondent's lands is greater than the benefit to the appellants' lands.

3. The doctrine, new to this court, announced in Sheehan v. Flynn, supra, was that an owner might, by an artificial ditch, drain a body of surface water from his land on to his neighbor for the purpose of making his land fit for cultivation. But even that case does not go, unless by implication, to the extent of holding that such owner may collect, by artificial ditches, into a basin, surface water from the surrounding country, and then drain that basin on to his neighbor by an artificial ditch.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The findings of the trial court are very long, mainly descriptive of the situation, and largely consisting of statements of what may be called "evidentiary facts." For this reason it is somewhat difficult to state wherein they are, and wherein they are not, sustained by the evidence. An examination of the record, however, shows that there is no real conflict in the evidence. It discloses substantially the following state of facts:

The lands of the two defendants Schmidt constituted a watershed, which naturally drained from the east, north, and west into a large marsh, slough, or pond, indicated on defendants' plat, situated mainly on the lands of the Schmidts, but extending a short distance into the north side of the lands of defendant Classen. The lands of the defendants in the immediate vicinity of this slough or pond were naturally wet and marshy, by reason of the spongy nature of the soil, their proximity to the pond, and the fact that they were only slightly elevated above the ordinary level of the water in the slough or pond; but they were capable, by drainage, of being rendered dry and valuable grass lands. This slough or pond was not fed by any springs or natural streams, but entirely from surface waters from the adjacent watershed. In the wet seasons of the year, this large marsh or slough filled with surface water from the surrounding watershed, covering from 30 to 40 acres, presenting the appearance of a large pond or small lake, from 6 to 8 feet deep in its deepest part, but, in the dry seasons, frequently covering only a few acres, to the depth of from 2 or 3 feet in its deepest part down to only a few inches in its shallowest places. The natural outlet for the waters which thus collected in this slough or pond was at its south end, whence, in wet seasons, they flowed in a large stream southerly, through a fairly well-defined course, on substantially the line of the ditch indicated on defendants' plat, into a pond or bog in the north part of plaintiff's land; thence through a depression or outlet on the west side of this pond or bog, first, westerly, and thence southerly, as indicated on the same plat, into Gleason's lake, which, in turn, flowed into Lake Minnetonka. In brief, the natural drainage of the large marsh or pond on defendants' lands, and of the watershed tributary to it, was substantially as indicated on defendants' map; and throughout its entire course the flow of this water was through a fairly well-defined natural depression in the soil. The slope or fall of the lands was to the south, and about 9 feet to the mile.

As already stated, at certain seasons of the year the flow of water was quite large, while at others it would diminish, and, finally, in the dry portions of the year, entirely cease; leaving, however, a considerable quantity of water in the big marsh or pond on defendants' land, the effect of which was to leave the lands adjacent to this pond either covered or saturated with water so late in the season as to render them practically valueless. The lowest point on the east or southeasterly side of the pond or bog on plaintiff's land was some 3 feet higher than the the outlet on the west side, already described. Hence the water in this pond or bog would have to rise about 8 feet above the level of this outlet on the west before any of it would overflow to the east or southeast. Such was the condition of things before the defendants committed any of the acts complained of.

About fifteen or sixteen years ago, the defendants, or their grantors, for the purpose of draining their lands, dug a ditch from the south end of the big marsh or pond down to about the third or lowest stone culvert marked on defendants' map. This ditch commenced at the natural outlet of the marsh, and substantially followed the natural waterway. Practically, what defendants did consisted of deepening the outlet and waterway about 2 feet. While this ditch has been repaired and cleaned out at different times, it still remains of substantially the same depth as when first dug. Subsequently, and for the same general purpose, the defendants extended this ditch through Classen's land, down to the bog or pond in the north side of plaintiff's land, also following substantially the line of the natural waterway. This part of the natural waterway seems to have been more clearly defined than the part up next to the big marsh or pond, and what defendants did on it consisted mainly in straightening it, and removing local obstructions, but not greatly deepening it. The defendants Schmidt have also extended the ditch up through the big marsh or pond, and likewise dug some short lateral ditches, as indicated on their plat, to aid the natural drainage of their lands into this large or central pond or marsh; but these acts are not important in the determination of this case. Of course, the effect of deepening the outlet and natural waterway south of the big marsh or pond is to cause more of the water to flow out, and to leave less of it to stand in the marsh, thereby so far relieving defendants' lands of the burden of these waters as to render much of them valuable meadow lands, which would otherwise be valueless. There is no evidence that defendants have done anything more than is necessary in the interests of good husbandry, or than they might lawfully do in the reasonable use of their own lands, provided they are not thereby casting a burden on plaintiff's lands which they have no right to do. In July, 1892, there was an unusually heavy rainfall, from the effects of which the big marsh or pond on defendants' land rapidly filled with water, which flowed in great volumes through the ditch cut by defendants, into the slough or bog on the north of plaintiff's lands, and filled it up to so high a level that large quantities of water flowed out southeasterly, as indicated on plaintiff's map, and spread over his meadows, and either found its outlet into Parker's lake, or else remained on the meadows until absorbed or evaporated, thereby causing serious damage to plaintiff's crop of hay. To secure protection against a recurrence of this injury, plaintiff brought this action for a preventive injunction, forbidding the defendants from maintaining the ditch across their lands. There is no evidence and no claim that the digging of the ditch—that is, the deepening of the outlet and waterway of the big marsh or pond on defendants' land—imposes any additional burden upon, or does any injury to, plaintiff's land, unless it be by causing the water to overflow to the southeast, over his meadows. Neither is there any evidence that it ever did thus overflow either before or since the ditch was dug, except on this occasion, in July, 1892, after this unusually heavy rain. So far as appears, on all other occasions the water did not flow down any faster or in any greater volume than could find its outlet through its natural course into Gleason's lake. The court finds that originally the natural flow of the water from the slough or bog on the north side of plaintiff's lands was southeasterly, down into Parker's lake. In view of the topography of the country, this was probably so; but this is wholly immaterial in view of the fact, also found by the court, and supported by the evidence, that this had ceased long before the settlement of any of the lands in the vicinity, since which time the natural flow has been to the west, as already stated. There was no evidence as to whether it was practicable for plaintiff to adopt means to guard against the danger of this overflow eastward upon his meadows, or, if so, at what expense. The situation, however, would seem to indicate that a feasible preventive would be to either widen and deepen the outlet to the westward, or raise the easterly bank of the bog or pond. The trial court granted a mandatory injunction requiring the defendants to fill up the ditch to the depth of 2 feet, from the south end of the big marsh or pond down to the third or lowest culvert, and thus restore the condition of things as it existed before any artificial excavations were made.

It will be seen from the foregoing statement of facts that the defendants have not diverted any of these waters from their natural course. All that they have done was in aid of the natural and only system of drainage. The only effect of their acts in deepening the natural outlet of this marsh or pond is to cause more of these waters to flow out, and thus leave less of them standing on their lands than would have remained there had things continued in their natural condition. In view of the topography of the country, it is also apparent that this was the only means by which defendants could have drained their lands. It is also to be noted that the object and effect of what they did was not simply to drain and reclaim the bed of a permanent and well-defined lake, but to lower the water in a marsh or pond of variable size, so as to drain the adjacent low and swampy lands, and thus render them fit for use as pastures or meadows.

The decision of the trial court seems to be mainly predicated upon the assumption that it was the deepening of the outlet and natural waterway of the big pond or swamp which caused the water to overflow to the southeast, over plaintiff's meadows. It is far from clear that this assumption is correct. Of course, the effect of thus deepening the outlet and channel would be to cause more water to flow out of the swamp or pond. But this overflow would commence sooner. It would commence whenever the water in the marsh rose to the level of the outlet, and continue until it fell to that level. After the marsh or pond was once filled, if the rains continued, the overflow would be the same whether the outlet remained at its original level or was lowered 2 feet by artificial excavations. So far as appeared, the water had never before overflowed easterly, over plaintiff's meadows; and, for anything that appears, the overflow on this occasion might have occurred, as the result of the unusual and extraordinary rainfall, even if the outlet and waterway had been left in their natural condition. It would seem self-evident that this might occur if the rains were sufficiently heavy and continued long enough. Therefore, it does not seem to us that the evidence furnishes any sufficient basis for the assumption of fact upon which the decision of the court must be sustained, if at all; for, unless the deepening of the natural waterway was the efficient and proximate cause of the overflow easterly, upon plaintiff's meadows, the plaintiff would not, under any view of the law, have a cause of action. No innovation or change in the distribution of water from a superior to an inferior tenement is material or the subject of condemnation, unless it works injury to the inferior estate. Peck Goodberlutt, 109 N. Y. 180.

But we shall concede (which is the most that can be claimed for the evidence) that, so long as the natural channel for this water on plaintiff's land is left in its present condition, the acts of the defendants in deepening the channel on their lands will, at rare intervals, in case of extraordinary or unusual rainfalls, render the water more liable to overflow to the east, upon plaintiff's meadows, or to flow there in larger quantities, than they otherwise would. Still, under the modified common-law rule adopted in this state, defendants have done nothing but what they might lawfully do in the reasonable improvement of their own lands. The small inland lakes of this state are in some respects sui generis. Some of them are fed mainly by surface waters, and yet are permanent and well-defined lakes. We do not wish to be understood as holding that such lakes continue to be surface waters. But, on the facts of the present case, we hold that the waters which collected on the defendants' lands never lost their character as surface waters. This so-called "pond" or "lake" was merely a large marsh, in which large quantities of surface water collected at certain seasons of the year, and mostly disappeared at others, but remained long enough to render the lands upon which they rested, and the adjacent lowlands, unfit for use. What defendants have done amounted merely to aiding the natural drainage of these waters. They have done nothing more than was reasonably necessary in the interests of good husbandry. They have adopted the only feasible or possible means of draining their lands. In doing this they have inflicted no unnecessary injury upon the plaintiff. The benefit to them appears to be very great as compared with any injury likely to result to plaintiff from their acts. There is nothing to indicate that plaintiff might not readily protect himself from any injury liable to result from defendants' acts.

The case is more than covered by Sheehan v. Flynn (Minn.) 26 L. R. A. 632. It is true that that case the collection of surface water was 'han in the present case; also, that there the water entirely dried up in the summer; while here, in the natural condition of things, some of the water stood the year around in the lowest part of the marsh. But, on the other hand, in the Sheehan Case none of the water overflowed upon the plaintiff's land until the ditch was dug, and it then had no outlet from plaintiff's land, but rested there; while here the waters had a natural outlet and channel to and across plaintiff's land, and thence into Gleason's lake, and finally into Lake Minnetonka. This whole question of the disposition of surface water has been so recently and so fully considered in the Sheehan Case that it is unnecessary to discuss the question here at any length.

Much can be said both for and against the common-law rule on the subject. An argument often used, and at first sight plausible, is that a man ought not to be permitted to cast upon his neighbor's land a burden which nature has imposed upon his own. But the maxim that a man must use his own so as not to injure another is only true in a limited and qualified sense. No person has the absolute and unqualified legal right to the use of his own property unaffected by the reasonable use by his neighbor of his property. The use by my neighbor of his property in a particular way may discommode and injuriously affect me in the enjoyment of my property; but, if his use is a reasonable one, I must submit to any resulting inconvenience. The question, after all, is really one of reasonable use; and the common-law rule as to surface water is but an application of the universal rule, perhaps somewhat enlarged in the interests of agriculture and the improvement of lands.

Under the facts of this case, the plaintiff ought not to be allowed to stand in the way of defendants' reasonable improvement of their lands, by aiding nature in their drainage.

Order reversed, and new trial granted.

Start, Ch. J.:

I concur in the result, on the ground that the evidence fails to establish plaintiff's claim that the deepening of the ditch was the proximate cause of the overflow easterly upon his meadows. I dissent from so much of the foregoing opinion as approves of the doctrine of Sheehan v. Flynn (Minn.) 26 L. R. A. 632.

Buck, J.:

While concurring in the result arrived at in the majority opinion, upon the same grounds as stated by the Chief Justice, yet I feel that the doctrine laid down in the case of Sheehan v. Flynn (Minn.) 26 L. R. A. 632, ought not to be adhered to. When that case was under consideration in this court, I reluctantly assented to the rule there adopted; but upon reflection and more mature deliberation, I think that rule unsound. I do not think that the private proprietary rights of one individual should be subject to the personal interests of another individual in the manner stated in that case. It seems to me that it permits the taking of private property for private use, and that in its practical operation it will lead to endless litigation, if not great injustice. From such doctrine I therefore dissent.

(.....Minn.....)

"In an action by a passenger against a common carrier for damages for failing to exercise proper police powers to protect her, and by reason of which a drunken and disorderly fellow passenger used towards her vile and abusive language.—Held, the verdict is sustained by the evidence, and is not so excessive that this court ought to set it aside after the court below had held it not excessive.

(January 28, 1896.)

APPPEAL by defendant from an order of the District Court for Ramsey County overruling motion for new trial after verdict in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for defendant's neglect to protect plaintiff from insult while a passenger on its train. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Dan. W. Lawler, for appellant:

The conductor was bound to consider all the circumstances and decide on his line of action in obedience to his duty to his employer as well as to the passengers. He was a conductor of large experience and he knew the seriousness involved in ejecting a drunken man from a train, near midnight, and in the depth of our winter. He also knew that in two or three minutes the train would reach South St. Paul, the destination of Curtiss and the other passengers. He believed that an affray would follow his attempt to eject Curtiss, and this belief was shared by plaintiff's witnesses. He had in his charge a passenger train loaded with over 200 passengers, and considering all the circumstances and in the exercise of the sound discretion which the law compelled him to exercise, he decided to permit Curtiss to ride to his destination, which the latter would reach in a few minutes. For this decision the defendant cannot be mulcted in damages.

Mr. S. L. Pierce, for respondent:

It was the duty of the defendant to protect passengers from insult.

There are no fixed rules for measuring damages which may be allowed for physical and mental suffering. Damage of this kind is matter of greatest uncertainty, and must from necessity of the case be left to the discretion of the jury; and that discretion cannot be interfered with by the courts unless the amount is so disproportioned to the suffering sustained that it is clear the jury were actuated by passion or prejudice, and not with a desire to give a just and fair compensation.

Canty, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff, with her husband, was a passenger on defendant's suburban railway train, which runs from St. Paul to South St. Paul. It was a late evening train, and, while they were waiting for it in the little station or waiting room at Jackson street, a drunken man with a jug of whiskey in his hand came into the room, and used such abusive language that the ladies all left the room and waited for the train out of doors. When the train arrived plaintiff took one car, and her husband took the smoking car just ahead of it. The drunken man, with his jug in his hand, boarded the car in which plaintiff was, went up and down the aisle, and sat in a seat in front of plaintiff, who knew him "by sight," but was not personally acquainted with him. He then commenced to abuse her, called her foul names, and used such abusive language towards her that she and most of the other ladies in the car left it. The plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for defendant's negligence in failing to protect her from insult while a passenger, and recovered a verdict for the sum of $250. From an order denying its motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

1. The law is well settled that it is the duty of a common carrier to use the highest degree of care reasonably practicable in exercising police power to protect its passengers from insult and injury by fellow passengers. Mullan v. Wisconsin Central Co. 46 Minn. 474. This is not controverted by appellant, but it is urged that the evidence does not show that appellant did not use all the care which the law requires. We are of the opinion that, under the evidence, it was a question for the jury whether or not such care was used. It is true that it does not appear that appellant had any agent or other employee stationed at this waiting room; but, on the contrary, the evidence tends to prove that it had not. Neither are we inclined to hold that it was its duty to have any employee stationed there for the protection of passengers. This service was little, if anything, more than that furnished by ordinary street railways, in connection with which similar waiting rooms, or no waiting rooms at all, are used at street crossings or intersections. Then we cannot hold that the appellant received any notice of this drunken passenger's actions at the waiting room, and it does not appear that the conductor on the train was ever informed of those actions. Neither can we hold that it is the duty of a common carrier to eject a drunken passenger who is otherwise entirely inoffensive. Then we cannot hold that it was the duty of the conductor to eject this passenger until after he had commenced his vile abuse of the plaintiff, and the conductor had learned of it, or, in the exercise of the proper degree of care, should have learned of it; and the defendant is liable only for compensatory damages for the subsequent abuse which might, with such care, have been prevented. The train was crowded, and the conductor was for a part of the time in some of the other cars collecting fares; but it appears that, after he came into this car and was informed of this passenger's actions, he did not interfere, but went on collecting tickets, and that this passenger called plaintiff names afterwards, and continued to abuse her. We are of the opinion that there is evidence tending to prove that the conductor could and should have prevented some of this abuse, and that a verdict for plaintiff for some amount was justified by the evidence. The fact that the drunken passenger would reach his destination and leave the train in a very few minutes, and the claim that it might cause considerable more disturbance to attempt to eject him before than to let him ride to his destination, were all matters for the jury to consider.

2. It is contended that the verdict is excessive. The plaintiff testified: "I was very delicate and nervous, and had been under the doctor's care for a good many years; and I was not fit to be excited, and it affected my nerves so I was sick for a long while afterwards. . . .

"Q. Well, how did it affect you?

"A. Affected my nerves, so I couldn't rest at night, or the next day at all, but just thinking of it, and deathly sick all the way through."

Another witness testified that after the occurrence, plaintiff "felt very poorly. She was sick,—nervous all the week. Seemed to be in distress. Sleepless." This is all the evidence as to the extent of the injury plaintiff received. Neither does it appear but what plaintiff would have received a part of this injury, even if the conductor and defendant had used, to protect her, the utmost care and diligence which the law requires. Under these circumstances we feel that the verdict is decidedly large, and that a person who should, in proportion, receive compensation for a physical injury confining him to his bed for a few months, and causing him severe pain during the time, might receive much more than any court would allow. But the majority of the court are of the opinion that the verdict is not so excessive that it should be set aside by this court after the court below has passed on the question and held the verdict not excessive. Of course, if the action was against the drunken passenger himself no nice question of this kind would arise, as the plaintiff would, as against him, be entitled, not only to full compensatory damages for all his acts, but, in the discretion of the jury, to punitive damages also.

depositor's checks, and the depositor is a trader or merchant, and his check is dishonored by the banker and returned to the payee for the alleged reason that he has not sufficient funds of the maker in his hands to pay the same, when he in fact has, it amounts to a slander of the merchant or trader in his business, and he is entitled to recover general compensatory damages in an action against the banker.

(January 29, 1896.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the District Court for St. Louis County denying a motion for new trial after verdict awarding only nominal damages in an action brought to recover damages for refusal to pay check. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John Rustgard, for appellant:

A refusal by a banker to pay the order or draft of the customer, he having at the time in his hands sufficient funds of the customer for that purpose, is a wrongful act injurious to the credit of the customer, entitling him to substantial damages, although no actual damages can be proved at the trial.

A tort is one's disturbance of another in rights which the law has created, either in the absence of contract or in consequence of a relation which a contract had established between the parties.

In an action for a breach of contract merely, the damages are confined to pecuniary loss; the law takes no notice of the motives of the party in default.

1 Sedgw. Damages, 7th ed. 45; 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 21.

Messrs. Smith, McMahon, & Mitchell, for respondent:

The action is founded in a tort.

In order to sustain the action upon this theory, malice must be shown. The wrongful refusal to pay a check must be treated as an intentional wrong in order to imply malice.

The wrongful act was the refusal to pay when the money was on hand. This act was not intended by the bank; it intended only to refuse the check when the money was not on hand.

Booth v. Lloyd, 33 Fed. Rep. 593; Churchill v. Welsh, 47 Wis. 39; Warder v. Baldwin, 51 Wis. 450.

The damage arising out of respondent's failure to pay the check upon demand, if any, was a damage arising out of contract, and nominal damages only can be given unless actual damage was sustained.

Canty, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

During the time covered by the transactions hereinafter mentioned, plaintiff was carrying on a mercantile business in Duluth, and the defendant was carrying on a banking business in that city. Plaintiff was a customer of the defendant, and kept a deposit in its bank, which he was in the habit of drawing out by means of checks, and which was held by the bank for the purpose of paying such checks. He had drawn on the bank a check for $42.15 in favor of one firm, and another for $54.60 in favor of another firm. These checks came through the clearing house, and were on the 20th day of October, 1893, presented for payment to the bank, and payment refused, for want of funds, though the plaintiff then had on deposit in the bank, subject to his check, the sum of $235.22. The checks were returned through the clearing house to the holders thereof. The reason why the bank refused to honor the checks was that it had by mistake charged up to plaintiff's account a note for $300, made by him, and held by it, which was not yet due, but which the bank by mistake supposed was due. This action was brought to recover damages for the refusal to pay the checks. Plaintiff did not allege or prove any special damages, but claimed to be entitled to recover substantial general damages. The court below on the trial ruled against him on this point, and ordered a verdict in his favor for nominal damages, to which he excepted, and from an order denying a new trial he appeals.

It is held by the authorities that in such a case the plaintiff's recovery is not limited to nominal damages, but he is entitled to recover general compensatory damages. Rolin v. Steward, 14 C. B. 595; Schaffner v. Ehrman, 139 Ill. 109, 15 L. R. A. 134; Bank of Commerce v. Goos, 39 Neb. 437, 23 L. R. A. 190; Patterson v. Marine Nat. Bank, 130 Pa. 419; 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 225; 1 Sutherland, Damages, 2d ed. § 77. The case of Patterson v. Marine Nat. Bank, supra, seems to place the right to recover more than nominal damages in such a case on the ground of public policy, but the other cases place it rather on the ground that the wrongful act of the banker in refusing to honor the check imputes insolvency, dishonesty, or bad faith to the drawer of the check, and has the effect of slandering the trader in his business. We are of the opinion that the recovery of more than nominal damages can, on sound principle, be sustained on the latter ground, where the drawer of the check is a merchant or trader. To refuse to honor his check is a most effectual way of slandering him in his trade, and it is well settled that to impute insolvency to a merchant is actionable per se, and general damages may be recovered for such a slander. Townshend, Slander & Libel, 4th ed. § 191; Odgers, Slander & Libel, 2d ed. 80. Respondent's position that an action of tort cannot be maintained in such a case as this, and that plaintiff's only remedy is an action on contract, in which only nominal damages can be recovered, is not sustained by the authorities. The case of Marzetti v. Williams, 1 Barn. & Ad. 415, cited by him, was an action in tort. The 31 L. R. A.

amount of the verdict is not reported, but it is very evident that it was only for a nominal amount, and the only question before the court was whether or not the defendant was entitled to a nonsuit because the action should have been brought on contract, not in tort. The court held against the defendant on that point, and what is said beyond this is merely obiter and was so regarded in the subsequent case of Rolin v. Steward. In Prehn v. Royal Bank, L. R. 5 Exch. 92, the only question was whether plaintiffs were entitled to recover of the bank certain sums which they had paid to save their credit by procuring money elsewhere to pay bills drawn by them on the bank, and to prevent the bills from going to protest after the bank had notified them that it would not pay these bills, although it had funds in its hands for that purpose. It was held that they could recover the full sum so paid by them to preserve their credit, and the authority of Rolin v. Steward was expressly recognized. The case of Brooke v. Tradersmen's Nat. Bank, 69 Hun, 202, was an action by the receiver of an insolvent whose check had been wrongfully dishonored by the bank. The plaintiff was forced to concede that he could not maintain an action of tort, or recover any damages but such special damages as he alleged and could prove in an action for breach of a contract. These are all the cases cited which have any bearing on the case. These are the only questions raised worthy of consideration. It necessarily follows from the foregoing conclusions that the order appealed from must be reversed.

So ordered.

CHICAGO, MILWAUKEE, & ST. PAUL RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.

(..... Minn.)

The provisions of sections 2660, 2661, Gen. Stat. 1894, allowing the plaintiff reasonable attorneys' fees in actions brought under the statute to recover possession of land taken, without compensation, by a railroad for its right of way, are constitutional.

The policy of the statute seems to be to make it the duty of the railway company to institute proceedings, for when it does so no costs are allowed to the land owner. But if the railway company omits to do so, and thus drives the landowner to institute and prosecute the condemnation proceedings, it seems to be the intention of the statute to give him full indemnity for his necessary expenditures in that behalf.

Start, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action under the provisions of chap. 98, Laws 1875 (Gen. Stat. 1894, §§ 2657-2662), in the nature of ejectment where compensation for the taking of land for a right of way and other railway purposes has not been made. The complaint alleged ownership and right of possession in the plaintiff in and to the demanded premises; that the defendant was in the possession thereof using the same for railway purposes, and had refused to deliver possession to the plaintiff, or to compensate him for the same, although repeatedly requested so to do. The defendant by its answer, denied the plaintiff's title, and alleged that it was the owner, by grant and adverse possession of the premises, and had been in possession thereof, and using the same, for more than fifteen years before the commencement of the action, for right of way and other railway purposes. The defendant did not exercise the option, given by the statute, to have the compensation due to the plaintiff, for the taking and perpetual use of the premises for railroad purposes, assessed in case he established his right to the premises, but rested its defense upon its claim of title thereto. The trial court found that the plaintiff was the owner of the premises; that the defendant's grantor entered upon the premises under license and permission from the plaintiff, and continued to use them for its right of way and for railway purposes, without compensation to the plaintiff or acquiring his interest therein, until January 1, 1880, when they were conveyed to the defendant; that the defendant then went into possession of the premises, and so continued to use them until the year 1884, when the plaintiff revoked the license, and demanded that the defendant purchase his interest therein, or surrender the possession thereof, which it refused to do, and has ever since wrongfully excluded the plaintiff therefrom. As a conclusion of law the court directed judgment for the plaintiff for the possession of the premises and for the mesne profits. The defendant appealed from an order denying its motion for a new trial to this court, and the order was affirmed and the cause remanded to the district court. Cameron v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (Minn.) 61 N. W. 814. Thereafter the plaintiff moved the district court to determine the amount of attorneys' fees the plaintiff was entitled to recover. This motion was opposed by the defendant, but upon what ground the record does not disclose, and, by agreement of the parties, the hearing of the motion was continued, with leave for both parties to make and file affidavits. Afterwards the court made its order, upon such affidavits and the records and files of the court in this case, fixing the attorneys' fees to be paid by the defendant in the sum of $250, and thereupon judgment was entered for the plaintiff, that he recover from the defendant the possession of the premises, the mesne profits, his attorneys' fees, and his costs and disbursements. The defendant appealed to this court from the judgment.

Neither the evidence nor the affidavits upon which the order of the court was based are a part of the record on this appeal; and it must be assumed that chapter 98, Laws 1875, applies to this case, and that it is a proper case for the allowance of attorneys' fees, and that they were properly allowed by the trial court, provided the statute is constitutional. This is conceded by the defendant, but it is contended on its behalf that section 5 of the statute (Gen. Stat. 1894, § 2661) is unconstitutional, for the reason that it is class legislation; that it violates art. 1, section 8, of the state Constitution, which provides that every person is entitled to obtain justice freely, without purchase, conformably to the laws; and that it deprives railway corporations of their property without due process of law, contrary to the provisions of art. 1, sections 2, 7, of the state Constitution, and the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Is this statute here in question constitutional in so far as it allows the plaintiff to recover reasonable attorneys' fees in an action under the statute, when the defendant does not exercise the privilege given by the statute to practically convert the action into condemnation proceedings? This is the only question presented by the record for our decision, and we answer it in the affirmative.

The here material provisions of the statute (Laws 1875, chap. 98; Gen. Stat. 1894, §§ 2657-2662) are as follows:

"Sec. 1. One year after any railroad has been constructed across the land of any person, if he has not already obtained compensation for the taking of his land for such purpose, and in all cases where any person is entitled to such compensation for such land, whether the same was taken with his acquiescence or not, and no proceedings are pending to ascertain and assess such compensation, he may maintain an action to recover his land so taken with damages and rents against the corporation or person constructing or operating such railroad.

"Sec. 2. In such action the defendant may by answer ask to have the compensation due to the plaintiff, in case he establishes his right to recover the land in question, ascertained and assessed by the jury trying the action.

"Sec. 3. In such action when the defendant pleads as in section 2 provided, the jury shall find whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover the land and if so the compensation to which he is entitled for the taking and perpetual use of his land for railway purposes.

"Sec. 4. Upon a verdict finding that the plaintiff is entitled to recover the land and the compensation for such taking and perpetual use, judgment shall be entered for the plaintiff that he recover the land, or in lieu thereof the compensation fixed by the jury (in case the defendant elects to take the land) with costs and disbursements, and reasonable attorneys' fees to be fixed by the court.

"Sec. 5. In case the defendant does not plead as in section 2 specified, if the plaintiff establishes his title to the land he shall have judgment for its possession, with mesne profits and reasonable attorneys' fees besides the usual costs and disbursements.

"Sec. 6. The action given by this act shall, in all other respects except as herein provided, be governed by the rules of practice and procedure applicable to other actions for the recovery of real estate."

This statute has been in force for nearly twenty years, and attorneys' fees have been repeatedly allowed to the plaintiff in actions brought under it. Two such cases have been heard on appeal in this court (see Coleman v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 38 Minn. 260; Scott v. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. Ste. M. R. Co. 42 Minn. 179); and, so far as we are advised, this is the first time any question as to the constitutionality of the provisions of this statute allowing reasonable attorneys' fees has ever been suggested. This acquiescence, without question, of bench and bar, in the validity of the statute, is significant; and it is entitled to controlling weight if the question as to the validity of the statute is doubtful. The reasons given by counsel for the defendant why the statute, in so far as it provides for the allowance of reasonable attorneys' fees to the plaintiff in cases where the railway company does not elect to convert the action into condemnation proceedings, are all substantially included in his general proposition that it is arbitrary and unequal class legislation. If such it is, there is nothing to discuss; for then the conclusion necessarily follows that the statute is unconstitutional. Class legislation, discriminating against some and favoring others, is prohibited, but legislation is not prohibited either by the state or Federal Constitution, which, in carrying out a public purpose, is limited in its application, if, within the sphere of its operation, it affects alike all persons similarly situated. Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 32, 28 L. ed. 925. The legislature, however, cannot adopt a mere arbitrary classification, even though the law be made to operate equally upon each subject of each of the classes adopted. The classification, to be valid, must be based upon some reason of public policy, growing out of the condition or business of the class to which the legislation is limited. But a law which is confined in its application to a particular class of persons is not void as unequal class legislation if the distinction is based on some reason of public policy, and applies to and embraces all persons alike under similar circumstances. Nichols v. Walter, 37 Minn. 264; Allen v. Pioneer Press Co. 40 Minn. 117, 3 L. R. A. 532; Lavallee v. St. Paul, M. & M.

R. Co. 40 Minn. 249. This right to classify persons, corporations, and associations, and to impose upon them, as a class, duties, and liabilities, or to confer upon them privileges, not imposed or conferred upon the whole people of the state, is a matter committed to the sound discretion of the legislature, subject to the supreme condition that the classification must not be arbitrary, but must be based upon some natural reason of public policy. Upon the exercise of this right rests much of the necessary and beneficent legislation of the state. The exercise of this right is not limited to matters connected with the police power of the state, but it may be exercised in all cases where public interests and the due administration of justice require it. Thus, in the case of Allen v. Pioneer Press Co., it was held, in view of the general nature of the business of the publisher of a newspaper, and the interests of the public therein, that chap. 191, Laws 1887, regulating actions for libel, was not arbitrary or unequal class legislation, although it made special provisions for the protection of the publishers of newspapers when sued for a libel which were not conferred upon other defendants in libel suits, for the reason that the distinction was based upon considerations of public policy, of which the legislature was the judge. It is the settled policy of this and many other states to provide by law for an increase of damages or indemnity for the expenses of litigation by allowing double costs or reasonable attorneys' fees where an injury results to a person from the wilful act or neglect of another, and such laws are held to be a legitimate exercise of legislative discretion. Thus, a law providing for double costs or for double damages in actions for the recovery of damages for live stock killed or injured by the neglect of railway companies to fence their right of way is constitutional. Johnson v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 29 Minn. 425; Schimmele v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 34 Minn. 216; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Humes, 115 U. S. 512, 29 L. ed. 463; Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Beckwith, 129 U. S. 26, 32 L. ed. 585.

Tested by the rule we have stated as to class legislation, the statute in question is constitutional when applied to actions within its provisions, although the defendant does not elect to avail itself of the privilege of retaining the land for railway purposes, and making compensation for such taking. Counsel erroneously assumes that an action under this statute is a simple action of ejectment, when the defendant fails to exercise its option to convert the action, by its answer, into condemnation proceedings. While it is true that the statute creates no new remedy, yet it regulates and materially qualifies an existing one, to the detriment of the landowner, for the benefit of the railway company and the public; and, as compensation to the owner for his expenses in the litigation, it allows him reasonable attorneys' fees, provided he brings his case within the terms of the statute. The failure of the defendant to accept the privileges conferred upon it by the statute can neither make nor mar the considerations of public policy upon which the statute is based, or deprive the plaintiff of the indemnity, for his expenses in prosecuting his action, given by the statute for the injury sustained by the wilful act or neglect of the defendant. It is to be noted that the statute does not purport to allow attorneys' fees in ordinary actions of ejectment against railway companies. It is only when the landowner foregoes his right to repossess himself of his land taken for a railway purpose for one year, after the land has been taken, and the railroad constructed across it, and when no proceedings to acquire a right to so take and use his land are pending, and when he is entitled to compensation for taking his land, but has not received it, that he may bring an action for the recovery of the possession of his land under the statute, and obtain an allowance for his reasonable attorneys' fees. If he brings an ordinary action of ejectment when none of these conditions exist, he is not entitled to any allowance of attorneys' fees. But when they do exist, and the action is brought under the statute to redress the wrong done to him and to the public by the wilful act of the railway company in taking forcible possession of his land for railway purposes, or (where such taking was with his temporary acquiescence) by its neglect of its duty to acquire and pay for the right to take the land, his right to reasonable attorneys' fees cannot be defeated by the failure of the railway company to claim by its answer the privileges conferred upon it by the statute. Declining the benefits of the statute does not absolve the railway company from the liabilities imposed upon it for its neglect of a public and private duty. The statute applies alike to all persons or corporations constructing or operating a railroad and to all landowners who bring an action under it, including railway corporations. It includes in its classification all persons and corporations similarly situated, and as to them it is general in its application. It is true that persons and corporations other than those engaged in building or operating railroads are authorized to exercise the power of eminent domain, and possibly they may have taken land for a quasi public purpose without making compensation therefor; but the business of such persons and corporations is radically dissimilar in its character and extent, and in its effect upon public and private interests, from that of railway corporations. This difference constitutes a proper basis for limiting the operation of the statute to corporations and persons operating railroads.

The reason and public policy justifying the provisions of this statute giving reasonable attorneys' fees to the plaintiff in actions brought under it, when no such allowance is made to parties in ordinary actions for the recovery of land, are obvious. One purpose of this provision is to induce by the promise of indemnity for the expenses of the litigation, the owner whose land has been unlawfully taken, without compensation, for the right of way of a railroad, to wait a reasonable time before bringing an action to repossess himself of it, and then to bring the action under the statute, so that in case his right to recover the land is established, the railway company may retain it by making compensation therefor, and avoid a break in its right of way, whereby its business would be interrupted, to the injury of public and private interests. Another purpose of the statute, and perhaps the principal one, is to compel railway companies to respect the constitutional rights of the citizen, and to discharge their duties to the public and individuals. Such corporations must have land for their right of way in order to discharge the public functions for which they were created, and, to enable them to acquire such land, the state has armed them with the sovereign power of eminent domain. They are therefore charged with the duty of acquiring and paying for their right of way in the manner and at the time required by the Constitution and laws of the state. When they neglect this duty, and forcibly take possession of the land of another for railway purposes, or take such possession with the temporary consent, expressed or implied, of the owner, and unreasonably neglect to make compensation therefor, their conduct menaces in a measure the public peace and the safety of the traveling public, for nothing is better calculated to arouse the evil passions of men than a wanton and unredressed invasion of their constitutional and property rights. Such wilful act or unjustifiable neglect oppresses and wrongs property owners, and it is entirely competent for the legislature, as a means for correcting such abuses and as a matter of justice, to give to persons injured by such act or neglect increased damages or indemnity for their expenses incurred in actions to right their wrongs by allowing them double costs or reasonable attorneys' fees. The validity of the statute in question is supported by the considerations of public policy and justice to which we have referred. It is not partial or unequal class legislation; it does not deprive the defendant of its property without due process of law; nor does it violate our bill of rights securing to every person the right to obtain justice freely and without purchase, completely and without denial, promptly and without delay, conformably to the laws. This proposition is supported by the cases to which we have referred, sustaining the validity of statutes giving double costs or double damages in actions against railway companies to recover damages for domestic animals killed or injured by their neglect.

For reasons already suggested, it is not necessary here to decide whether any limitation ought to be placed upon the application of this statute, so as to restrict its operation to cases where the failure of the owner to secure compensation for his land taken for railway purposes is due to the wilful act or inexcusable neglect of the railroad corporation. We can conceive of probable cases which are not within the reason or policy of the statute; for example, cases where the railway company had in good faith, as it had reason to believe, lawfully acquired and paid for its right of way, but by reason of a forged deed, or some error of its attorney in the condemnation proceedings, it failed, through no neglect of its own, to obtain a strictly legal title to its right of way. Upon the question whether or not such cases must, on constitutional grounds, be excluded from the operation of the statute, we express no opinion, and leave it an open question, to be decided when it arises.

Judgment affirmed.

Canty, J.:

I concur in the result, but am of the opinion that the statute cannot be held constitutional as applied to all the different cases which may come within its terms. The legislature has a perfect right to provide for redressing a class of wrongs by imposing extra costs in the suit brought to vindicate those wrongs, providing the class selected by the legislature is different in some essential particular from all other wrongs,—if the basis of classification is a proper one. Ejectment cases to recover land occupied as a right of way are often defended in bad faith, or without color of right, or with a negligent disregard for the truth as to the merits of the controversy. A railroad company enjoys peculiar privileges for the protection of its franchises, and to prevent the interruption of the public service in such cases, and the legislature may well provide means to prevent the abuse of those privileges. As applied to proper cases, the statute is clearly constitutional; but when the defendant has color of right, is acting in apparent good faith, is not negligent in failing to ascertain the truth or merits of its defense, and is not in any manner abusing its privileges,—as applied to such cases, I am of the opinion that the statute is unconstitutional. I am also inclined to think that, if we had before us the record brought up on the former appeal, this would be such a case. But there is nothing before us on this appeal but the complaint, findings, and judgment. Every presumption is in favor of the regularity of the proceedings of the court below, and I am therefore of the opinion that the judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

Asa FISHER, Respnt.

(.....N. D.....)

1. Equity will not specifically enforce a contract to give a minority stockholder the right to control the stock of another and vote it at a stockholders' meeting, where the sole purpose is to secure control of the corporation by the use of such stock.

2. Therefore when such a contract has been made, and on the strength of it the promisee has suffered to pass beyond his control stock which, in connection with stock owned by him, would have given him control of the corporation, and thereafter the promisor threatens to sell his stock to the opposing faction, and thus give them control of the corporation, and the promisee, to save himself from defeat in his project to secure control of the corporation, purchases such stock at a figure much in excess of its normal market value, such contract of purchase cannot thereafter be rescinded, but the purchaser must pay the stipulated price.

3. A contract to allow another to control the voting of stock, based upon a promise of the one who is to control such stock to secure for the owner of the stock an office in the corporation, is illegal; and the whole contract is void, although the illegal consideration (i. e. the promise to secure for the owner of the stock a corporate office) constitutes only a part of the consideration for the agreement to give such promisee control of the stock.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Burleigh County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a promissory note. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Newton & Patterson and S. L. Glaspell, for appellant:

The defendant was not induced to make the contract by fraud or undue influence.

Fraud is the intentional and successful employment of any cunning, deception, or artifice used to circumvent, cheat, or deceive another.

1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 186.

There was no relation of trust and confidence between the parties.

It is held to be inexpedient, upon grounds of public policy, that a written contract should be set aside upon the ground of fraud unless the proof be clear and strong.

McCall v. Bushnell, 41 Minn. 37.

If Fisher was induced to buy the Gage stock by means of fraud or undue influence, still he ratified and reaffirmed the contract repeatedly, with full knowledge of all the facts.

A person who is induced to part with his property in a fraudulent contract may, on discovering the fraud, avoid the contract and claim a return of what had been advanced upon it.

But if the one defrauded would disaffirm the contract he must do so at the earliest practicable moment after the discovery of the cheat.

The alleged contract whereby Gage agreed to vote his stock with Fisher for certain directors, whereby Gage agreed not to sell his stock, nor permit it to be voted against Fisher, and wherein Fisher as an individual agreed for the First National Bank that he would make Gage a director and give him employment as cashier, was void from public policy. There can be no rescission of such a contract and a court will leave the parties where it finds them.

Mr. Alexander Hughes, for respondent:

The evidence sustains and supports the answer, and establishes that the defendant was induced to make the contract of purchase by fraud and undue influence.

The burden of proof is on the plaintiff to show affirmatively that the transaction was fair, open, and free from the least spark of imposition, and that the defendant's consent was not obtained by any oppression, undue influence, or undue advantage taken of his condition, situation, and necessities.

The agreement between Gage and Fisher in substance and effect was, that Fisher would purchase the two additional shares, surrender the control of the Shaw stock, take him into the combination forming the majority, and Gage was to vote his stock at the ensuing election for the directors which they had mutually agreed upon. The evidence clearly and conclusively shows that it was their intention to improve the management, build up the institution, and thereby benefit all the stockholders thereof. Such an agreement is not contrary to public policy and is valid.

Corliss, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We have reached the conclusion in this case that we must decide against the defendant and respondent on his own theory. Taking the view of the facts which is most favorable to him, we are yet compelled to hold that he has neither any defense to the note sued on, nor any valid counterclaim against the plaintiff for money paid by him to plaintiff in part payment of such note. We will state our reasons for this conclusion as briefly as the complicated nature of the case will permit.

The action is on a promissory note for $3,000 given by defendant to plaintiff. The consideration for the note was the sale by plaintiff to defendant of 10 shares of the stock of the First National Bank of Bismarck, N. D. The date of this transaction was December 19, 1893. The capital stock of the bank was $100,000, divided into 1,000 shares of $100 each. For some time prior to 1888, plaintiff and defendant had both been directors of this bank, and defendant had been president thereof. In 1888 plaintiff was dropped from the directory, and in 1889 the defendant also ceased to be a director. The control of the bank was then in the hands of a number of stockholders, who acted in unison, and who were more or less hostile to defendant and plaintiff. Among these stockholders were George H. Fairchild, H. R. Porter, and Daniel Eisenberg. This group of stockholders will be designated in the course of this opinion as the "Fairchild interest." The defendant, for the purpose of securing control of the bank, began purchasing its stock, and in the summer of 1892 he found himself the owner of 489 shares of such stock, and in the possession of a proxy to vote 16 shares more, owned by a Mrs. Shaw. Had this condition of affairs remained unchanged until the next annual stockholders' meeting, in January, 1893, the defendant would have been master of the situation, and would have secured full control of the bank, electing his own board of directors, and through them, such officers of the corporation as he might see fit to elect. While this condition existed, the defendant claims that he was induced to part with his control over the Shaw stock at the suggestion of plaintiff, and under his promise to allow him (the defendant) to control, or in other words to direct, the voting of this stock at the next annual stockholders' meeting, in January, 1893. Relying on this promise of the plaintiff to defendant, who, unquestionably, could have voted the Shaw stock at such meeting, had he so desired, defendant notified Mrs. Shaw that she could sell this stock to the Fairchild interest. The plaintiff, the defendant, and Mrs. Shaw were all hostile to the Fairchild interest; and the motive which prompted defendant in releasing his control over the Shaw stock, and in suggesting to Mrs. Shaw that she sell it to the enemy, was apparently a desire to induce the Fairchild interest to assume the heaviest possible burden, without at the same time giving them control of the majority of the stock. Defendant, having purchased two more shares, was now the owner of 491 shares; and when plaintiff promised him control of his ten shares, defendant felt sure of a majority, and therefore permitted the control of the Shaw stock to pass from him. Plaintiff now held the balance of power. The Fairchild interest began to bid for his stock. Finding that plaintiff, despite his promise to allow defendant to control his stock at the meeting, intended to sell to the enemy unless he (the defendant) purchased it for the sum of $5,000, he finally yielded to this demand, and the contract of sale was entered into on this basis. It is not claimed, however, that plaintiff, from the start, intended to inveigle by his promises, the defendant into a position where he could take advantage of the necessities of his situation to extort from him an exorbitant price for the stock. Fraud is not claimed, except as it is urged that plaintiff's subsequent conduct was fraudulent in contemplation of law. Two thousand dollars of the purchase price was paid at the time of sale, and the note in suit, for $3,000, was given for the balance of the consideration. Subsequently the defendant paid $1,000 on this note, and thereafter this suit was brought to recover the remaining $2,000 due thereon, with interest. The defendant interposed as a counterclaim a claim to recover back the $3,000 so paid; having, as he insists, rescinded the contract, and offered to restore to plaintiff the ten shares of stock delivered under this contract. The trial court rendered judgment in his favor, both on the plaintiff's claim against him, and on his claim against the plaintiff; directing that the note be canceled, and that defendant recover from plaintiff the consideration paid, namely, $3,000. It is true that the plaintiff claims—so swears—that the agreement between him and the defendant was that he would give defendant the preference in purchasing the stock, in case he offered as much for it as the Fairchild interest; and, if this be the case, he was acting strictly under the contract, in demanding the sum of $5,000 for his stock from the defendant. In that event both law and good morals would approve the course. But the trial court found that the contract was as we have stated, and we will assume, for the purpose of this decision, that this finding is correct. The defendant certainly cannot, and he does not, claim that he proved a case more favorable to himself than the findings, nor does he pretend that he can ever establish a stronger case on another trial.

Taking these findings as the basis of our decision, we are very clear that the court erred in deciding the case in favor of the defendant. The court erred in its conclusions of law that the facts found established a defense to the note, and also a valid counterclaim, for the $3,000 paid on account of the purchase price. We regard the contract for the sale of the ten shares of stock for $5,000 as entirely legal, and we do not consider that the defendant is in position legally to claim that, because an unconscionable price was extorted from him on account of the necessities of the situation, he has any right, after having with full knowledge of the facts submitted to the demand, to rescind the contract he deliberately made. If it is true (but we express no opinion on this question of fact) that the plaintiff, after having induced the defendant to part with the control of the corporation, by letting the Shaw stock slip from him on promise to substitute his (plaintiff's) stock for the Shaw stock, and to allow defendant to use the plaintiff's stock as he (the defendant) could have used the Shaw stock at the next annual meeting; his subsequent conduct in repudiating his agreement was an act of gross perfidy, and the using of his power, under such circumstances, to coerce the defendant into paying an exorbitant price for this stock, which was worth in the general market not over $500, was base and dishonorable in the extreme. But the decision of this case turns on a larger question,—the question of public policy. There is no pretense that plaintiff was guilty of any fraud in the sale of the stock. The parties both dealt at arm's length. There was no concealment of any fact. There was no misrepresentation. Whatever relation of confidence which theretofore existed between the plaintiff and defendant must have ceased, whatever esteem which the defendant had entertained for the plaintiff must have instantly perished, when he was confronted by the plaintiff with this, to the defendant, unconscionable demand that he pay him $5,000 for stock which, as defendant understood, the plaintiff had agreed he was to have the right to use at the meeting without compensation. Whatever defendant did at this time must have been done, not cheerfully, in a spirit of confidence, but reluctantly, with anger in his heart, and therefore with no disposition on his part to yield to any demand, except so far as coerced by the necessities of his position.

It is said that plaintiff having by his promises induced the defendant to place himself in the plaintiff's power, the plaintiff should not be allowed to take advantage of the situation to extort from him an exorbitant price for the stock. The fallacy of this reasoning lies in its untenable assumption that defendant, at the time he bought the stock for $5,000, under the stress of necessity, could have maintained an action against plaintiff to compel the specific performance by him of his contract to allow defendant to vote his (the plaintiff's) stock. If at the time defendant agreed to pay $5,000 for this property, he was powerless to secure redress in a court of equity,—if at that time the plaintiff could not be compelled to permit him (the defendant) to vote the stock,—then plaintiff had a perfect legal right to sell to whom he pleased, for such price as he could obtain, and therefore had an undoubted legal right to sell to defendant for $5,000, so long as defendant, being under no other pressure than that of his necessities, agreed to pay that sum for it. Defendant has no right to insist that he was unexpectedly placed in this peculiar position, relying on the promise of plaintiff; for, if it was a promise which a court of equity would not enforce, he had no right to rely on such promise. He was bound to know that the plaintiff might refuse to carry out his agreement, and that in that event he (the defendant) would be powerless to compel its performance, but must, to save himself from being baffled in his scheme, buy the stock at such a figure as it could be purchased for. Even assuming the contract to allow defendant to control the stock to be valid, so that its breach would subject plaintiff to liability for damages, still defendant cannot use the breach of that promise as a basis for rearing upon it this argument that plaintiff took advantage of his necessities, unless such a contract could be specifically enforced in equity. Plaintiff had a legal right to take advantage of his necessities, and exact such price as he could under the circumstances secure, if he could not be compelled by a court of equity to allow defendant to vote the stock. If plaintiff could break this promise without liability for damages, because it was void, he could charge what he chose for the stock, and defendant would have no legal ground for complaint. So if the breach of this promise, assuming it to be valid, subjected him to liability only for damages, he yet could break it, and compel the defendant to buy the stock and pay him what he asked for it, without rendering himself liable to the charge of having, in legal contemplation, extorted an unconscionable contract from the defendant. Suppose that the contract was valid, and that its breach would have subjected the plaintiff to liability for $500 damages. He might have broken it, and then have taken the position that while he was liable for these damages, he yet had the undoubted legal right to break such contract and incur such liability, and thereupon sell the stock to whom he pleased, without being liable for anything more; and, if the defendant desired to purchase on the same terms as another person had offered, he had a legal right to make a new contract of sale with him (the defendant), and the contract would be as valid as a sale to a stranger. The defendant could not complain that an unfair advantage had been taken of him, for, if it is the law that a court of equity will not enforce such an agreement as the original one in this case, but will leave the party to his action for damages, then defendant was bound to know that he was all the time at the mercy of the plaintiff, who might at any moment repudiate the contract, without other liability than for damages; and the defendant was in this position because he had failed to take the precaution to secure a promise that would fully protect him. He has no legal right to appeal to equity for relief because the plaintiff took advantage of this struggle for supremacy to exact from him (defendant) an enormous price for his stock, if he (the defendant) failed to secure from plaintiff such a contract to protect him against such exaction as a court of equity would enforce for his protection. Before this promise to allow the defendant to vote the stock was made, plaintiff might have sold his stock to defendant for $5,000 without the possibility of any rescission of the contract. If defendant saw fit to let the Shaw stock go, without securing in place of it an agreement that he could enforce in equity against the plaintiff, and without securing the plaintiff's stock itself, he voluntarily relinquished his vantage ground without taking the precaution to protect himself legally, and trusted himself and his interests to the honor of the plaintiff; knowing full well, as he testifies himself, that the plaintiff, in the impending struggle for supremacy, would be sorely tempted to desert him, and, being only human, might fail.

If we should affirm this judgment, we would give the defendant all the benefit he could have obtained from a decree of specific performance, rendered before the stockholders' meeting, that defendant be allowed to vote the stock. Defendant would recover his money; plaintiff would have back his stock; and it is undisputed that defendant has in fact voted the stock in the manner he desired to vote, and has, through the use of this stock, secured control of the corporation. We are satisfied that, both on principle and under sound authority, the true rule is that a court of equity should never specifically enforce a contract by which one person agrees that another should control his stock without purchasing it, where the sole ground of the appeal to equity is the desire of the party making the appeal to secure control of a corporation through the use of the stock he is thus seeking to control. It is a general rule that a court of equity will not enforce a specific performance of a contract for the sale of personal property. Corporate stock comes within the scope of this rule, unless there are peculiar features calling for the interposition of a court of equity. But when such peculiar features exist equity will decree specific performance. Eckstein v. Downing, 64 N. H. 248; Goodwin Gas Store & M. Co's Appeal, 117 Pa. 514; Cook, Stock, Stockholders & Corp. Law, §§ 737, 738; White v. Schuyler, 1 Abb. Pr. N. S. 300; Treasurer v. Commercial Coal Min. Co. 23 Cal. 890; Frue v. Houghton, 6 Colo. 318; Bumgardner v. Leavitt, 35 W. Va. 194, 12 L. R. A. 776.

When the only peculiar feature is the desire of the plaintiff, with the aid of the stock he is seeking to obtain, to secure the control of a corporation, this, perhaps, so far from being a ground for taking the case out of the ordinary rule, may be a reason for denying the relief sought. While it is not illegal for a stockholder to buy up a controlling interest in a corporation, and so absolutely rule its affairs, and while it is also true that agreements to vote stock together are not, when carried out, illegal, in the sense that the law regards the vote as void or voidable, yet it may be contrary to public policy for a court of equity to decree specific performance of contracts touching the control of stock, where the sole object of the person who is seeking to enforce the contract is thereby to secure control of the corporation. We do not say that such a contract is necessarily void, as repugnant to public policy, but we are by no means clear that a court of equity would specifically enforce it. It may be that sound public policy demands that a court of equity should never lend its aid to the enforcement of a contract relating to stock, when the sole object of the person who wishes it enforced is to give that person control of the corporate affairs. Efforts are often put forth to secure the management of a corporation, which are inspired by laudable motives. But it is also true that many of these schemes to obtain the control of a corporation are conceived and carried on in a spirit inimical to the interests of the minority stockholders, and not infrequently for the purpose of so managing the affairs of the corporation as to force them to sell their holdings at practically such a figure as the majority stockholders should dictate. Should courts of equity adopt the practice of giving to a minority stockholder the right to enforce specific performance of a contract to buy stock, simply to enable him to control the corporation, or, what is still more indefensible, the right to vote or control the voting of stock that he does not own, to enable him to secure control of the corporation, they would find that in many cases they had suffered their functions to be perverted by designing men: that they had in fact been lending to dishonorable schemes such effectual aid as to insure their consummation. Proof that the object was legitimate, that the motive was pure, would furnish no guaranty that the real purpose was not to wreck or mismanage the corporate affairs. In no case can a court determine with certainty just what course the minority stockholder, when armed by the court with this absolute power over the corporation, will pursue when he has attained his vantage ground. It is therefore possible that the question whether specific performance should be decreed ought not to turn on the court's surmise or guess as to the ulterior purpose of the person who is seeking to secure control; but because there is always danger that such purpose may be dishonest, and because the court can never surely know the truth as to the real motive, it may be that courts of equity should inflexibly refuse to aid the minority stockholder in his effort to obtain control. In this case the defendant's motive appears to have been honorable, and we have no doubt that such is the fact. He was merely seeking to take the management of the bank from persons who, in his judgment, were mismanaging it, and resume control of its affairs, that it might be built up for the benefit, necessarily, of all stockholders. But perhaps this fact should not influence us. If the specific enforcement of such a contract is to turn on the opinion of the court touching motives, it is obvious that in many cases dishonest projects will receive effectual equitable aid. The decision of the Pennsylvania supreme court in Foll's Appeal, 91 Pa. 434, 36 Am. Rep. 671, strongly supports the view that equity would not specifically enforce a contract for the sale of stock where the only ground for invoking the aid of the court is the peculiar value of the stock to the person who has contracted to buy it, because of his desire to secure control of the corporation. The bill in that case was filed to compel specific performance of a contract to purchase stock in a national bank. The basis of the application to equity was the desire of the plaintiff to secure control of the bank. The court unanimously held that, on grounds of public policy, the relief should be denied. The court said: "While the legal right of the complainant to buy up sufficient of the stock of this bank to control it in the interest of himself and friends may be conceded, it is by no means clear that a court of equity will lend its aid to help him. A national bank is a quasi public institution. While it is the property of its stockholders and its profits inure to their benefit, it was nevertheless intended by the law creating it that it should be for the public accommodation. It furnishes a place, supposed to be safe, in which the general public may deposit their moneys, and where they can obtain temporary loans upon giving the proper security. There are three classes of persons to be protected, the depositors, the noteholders, and the stockholders. We have no intimation that the bank, as at present organized, is not prudently and carefully managed. The stock, as now held, is scattered among a variety of people, and held in greater or lesser amounts. It is difficult to see how the small stockholders, who have their modest earnings invested in it, the depositors who use it for the safekeeping of their moneys, or the business public who look to it for accommodation in the way of loans, are to be benefited by the concentration of a majority of its stock in the hands of one man, or in such way that one man and his friends shall control it. . . . We are in no doubt as to our duty in the premises. We are of opinion that the end sought to be attained by this bill is against public policy, and for that reason we refuse our aid."

It is true that some stress was laid by the court on the fact that the plaintiff was operating with borrowed capital, in his efforts to secure control of the bank. But this fact was not treated as decisive, and it is clear from the whole trend of the opinion that the absence of this fact would not have resulted in a different ruling in the case. Moreover, this fact was adverted to as tending to show that the object was to speculate, and not to invest funds in corporate stock. But in the case at bar the defendant never intended to invest a dollar in plaintiff's stock until he was compelled to do it to enable him to accomplish his real purpose, which was to secure control of the bank. In Moses v. Scott, 84 Ala. 608, after stating that a vote based upon a prior agreement to vote as a unit would not necessarily be illegal, the court says, at page 611: "Whether an agreement to vote as a unit, or, as an agreed majority may dictate, for any given length of time, is a contract so binding in its terms that no party to it can withdraw from it, or disregard it without the consent of his fellows, may be a different question. Possibly public policy may exert an influence in the solution of this problem. . . . And even if such contract be lawful and, upon its naked face, exert a continuing force, the grave question comes up, Will a court of chancery, in its enlightened discretion, lend its aid in the enforcement of a contract of so doubtful policy?" However, we are not called upon to settle this interesting question in this case. The case before us presents a stronger one against the exercise of the equitable powers of the courts to enforce specific performance than a contract for the purchase of stock; for here the contract was to give the minority stockholder the right to dominate and direct the judgment of the plaintiff, as stockholder, in the voting of his stock, without owning the stock himself. Every other stockholder in the bank had the right to demand that the plaintiff should, if he desired so to do, exercise at the very time of the annual meeting his own judgment as to the best interests of all the stockholders, untrammelled by dictation, and unfettered by the obligation of any contract. We know of no case where a court of equity has enforced such an agreement. We regard as controlling on this question the rule that an irrevocable proxy to vote stock is revocable. See Cook, Stock, Stockholders & Corp. Law, § 610, note 6.

There is another reason, and to our mind a still stronger reason, for holding that defendant could not have secured in a court of equity a decree specifically enforcing this contract. The plaintiff's promise to allow the defendant to control his stock was based upon an illegal consideration,—one condemned by public policy,—and the promise was therefore not binding in law. The trial court found that before defendant suffered the Shaw stock to pass beyond his control, and before plaintiff had agreed to permit defendant to control his stock, defendant had informed the plaintiff that it was his purpose to vote his own and the Shaw stock to make plaintiff one of the directors of the bank, and that it was also his purpose to cause him (plaintiff) to secure employment in the bank when the new board of directors was elected; that he desired the advice and co-operation of plaintiff in securing such control, and the selection of suitable persons to put in the directory to carry out his plans, etc. The court also found that thereafter plaintiff represented to defendant that he did not need the Shaw stock "to accomplish his said purpose," that he had better let the Fairchild interest purchase that stock, and that he (the plaintiff) would not permit his stock to be bought or controlled by the Fairchild interest, but that he would vote his stock with the defendant's stock at the next annual stockholders' meeting, for the persons agreed upon by plaintiff and defendant for directors, and would in every way aid and assist defendant in the consummation of his plans for securing the possession, control, and management of the bank and its affairs. These findings make it apparent that one of the considerations, if not the main consideration, which influenced plaintiff in agreeing to give defendant control of his stock, was the previous statement of defendant that he intended to make plaintiff a director, and see that he was employed in the bank by the new board of directors to be elected at the approaching stockholders' meeting. That both parties understood that at least a portion of the consideration for plaintiff's co-operation with defendant in the project to obtain control of the corporation was the promise of defendant to give him employment in the bank is apparent from a written contract subsequently entered into between the parties. On the 19th of December, but entirely separate from the contract of sale, the defendant signed and delivered to plaintiff, who accepted the same, the following memorandum of agreement:

Bismarck, N. D., Dec. 19, 1892.

In consideration of J. R. Gage joining me in effecting the controlling interest of the capital stock of the First National Bank of Bismark, I hereby agree to furnish said J. R. Gage a position as cashier of said bank at a salary of not less than $100 per month, payable monthly, beginning at the 11th day of January, 1898, and during his ability to perform his duties as cashier, provided such control is assumed at such time.

Asa Fisher.

In connection with this agreement the court made a finding of fact which conclusively shows that, all along, one of the inducements to plaintiff's promise to vote his stock with defendant's stock was the promise of the latter to give him a place in the bank. "That said agreement was signed by the defendant, Fisher, and was then and there, on said 19th of December, 1892, delivered to plaintiff, J. R. Gage, by the defendant, and was then and there accepted and retained by said plaintiff, and he, the said plaintiff, then and there promised to perform said agreement on his part; that said contract, interpreted and explained by the circumstances under which it was made and the subject to which it relates, was intended by each of the parties thereto as follows: That the plaintiff would vote his said ten shares of stock at the annual meeting of the stockholders of said bank, to occur in the month of January following, for the persons agreed upon by the plaintiff and defendant for the directors of said bank, and that he would aid, assist, and co-operate with the defendant in carrying out the plans which they had previously discussed and agreed upon for the management of said corporation, as hereinbefore set forth, and that the defendant would use his influence with the said persons proposed and agreed upon for directors, when chosen, to elect the plaintiff to the position of cashier of said bank, at a salary of not less than $100 per month, during his ability to perform said duties."

It is apparent from the findings that this written agreement represents the previous oral understanding between the parties, reduced to writing. It is not claimed that the parties entered into three different contracts. There were only two agreements made. One related to the control of the stock by defendant without buying it. The other was the contract of sale. The court expressly finds that this written contract was no part of the contract for the sale of the stock. That one of the considerations which induced plaintiff to enter into an agreement to vote his stock with defendant's stock was the defendant's promise to secure his employment in the bank, is apparent from the findings to which we have referred; and as it is not pretended, and does not appear, that two different contracts relating to the control of plaintiff's stock by defendant preceded the contract of sale, we can find no escape from the conclusion that the promise on which defendant relied in parting with the Shaw stock was a promise made by plaintiff under the expectation, justified by defendant's promise, that he (plaintiff) was to have a place on the board of directors, and also a position in the bank at a salary. We are strengthened in this view by the consideration that, unless the promise to give plaintiff employment was part of the original arrangement, the subsequent written promise of defendant would be without consideration. If plaintiff, for a sufficient consideration, had already promised to let defendant control his stock, an agreement on the part of defendant to give him an additional consideration for the right which was already his would be a purely gratuitous promise, not binding in law. So far from its appearing that defendant regarded that he was making such a promise, he shows by the written agreement signed by him that the sole consideration running to plaintiff for his agreement to permit defendant to control his stock was defendant's promise to secure him a position as cashier in the bank. It is impossible to conceive that so shrewd a man as the defendant would have promised in writing to give plaintiff a position in the bank, if such had not been part of the original understanding; for, unless it was part of it, the defendant had already secured, by his contract with plaintiff, all he could ever obtain by making additional promises. The case would be similar to that of a person, after having secured a contract for the sale to him of stock for a specified consideration, promising in writing that in consideration of such sale he would give the owner of the stock a place in the corporation. Such a promise would not be made by a reasonable being under such circumstances. The fact that such a contract was made in this case is convincing to our minds that the real consideration running to plaintiff for his original promise to let defendant control the stock was the promise of defendant to give him employment in the bank. This was what induced plaintiff to make the promise. At least, we are satisfied that it was one of the inducements. The contract was therefore contrary to public policy and void. At least a portion of the consideration was illegal, and hence the promise founded on it was a promise which no court would enforce. The law in such a case leaves both parties where it finds them. To neither will it give redress. That a contract relating to the purchase or control of corporate stock, founded in whole or in part upon a promise to secure for the person who owns the stock employment in the corporation, and an office therein, is illegal and void, is a doctrine supported by the unanimous voice of the decisions. Woodruff v. Wentworth, 133 Mass. 309; Noel v. Drake, 28 Kan. 265, 42 Am. Rep. 162; Guernsey v. Cook, 120 Mass. 501; Forbes v. McDonald, 54 Cal. 98; Cone v. Russell, 48 N. J. Eq. 208; West v. Camden, 135 U. S. 507, 34 L. ed. 254.

In the case last cited the court, referring to a contract, one element of which was a promise to give one of the parties to it permanent employment as manager of a corporation in which he was a stockholder, said: "It was a contract the purpose and effect of which were to influence the defendant as a stockholder and officer of the company, 'in the decision of a question affecting the private rights of others, by considerations foreign to those rights,' and the defendant, by the contract, was placed under direct and very powerful 'inducement to disregard his duties to other members of the corporation, who had a right to demand his disinterested action in the selection of suitable officers.' He was to be in a relation of trust and confidence, which would require him to look only to the best interests of the whole, uninfluenced by private contracts. We think this salutary rule is applicable in this case, notwithstanding the alleged contract was not corruptly made for private gain on the part of the defendant. There were other stockholders in the company. The defendant and the Standard Oil Company, for whose benefit it is alleged the contract was made, were not all the stockholders, and it seems to us that it was certainly the right of those other stockholders to have the defendant's judgment, as an officer of the company, exercised with a sole regard to the interests of the company." It cannot be claimed that the illegal parts of this contract could have been separated from the remainder, and the agreement sustained to that extent. The case falls within no exception to the general rule that where a part of a contract is illegal the whole agreement is void. It was not a case where the contract had been executed on one side, and the person who had received the benefit of it was asked to pay only the legal consideration he had agreed to pay, the illegal consideration being waived. In such a case the agreement can be sustained to the extent of the legal consideration. Casady v. Woodbury County, 13 Iowa, 118; 1 Parsons, Contr. 380. So far as any consideration ran to plaintiff, there was only a single consideration to induce him to make his promise to allow defendant to vote his stock, i. e. the promise to give him employment in the bank. But even if he had been induced to make this promise for money, in addition to the agreement to give him a position in the bank, still the legal part of the consideration could not have been separated from the illegal, for no court could say, in the light of the actual contract, that he would have made the promise to allow the stock to be voted by another solely for the cash consideration. To separate the legal from the illegal consideration, under such circumstances, and then sustain and enforce the contract as so radically altered, would be to make a new contract for one wrongdoer, to enable him to enforce against the other wrongdoer, who would be no more culpable, an agreement which he never made. See Greenhood, Pub. Pol. p. 17, rule 21, and page 24, rule 25, and cases cited; 2 Addison, Contr. pt. 2, bottom paging, 762, and cases in note 1; Tobey v. Robinson, 99 Ill. 222-233; Comp. Laws, § 3533.

For both of the reasons set forth in this opinion, we are clear that, at the time plaintiff and defendant made the contract of sale sought to be rescinded by defendant, the latter was powerless to compel the plaintiff to carry out his promise to allow defendant to vote his stock, and that therefore, as defendant, to secure control of the bank, saw fit to buy the plaintiff's stock for the sum of $5,000, he could not, after availing himself of all of the advantages growing out of the possession of such stock, rescind the sale, on the theory that he was coerced by his necessities into making a hard bargain.

The confidential relations existing between the plaintiff and defendant would not transmute into a contract binding in equity a contract which otherwise would not be enforced by a court of equity. Equity will not grant or withhold relief because the promisor was or was not trusted by the promisee, but it will withhold relief, in all cases of this character, irrespective of the question of confidential relations, because public policy demands that equitable aid should not be extended to what may be in fact an illegal scheme. Nor is there any force in the contention that the case is brought within the scope of the doctrine that a court will relieve a party who has made a contract under the stress of great necessity. As we have already demonstrated, the defendant has only himself to blame for trusting to a promise the fulfilment of which equity would not compel. He was in no different position from that which he would have occupied had the promise of plaintiff never been made. And it is too clear to justify argument that had plaintiff demanded $5,000 for his stock, without having made any prior promise to permit defendant to control it, the defendant, if he saw fit to yield to this demand, would have been entitled to no relief on the ground that it was a hard bargain, extorted from him by the necessities of his situation. It would be a novel and dangerous doctrine that a party who, in his anxiety to secure property, had paid more than its market value, could appeal to equity to relieve him because he had been impelled by his desires to pay a large price for the thing bought. The cases cited by counsel for defendant do not lay down any such doctrine. They are cases where one person has taken advantage of the financial distress of another to extort from him an unconscionable contract. See Hough v. Hunt [2 Ohio, 495], 15 Am. Dec. 569, and note. Neither can it be said that the defendant was compelled to pay more for the stock than the market price. The strife of the controlling factions to secure control of the majority of the stock, to be used at the approaching stockholders' meeting, had temporarily given to this stock a value above its intrinsic value. To the purchaser of it, it meant victory and supremacy in the management of corporate affairs. Why should defendant claim that an exorbitant price had been extorted from him, if he was paying only what plaintiff could have secured from the opposing faction, had defendant declined to buy at that figure? The counsel for the defendant, in his learned and exhaustive brief, and in his very able oral argument before the court, has presented everything that could possibly be urged in favor of the case he represents; and this, too, with great ingenuity and force. But while we fully agree with him that, if the facts found be true, his client has a just grievance in the forum of conscience, yet we are unable, because of the considerations of public policy to which we have alluded, to give him any legal redress.

The judgment of the District Court is in all things reversed, and that court is directed to modify its conclusions of law in accordance with this opinion, and to enter judgment for the plaintiff for the full amount due on the note, for principal and interest.

COLORADO SUPREME COURT.

DENVER CONSOLIDATED ELECTRIC COMPANY, Appl.,

v.

John H. SIMPSON.

(.....Colo.....)

1. Evidence that notice was given to an electric company prior to an accident from a fallen wire, that the wire was down, is admissible upon an issue of negligence in omitting to exercise due care in building the line, and in failing to maintain it in good repair.
2. A new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence is not warranted in an action for injuries caused by a defective electric wire, by the fact that the record at the police headquarters does not show that notice of the defect was sent in as stated by a patrolman, who testified that he reported the defect before the accident happened.
3. The giving to or withholding from the jury questions for special findings of fact is within the discretion of the trial court, under Code 1887, § 190, providing that in any case in which the jury render a general verdict they may be required by the court to find specially upon any particular questions of fact to be stated to them in writing.
4. That an electric wire had become disconnected or detached from its fastening, and hung down in a public alley so as to endanger public travel, is of itself prima facie evidence of negligence upon the part of the company maintaining it.
5. An instruction that a company maintaining an electric wire carrying a dangerous current, over a public street or alley, is not an insurer of the safety of passers-by, but in constructing its line and maintaining the same is bound to the utmost degree of care and diligence,—that is, to the highest degree of care, skill, and diligence so as to make the same safe against accidents so far as such safety can by the use of such care and diligence be secured,—is not erroneous, although it is better to instruct the jury that the company is bound to exercise that reasonable care and caution which would be exercised by a reasonably cautious and prudent person under the same circumstances.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Arapahoe County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

Messrs. Wolcott & Vaile and Henry F. May, for appellant:

No duty of insurer as is set forth in the complaint exists; in order to recover, plaintiff must show some negligent act or omission on defendant's part, such as either an improper construction or a negligent allowing the wire to remain after notice of an existing unsafe condition, and neglect to remedy same.

Dickey v. Maine Teleg. Co. 46 Me. 483.

Where there is proper authority for the erection, the defendant would not be liable unless for some negligent act or omission on its part.

North Side Street R. Co. v. Tippins (Tex.) 14 S. W. 1067; Searles v. Manhattan R. Co. 101 N. Y. 661; Cowan v. Muskegon R. Co. 84 Mich. 583; Egner v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 2 Colo. 141.

It is to be presumed, in the absence of allegations to the contrary, that defendant was doing only what it was lawfully authorized to do.

Co. Litt. 232; Bliss, Code Pl. § 175; Howan v. Weiler, 41 Pa. 470.

The court, if necessary in order to ascertain the true meaning of the complaint as finally amended, may consider as explanatory thereof the matters charged in the earlier complaint, but omitted in the latter one.

Stephen, Pl. Tyler's ed. p. 160; Ferguson v. Meredith, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 25, 17 L. ed. 604; Bliss, Code Pl. §§ 417 et seq.

A party cannot have relief beyond what the terms of his pleadings entitle him to.

Tucker v. Parks, 7 Colo. 62; Thomas v. Mackey, 3 Colo. 390.

A presumption can never be allowed to prevail over positive and uncontradicted evidence, and the evidence of the defendant was amply sufficient to negative and overthrow any possible presumption which might have been raised from the mere fact of the broken wire and the accident.

Lawson, Presumptive Ev. Rules 119, 120;

It does not include merely mechanical injuries by contact with wires in highways, if the injuries are not caused by electricity. Nor does it include injuries by electric wires on roofs of buildings or in any other place than a highway. Nor does it include injuries to employees of electric companies, since these are governed to a large extent by different rules because of the relation of master and servant. Another kindred question, which is not within this note, is the matter of police regulations over electric wires in streets, including the right to place such wires in the streets. Still another subject related to this, although distinct from it, is the relative rights of telephone companies and electric railway companies in the use of the same streets. These various subjects will be considered in separate notes hereafter.

Garland v. Towne, 55 N. H. 55, 20 Am. Rep. 164; Dugert v. Schenck, 23 Wend. 445, 35 Am. Dec. 575.

Campbell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action by the appellee to recover damages for personal injuries. The evidence tends to show that the appellant, for the purpose of furnishing light, was engaged in the business of conveying and distributing electricity throughout the city of Denver by means of wires attached to and suspended from poles placed in the streets and alleys of the city. While the plaintiff was lawfully passing along one of the public alleys in the city, without any fault on his part, he came in contact with one of the defendant's wires, heavily charged with electricity, which wire had become disconnected and detached from its overhead fastening, and was hanging down to within about 2 feet of the ground in said alley. As the result of such contact, plaintiff received a severe shock from the electricity carried by the wire, and was seriously injured. The negligence charged against the defendant, of which there was some proof consisted in its failure properly to construct its line, and its omission to take the necessary precautions to prevent the wires from falling and causing injury in case they became detached from their fastenings. There was a verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $2,800, upon which the court entered judgment, to reverse which the appellant prosecutes this appeal.

The principal errors assigned relate to the overruling by the trial court of the defendant's demurrer to the amended complaint on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; to the admission of evidence, over the defendant's objection, tending to show that the defendant had notice of this defect in its line in time to make repairs before the accident; to the refusal of the court to submit to the jury, at the request of the defendant, certain questions for their answer; and to the giving of certain instructions by the court, over defendant's objection, defining the duty of the defendant to the traveling public.

The defendant's objection to the sufficiency of the complaint arises out of the supposition indulged in by its counsel that counsel for the plaintiff assumed that the defendant was an absolute insurer of the safety of the public from all danger from its wires, and drew his complaint upon that theory. If such were the fact, the complaint would be bad, for the defendant is not an insurer;

very recent years, the body of decisions upon the subject already made may be fairly said to establish the following rules which are merely applications of the general law of negligence to this class of cases:

Rule 1.

A person or corporation constructing and maintaining wires for the transmission of electricity upon, along, and over public highways is not an insurer against accidents therefrom, but is bound to use reasonable care proportioned to the danger of injury therefrom, that is, such care as a reasonable man would use in the construction and maintenance of such a line, taking into consideration the use to which it is to be put, its remoteness or proximity to travelers in the highway, the harmless or dangerous nature of the current which is to be transmitted over the line, and other circumstances affecting the case. Anything short of this degree of care is negligence, and will render such person or corporation liable to any person who, being in the exercise of due care, is injured by such negligence.

Rule 2.

The question of negligence in respect to electric wires in streets is, like all other questions of negligence, for the jury to decide upon the facts of each particular case, except when reasonable minds could not possibly differ in their conclusions upon such facts. The same is true of the question of contributory negligence of persons injured by such electric wires.

II. Danger of current.

It is evident that in the application of the foregoing rules, one of the most important factors in considering the question whether the owner of the electric line has been guilty of negligence or not is the strength of the current which is transmitted over the line. The electric currents used on the various electric lines differ greatly in their tension or voltage. The electric current on telegraph and but, aside from certain allegations found in the complaint, which, by themselves alone, might bear such construction, there are specific allegations to the effect that the presence in the alleyway of the wire which caused the injury was due to the negligence of the defendant in omitting to exercise due care in building its line, and culpable negligence in failing to maintain it in good repair. The original complaint contained an allegation that the defendant had notice of this fallen wire in time to repair the defect before the accident, but failed to do so. In the amended complaint this averment was omitted, and therein a general allegation was inserted to the effect that the defendant was negligent not only in failing to keep its wires in good repair, but was also negligent in constructing the same. Before, or possibly during, the trial, in a conversation between counsel for the plaintiff and the defendant, the counsel for the defendant insists that he was led to believe that no evidence would be offered by the plaintiff tending to show that any notice was given to the defendant of this defect. At the trial, however, the plaintiff did offer testimony as to such notice, which notice was alleged to have been transmitted over the telephone by the witness Hedges to the office of the company, prior to the accident, which evidence the defendant subsequently moved to withdraw from the jury for the reasons above given, and because such evidence tended to prove no issue in the case. We think the defendant was not prejudiced by this evidence. It tended directly to establish the issue of the negligence charged, and there was no attempt by counsel for plaintiff to mislead the defendant, nor is it so claimed by appellant. Besides, while counsel for the defendant may have been, in a sense, surprised by this evidence, yet his affidavit on this point does not point out that he would be able on a new trial to produce evidence from any officer or employee of the company that such notice was not actually received at the office of the company. Had a continuance been granted after this evidence was offered, the defendant claims he would have been able to produce evidence that the record at the police headquarters, where a memorandum of such complaints is kept, would show that no such complaint or notice was sent in on the night in question by the policeman Olsen, who testified that he reported to police headquarters this defect in the wires before the accident occurred. This is no such showing as would warrant the court in granting a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence, nor is it sufficient to warrant us in saying that the court committed error in admitting testimony in regard to the notice.

The defendant requested the court to submit to the jury certain interrogatories, to be answered by them along with their general verdict. These were whether the defendant was guilty of negligence, and, if so, in what particular; at what time the accident occurred; at what time the wire was first down; whether the defendant had notice of the fallen wire before the accident, and, if so, how long before; and whether, if the defendant had such notice, it allowed an unreasonable time to pass before the accident without repairing the same. Section 199, Code 1887, provides: "In any case in which the jury render a general verdict, they may be required by the court to find specially upon any particular questions of facts to be stated to them in writing." This is substantially like the Nebraska Code, and in Floaten v. Ferrell, 24 Neb. 347, it was held that the giving to or withholding from the jury questions for special findings of fact was within the discretion of the court. We may add that we perceive no special objection to the interrogatories submitted by the defendant to the court, and it certainly would not have been error had the court submitted them to the jury; but we cannot say that the refusal to give them was such an abuse of discretion as to justify a reversal on that ground. The return of a verdict for the plaintiff under the instructions as given to the jury must necessarily have been equivalent to an answer by the jury of each of these questions against the defendant. Hence, we fail to perceive that the defendant was prejudiced in any substantial right.

The most important and difficult questions concern the instructions given by the court. The defendant requested a number of instructions, some of which the court refused altogether. Others it gave with modifications. This branch of the case we will consider under two general heads,—Alleged error of the court in instructing upon what constitutes prima facie negligence in cases of this kind; alleged errors in instructing as to the nature and extent of the duty of the defendant to the general public using the highway telephone lines, police, fire, and burglar alarms, and other lines for the transmission of intelligence by electricity is very weak and entirely harmless, so far as electrical effects from contact with the lines is concerned, and therefore the question of negligence in relation to those lines arises most frequently when mechanical contact of the wires or poles with travelers is occasioned by the falling of the poles, or the sagging, breaking, or entanglement of the wires on the highways. The current on the electric railway lines, however, has a tension of in the neighborhood of 500 volts, and this current is strong enough to give a smart shock to human beings, sometimes producing temporary unconsciousness, but never so far as the recorded cases show, permanent ill effects. It has, however, often killed horses and other animals. The current on electric lighting lines has a very high tension, in the neighborhood of 2,500 to 3,000 volts in the direct current, and greater destructive force in the alternating current. It is evident, therefore, that a contact with either of the latter classes of wires, although so slight as to produce no ill mechanical consequences, may electrically produce serious injury, and even fatal results.

III. Degree of care.

The dangerous character of a powerful current of electricity when carried where travelers on a public street may possibly come in contact with it makes an unusually important test of the doctrine of negligence, especially in respect to the degree of care required. In the management of such dangerous agencies by which the lives of innocent over and across which its wires are strung. In substance, the court instructed the jury that if they found that the defendant's wire was so charged with electricity as to become dangerous to persons coming in contact with it, and that the wire had become disconnected or detached from its fastenings, and hung down in a public alley so as to endanger public travel, that, of itself, was prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of defendant. Strictly speaking, except in some relations springing out of contract, the mere happening of an accident is not any evidence of negligence. Thomp. Carr. p. 209, § 9. But in some cases of tort it has been held that the existence of certain facts, unexplained, is some evidence of negligence. Thomas v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 100 Mass. 156, and Haynes v. Raleigh Gas Co. 114 N. C. 208, 26 L. R. A. 810, are cases in point, and are authority for the instruction given in this case. This is the first case in this court where it has become necessary to determine the duty to the traveling public resting upon a person or corporation distributing electricity by means of wires suspended above a public street or alley. The employment of electricity for supplying light is of comparatively recent origin. The best methods of constructing lines for its distribution, and the precautionary steps to be taken to guard the public from the dangers incident to its use, may not be known or fully understood. But enough is known to justify the statement that the business of distributing electricity on wires strung over the streets of a city is a dangerous business, and attended by peril to travelers along the highway. This court does not recognize any degrees of negligence, such as slight or gross, and logically it ought not to recognize any degrees in its antithesis, care. The court instructed the jury in this case that the defendant was not an insurer of the safety of plaintiff, but that, in constructing its line and maintaining the same in repair, it was held to the utmost degree of care and diligence; that in this respect it is bound to the highest degree of care, skill, and diligence in the construction and maintenance of its lines of wire and other appurtenances, and in carrying on its business, so as to make the same safe against accidents, so far as such safety can, by the use of such care and diligence, be secured. If it observed such degree of care, it was not liable. If it failed therein, it was liable for injuries caused thereby. We think the court was unfortunate in attempting to draw any distinctions in the degrees of care or negligence. It would have been safer and the better practice to instruct the jury,—which ought hereafter to be observed,—even in cases like the one before us, that the defendant was bound to exercise that reasonable care and caution which would be exercised by a reasonably prudent and cautious person under the same or similar circumstances. In addition to this, the jury should have been instructed that the care increases as the danger does, and that, where the business in question is attended with great peril to the public, the care to be exercised by the person conducting the business is commensurate with the increased danger. But, in effect, this is what the court did. Under the facts of the case, the law required of the defendant, conducting, as it did, a business so dangerous to the public, the highest degree of care which skill and foresight can attain, consistent with the practical conduct of its business under the known methods and the present state of the particular art. This is the measure of the duty owed by a common carrier to a passenger for hire. Thomp. Carr. p. 208, and cases cited.

Not for the same reason, or because the doctrine rests upon the same principle, but with even greater force, should this rule apply to a person or corporation engaged in the equally, if not more, dangerous business of distributing electricity throughout a city by means of wires strung over the public alleys and streets, in so far as is concerned its duty to the traveling public. In those courts where degrees of negligence are not countenanced, nevertheless, in cases where the duty of a common carrier of passengers is laid down, the jury are told that carriers are bound to the utmost degree of care which human foresight can attain. This is upon the theory that reasonable or ordinary care in a case of that kind is the highest care which human ingenuity can practically exercise, and that, as a matter of law, courts will hold every reasonably prudent and careful man to the exercise of the utmost care and diligence in protecting the public from the dangers necessarily incident to the carrying on of a hazardous business. Where the facts of a case naturally lead equally intelligent persons honestly to entertain different views as to the degree of care resting upon persons are imperiled, a very high degree of responsibility is demanded by the general sense of justice. But courts agree that the liability is not that of an insurer. The distinction once made between gross negligence and ordinary negligence is now generally repudiated by the courts. This general subject of distinctions between negligence is discussed at length in Crowell on Electricity, chap. 17, §§ 383-395. The simplest and best expression of the rule as to the degree of care required is that it should be proportionate to the danger. And this is substantially adopted in the cases which have passed upon this particular question of negligence in respect to electricity. This results in holding that the use of a very dangerous current of electricity requires very great care and precautions against injuries from it.

Thus, a degree of care and diligence proportionate to the danger or mischief that is liable to ensue is declared in Cook v. Wilmington City Electric Co. 9 Houst. (Del.) 306, to be required of an electric light company when placing its poles and wires along the streets and thoroughfares of the city. The court says: "The law requires that they should use every way to protect and save the public from loss or injury; they must use every means, regardless of expense, to protect and make safe the public citizens passing over the streets of the city, who are not aware of danger; they must use due care and ordinary diligence in such case, with the legal meaning in law following and attached to such words as I have stated." As to the meaning of these words the court says: "The words 'usual and ordinary care' mean in such cases nothing more a defendant, the court ought not to lay down a rule prescribing any particular or specific degree in that case. But where all minds concur—as they must in a case like the one we are now considering—in regarding the carrying on of a business as fraught with peril to the public, inherent in the nature of the business itself, the court makes no mistake in defining the duty of those conducting it as the exercise of the utmost care. It was therefore not prejudicial error for the court to tell the jury in this case what the law requires of the defendant, viz., the highest degree of care in conducting its business. The late case of Block v. Milwaukee Street R. Co. 89 Wis. 371, 27 L. R. A. 365, rightly interpreted, supports this doctrine, and the case of Haynes v. Raleigh Gas Co. supra, expressly lays down the rule observed by the trial court in the instructions given in this case.

The foregoing considerations dispose of all the errors assigned which we deem necessary to notice.

The judgment will be affirmed.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

CITY ELECTRIC STREET RAILWAY COMPANY, Appl.,

v.

George CONERY.

(.....Ark.....)

1. Evidence that electricity was communicated from a trolley wire to a telephone wire which had hung over it and become broken may be sufficient without any positive testimony as to their contact, where there is no other reasonable theory to explain how the telephone wire became charged with electricity.
2. The escape of electricity from wires suspended over streets through any other wires that may come in contact with them must be prevented so far as it can be done by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence.
3. The care exercised to prevent the escape of a dangerous current of electricity from wires suspended over streets in populous cities or towns must be commensurate with the great danger that exists, although the owners of such wires are not insurers against accidents.
4. For an injury resulting from the concurring negligence of two parties, which would not have occurred in the absence of either, both are liable to a third party injured thereby.

nor less, than if there be great danger and hazard in the business, there should be a corresponding degree of skill and attention required by the law."

To similar effect, after saying that it has been questioned by not a few eminent judges whether there can properly be said to be any degrees of care or negligence, the court, in Hand v. Central Pennsylvania Teleph. & S. Co. (Pa. Com. Pl.) 1 Lack. L. News, 351, says: "Care according to the attendant circumstances is a comprehensive measure of duty beyond which little, if anything, remains. It embraces the question of ordinary or extraordinary care (if any such distinction there be) where one or the other is pointed out as necessary by existing conditions. It matters little, therefore, if this standard be laid down to the jury, by what descriptive term the care required is called."

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. M. Rose and J. F. Soughborough for appellant.

Mr. H. F. Auten, for appellee:

The failure to maintain guard wires, in this case, was negligence per se.

United Electric R. Co. v. Shelton, 89 Tenn. 428.

Battle, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The City Electric Street-Railway Company is a corporation, and operates a street railway in the city of Little Rock, in this state, by means of electricity. Its railway traverses an extensive territory, and extends through many streets. One of the appliances used in its operation is a trolley wire, suspended by means of poles, and charged with strong currents of electricity. A part of the railway was constructed in Fourth street. Above it were suspended the trolley wires. Intersecting Fourth street at right angles is Cross street, running north and south, while Fourth runs east and west. At the southwest corner of Fourth and Cross, O. E. White resided. Three blocks distant, on the corner of Markham and Cross streets, was a drug store, which he owned and occupied. The residence and store were connected by a private telephone wire, which was suspended by passing it through loops of wire attached to insulators on poles, and was extended over the trolley wire of the street railway at Fourth and Cross streets; its distance above it, at the lowest point, being between 6 and 12 feet. In the course

A charge to the jury that electricity is a "subtle and dangerous agency" which requires the "utmost caution to control" is held correct in an action against a telephone company whose broken wire has caused injury to a traveler on a sidewalk by conveying a heavy current of electricity to him from an electric light wire, especially where the jury are further told that the conduct is to be measured by that of a "cautious and prudent man." Ahern v. Oregon Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 24 Or. 276, 22 L. R. A. 635.

That a company maintaining an electric wire and carrying a dangerous current over a public street or alley is bound to the utmost degree of care and diligence, that is, to the highest degree of care, skill, and diligence, so as to make the same safe against accidents so far as such safety can be se-of time the telephone wire began to sag, sagged 2 or 3 feet between poles, and was finally broken near the corner of Markham and Cross by two electricians attempting to make it straight. The broken end was tied to a post, and in a few days became untied or was again broken at or near the same place, and hung suspended in the street, the north end resting upon the ground. Two days afterwards Arthus Conery, a lad of about ten years,—playing perhaps, in the street in front of the home of his father and mother,—stepped upon it, and was shocked, thrown down, and burned. His mother, hearing his cries, went to his rescue, and attempting to relieve him, was likewise thrown down. A workman laboring near by next went to his assistance, and cut the wire and relieved him. After this he sued White and the railway company for damages, recovered a judgment for $300, and the company appealed.

The appellant denies that the evidence shows that the trolley communicated to the telephone wire the electricity with which it was charged when appellee was shocked and burned. It says that it was not proved "that there was any contact between the two wires." It is true that there was no positive evidence to that effect, but there was only one other electric wire in that vicinity, and it was an "electric light wire," which was suspended above the telephone, and there is no evidence that it ever sagged or fell sufficiently low to come in contact with any wire below it. According to the evidence, there is only one reasonable theory upon which the condition of the telephone wire at the time appellee was injured by it can be accounted for; and that is, it came in contact with the trolley wire, while down, and received the electricity with which it was charged at the time. This fact is sufficient to sustain the verdict in that respect.

This fact being established, the next question is, Upon what duty of the appellant to the appellee can this action be based? The answer to it is, upon the duty enjoined by the rule which requires every one to so use his property as not to injure another. The applicability of this rule may be shown by many illustrations. One is where an owner of a vicious animal, accustomed to do hurt, knowing his habits, negligently allows him to escape. He is responsible for the mischief the animal does, because it was the duty of the owner to keep him secure. So it is lawful for any person to gather water on his own premises for useful and ornamental purposes, but it is his duty to construct the reservoirs for that purpose with sufficient strength to retain the water under all circumstances which can reasonably be anticipated, and afterwards to preserve and guard them with due care. "For any negligence, either in construction or in subsequent attention, from which injury results, parties maintaining such reservoirs must be responsible." It is the duty of railway companies to keep their tracks and rights of way free from inflammable matter, so as to prevent the communication of fire from their locomotives to adjoining property, and for a failure to discharge this duty they are liable for injuries occasioned by the neglect.

This rule applies with equal force to electric companies. They are bound to use reasonable care in the construction and maintenance of their poles, cross arms, and wires, and other apparatus, along streets and other highways. They are required to do so for the protection of persons and property. If they negligently allow their wires to fall or sag, or poles or other apparatus to fall, to the injury of another, they are responsible in damages for the wrong done, if the party injured is guilty of no culpable negligence contributing to the injury. Uggle v. West End Street R. Co. 160 Mass. 351; Haynes v. Raleigh Gas Co. 114 N. C. 203, 26 L. R. A. 810; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Eyser, 91 U. S. 495, 23 L. ed. 377.

In Texarkana Gas & E. L. Co. v. Orr, 59 Ark. 215, it appeared that the defendant owned, maintained, and operated in the city of Texarkana a system of electric lights. During the night of the 22d of August, 1891, or early in the morning of the next day, its wires became disabled and out of repair, and, being either broken or disengaged from their fastenings, fell to the ground or sidewalks of the city, and lay there from 12:30 o'clock A. M. until after daylight in the morning, when the street on which they lay was thronged with people. The company ascertained that the wires were down about 2 o'clock A. M. of the same day, but not the exact locality. Ed Walker, a boy, walking along the street about 6 o'clock in the morning of the day the wires had fallen, after some conversation with a bystander about the danger of the wires, picked up a dead wire. Being told to throw it down, he obeyed, but cured by the use of such care and diligence, although the company is not an insurer of passers-by, is held to be a correct statement of the law in DENVER CONSOL. ELECTRIC CO. v. SIMPSON, p. 566, although it is said to be a better statement in instructing the jury that the company is bound to exercise the care and caution which reasonably cautious and prudent persons would exercise under the circumstances.

That the law requires a high degree of care commensurate with the danger when a highly dangerous agent like electricity is used by a street railway company to move its cars is the doctrine declared by Larson v. Central R. Co. 56 Ill. App. 263, and therefore it is said that a party employing such agency "should use the highest degree of care to avoid exposing the public" when a wire charged with electricity would, if allowed to hang loose in the street, cause instant death to persons or horses coming in contact with it.

Substantially the same doctrine is declared in Godfrey v. Streator R. Co. 56 Ill. App. 378, where it is said that the street railway company was in the use of a highly dangerous agency, and "was bound to corresponding great care to so use it as not to endanger the life and property of the people who might pass or drive over the street."

A strong case in respect to the liability of an electric railway company for an injury caused by a broken telephone wire that had fallen across its trolley wire is that of CITY ELECTRIC STREET R. CO. v. CONERY, p. 570. In that case a telephone wire which had sagged over the street was broken by electricians employed by the owner of the wire

"flipped" it, as a witness said, into the air as he did so, and the wire struck a live wire before he let it go, and thereby transmitted through him an electric current which killed him instantly. The company was held responsible for damages on account of the injury.

The main difference between the case last cited and this is, the electricity was communicated to the party injured in the former by the electric company's own wire, and in the latter by the wire of another, but the principle upon which the liability is based is the same in both cases. All persons have the right to use the streets, in or over which the wires were suspended, as public highways. Subjecting the dangerous element of electricity to their control, and using it for their own purposes, by means of wires suspended over the streets, it is their duty to maintain it in such a manner as to protect such persons against injury by it, to the extent they can do so by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence. This duty is not limited to keeping their own wires out of the streets, or other public highways, but extends to the prevention of the escape of the dangerous force in their service through any wires brought in contact with their own, and of its transmission thereby to any one using the streets. Only in this way can the public receive that protection due it while exercising its rights in the highways in or over which electric wires are suspended. United Electric R. Co. v. Shelton, 89 Tenn. 423; Block v. Milwaukee Street R. Co. 89 Wis. 371, 27 L. R. A. 365.

Electric companies are bound to use "reasonable care in the construction and maintenance of their lines and apparatus,—that is, such care as a reasonable man would use under the circumstances,—and will be responsible for any conduct falling short of this standard." This care varies with the danger which will be incurred by negligence. In cases where the wires carry a strong and dangerous current of electricity, and the result of negligence might be exposure to death or most serious accidents, the highest degree of care is required. This is especially true of electric railway wires suspended over the streets of populous cities or towns. Here the danger is great, and the care exercised must be commensurate with it. But this duty does not make them insurers against accidents, for they are not responsible for accidents which a reasonable man, in the exercise of the greatest prudence, would not, under the circumstances, have guarded against. Haynes v. Raleigh Gas Co. 114 N. C. 203, 26 L. R. A. 810; Ugola v. West End Street R. Co. 160 Mass. 351.

In this case the cause of the accident was the falling of White's telephone wire, and the contact of the same with the trolley wire of the appellant. The jury found both of them guilty of negligence,—White, in permitting his wire to fall and remain down until appellee was hurt; and the appellant, in allowing the same to become charged with electricity by contact with its wire at the time of the injury. If this be true, the injury was the result of the concurring negligence of the two parties, and would not have occurred in the absence of either. In that case the negligence of the two was the proximate cause of the same, and both parties are liable. Shearm. & Redf. Neg. 4th ed. § 31; Thomp. Neg. p. 1088.

We have examined the evidence in this case, and the instructions of the trial court based on the same. Without setting out either, it is sufficient to say that, tested by what we have said in this opinion as to the law, we find no reversible error in the instructions, taken as a whole, and that the evidence is sufficient to sustain the verdict of the jury, in this court.

Judgment affirmed.

1. An amendment adding the words in attempting to tighten it. They tied the broken end around a post but in a few days it became untied or was again broken and hung down in the street. Two days afterwards a boy stepped upon it and was injured. A verdict by a jury that the electric railway company, as well as the owner of the telephone wire, was negligent, was sustained. But the court expressly says that the electric railway company is not an insurer against accidents, but that "the danger is great and the care exercised must be commensurate with it."

A very high degree of care is also imposed by WESTERN U. TELEG. CO. v. STATE, NELSON, p. 31 L. R. A.

"of Baltimore city" to the name of the defendant sued as the "Western Union Telegraph Company," and which was the party intended to be sued, although the person served was general manager in the state of a foreign corporation bearing that name, as well as president and manager of the Baltimore company, does not add a new party or operate as the equivalent of bringing a new suit with respect to a plea of the statute of limitations.

572, in which the court of appeals of Maryland says that a company whose wires though insulated carry a deadly current over a street owe it to travelers that their "lawful use of the street should be substantially as safe" as it was before the wires occurred it.

It is said in Haynes v. Raleigh Gas Co. 114 N. C. 203, 26 L. R. A. 810: "It is due to the citizen that electric companies that are permitted to use for their own purposes the streets of a city or town shall be required to exercise the utmost degree of care in the construction, inspection, and repair of their wires and poles, to the end that travelers

2. A grant of the privilege to encumber the public highway with poles and electric wires which, though insulated, carry a deadly current, imposes upon those having such privilege the duty of so managing affairs as not to injure persons lawfully on the street, and making the street substantially as safe for them as it was before.

3. An injury from contact with a broken telephone wire hanging over and in contact with the feed wire of an electric railway affords a prima facie presumption of negligence on the part of the owners of the wires.

4. That a broken telephone wire, from which a person received a deadly charge of electricity, obtained the electric charge from its contact with the feed wire of an electric railway, may be inferred by the jury, without violence, from evidence that it had been hanging over the feed wire for two weeks and rubbing against it when swayed by the wind, although the insulation of the feed wire is not proved to be imperfect, where there is nothing to show any other source of the electric charge.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Baltimore City Court in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the death of Michael Nelson, a child, which was alleged to have been caused by the defendants' negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John K. Cowen, W. Irvine Cross, E. J. D. Cross, and George Dobbin Penniman, for appellants:

In matters of proof we are not justified in inferring from mere possibilities the existence of facts; there must be proof of the essential facts to fix liability upon a party charged with the commission of a wrongful act.

Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. State, Savington, 71 Md. 599; Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. State, Abbott, 75 Md. 158.

It is undisputed that the same feed wire which was up at the time of the accident had not been changed at the date of the trial. The evidence of the defendants' witnesses on this point, being uncontradicted, must be accepted as true.

Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. State, Good, 75 Md. 587.

There could be no escape of electricity without such an abrasion of the insulation as could be detected upon examination, and it was impossible to afterwards patch up such an abrasion.

The plaintiff did not offer the slightest bit of evidence to the effect that the surface of the insulation of the feed wire at the place where the small wire rested upon it showed the slightest abrasion or defect of any kind. Having offered no evidence showing that any defective apparatus of the railway company had caused the death of young Nelson, the railway could not be held liable.

Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. State, Good, supra.

The facts of this case do not warrant the application of the maxim res ipsa loquitur.

Howser v. Cumberland & P. R. Co. 80 Md. 146, 27 L. R. A. 154.

The law only allows actions for death by negligence provided such action shall be commenced within twelve calendar months after the death of deceased.

2 Pub. Gen. Laws, art. 67, § 2.

Messrs. Isidor Rayner and Isaac L. Straus for appellee.

Page, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought against the Western Union Telegraph Company and the City & Suburban Railway Company, to recover damages for the alleged neglect of the defendants, whereby one Michael Nelson lost his life. In the narr. and summons the telegraph company is referred to as "The Western Union Telegraph Company," but in the bill of particulars, filed with the narr., the words "a corporation of the state of New York" are appended to the corporate name. The summons was served on Richard Bloxham, "its manager." During the trial it appeared from the evidence that there are two companies, one whose corporate name is "The Western Union Telegraph Company," a corporation of the state of New York, and another whose corporate name is "The Western Union Telegraph Company of Baltimore City," a corporation of the state of Maryland. Richard Bloxham (on whom the writ was served), is the general manager of the former in this state, and the president and manager of the latter. The evidence established the facts that the pole on which the fatal wire was suspended is the property of the Maryland corporation, and that the New York company neither owned nor controlled poles in that vicinity. Thereupon the counsel for the plaintiff asked leave to amend the declaration and bill of particulars to conform to the proof, and stated, at the time, that the Maryland company was the one intended to be sued, and it was only because of his want of knowledge as to the correct name of the corporation that the words "of Baltimore City" had been omitted. There being no objection, the leave was granted, and the amendment made. Mr. Cross, who was the along the highway may not be injured by their appliances. The danger is great, and care and watchfulness must be commensurate to it."

A corollary of this rule as to great care in the use of a dangerous current of electricity is the presumption of negligence that is raised by the fact that a dangerous wire has broken and fallen into the street, as to which see, infra, IV., b.

IV. Liability for broken, fallen, or sagging wires.

a. Liability of owner.

In case the owner of an electric wire hanging over a street and bearing a dangerous current of electricity, or liable to receive such a current from contact with other wires, is negligent in allowing it to become broken and to fall into the street where it may cause injuries, the liability for injuries directly resulting from such negligence to those who have not been guilty of contributory negligence is unquestionable. The chief questions which arise in such cases are the negligence of the owner of the wires, the proximate cause of the injury, and the contributory negligence of the person injured.

Injuries to persons from contact with wires charged with electricity and hanging in the street have been held to make the owner of the wires counsel for the defendants, then had his appearance entered for the Western Union Telegraph Company of Baltimore City, and filed the three following pleas, viz.: First, the plea of limitations; second, that the cause of action did not accrue within twelve months "before the filing of the plaintiff's amended declaration, by which it was made a party to the suit;" and, third, the general issue plea. The plaintiff, having joined issue on the first and third of these pleas, moved to strike out the second; and the action of the court in granting this motion constitutes the defendants' second exception.

It is contended on behalf of the telegraph company that by the amendment a new party was made, and was, in fact, so far as it was concerned, the equivalent of bringing a new suit, and therefore a plea which averred that the cause of action did not accrue within twelve months before the filing of the amended declaration did not improperly set out that provision of the Code which provides that actions like the present must be commenced within twelve months after the death of the deceased person. Code, art. 67, § 3. But to this we cannot agree. The 36th section of article 75 of the Code provides that no action shall abate by reason of the misnomer of a defendant, but the court, at its discretion, on suggestion, etc., or other proof to the satisfaction of the court that "by mistake the plaintiff has sued in a wrong name or that the party summoned in virtue of said writ or action is in fact the party intended to be sued by such writ or in such action may, at any time before judgment, direct the writ or any of the proceedings to be amended by inserting therein the true name" of any defendant. In this case, the summons was served on a person who was an officer of both companies, and upon him as manager of the defendant corporation. He was, in fact, the manager of both. The service was efficient to bring into court either one of the companies. Under these circumstances, it might well happen that an attorney who was closely connected with both, and knew the very slight differences in the two corporate names, might fall into error as to which company was intended to be sued; but if he did, his mistake could not operate to deprive the plaintiff of his right, when he discovered there were two companies with names so nearly alike, of designating which of the two he was suing. When, therefore, the suggestion of misnomer was made, with the statement that it was the Maryland corporation which was intended to be sued, and the court, in its discretion, ordered the amendment to be made, not for the purpose of adding a new party, but to correct the name of a party actually summoned, the defendant could thereby acquire no right to interpose any other or different plea than it would have had if it had been correctly named in the first instance. If, upon the amendment being made, the ends of justice required further time, to enable the defendant properly to prepare its case, the court had full power to order a continuance. It does not appear, however, that the counsel for the defendant asked for or desired delay. He could not have been surprised. The narrative disclosed that the negligence complained of was in connection with a wire on Eastern avenue near Luzerne street, and Bloxham, who was manager of both companies, knew, or ought to have known, that the telegraph poles and wires in that locality were owned or controlled by the Maryland company, and that the New York company had none in that vicinity. He therefore must have known that it was the Maryland company that was intended to be sued, and it did not require much mental acuteness to enable him to understand that the misnomer occurred by reason of the very slight difference in the two names. It is plain that the error of the plaintiff's attorney was due to the fact that he did not know that the company he intended to sue had the words "of Baltimore City" as a part of its name, and, as soon as he became better informed, he so stated to the court, and prayed the amendment. To hold, under such circumstances, that the amendment brought in a new party, and thereby enabled it to plead limitations, to be computed from the filing of the amended declaration and not from the commencement of the action, would be a gross injustice to the plaintiff. It follows from what has been said that we find no error in the 2d and 4th exceptions, or in the rejection by the court of the 2d and 3d prayers of the telegraph company. By the 4th exception it appears that the defendants were not permitted to offer in evidence the charter of the New York company. But it was not a party to the suit, and the contents of its charter were wholly irrelevant to

If a wire charged with electricity is broken down by a cyclone that could not be anticipated or reasonably foreseen, the liability of the company owning it for an injury to a person in the street who comes in contact with it depends on the question of negligence in failing to discover and remove the danger within a reasonable time. MITCHELL v. CHARLESTON LIGHT & P. Co. p. 577. 31 L. R. A.

In case of injury to a person when returning from night work at about six o'clock on a dark and drizzly morning following a storm which had prevailed during the night by coming in contact as he walked along the street with a live electric light wire which had parted from the pole supporting it, it was left for the jury to say whether the electric light company was in fault for the breaking of the wire or whether this was broken by reason of unavoidable accident or unusual storm, and also whether or not there had been an unnecessary delay, amounting to negligence on the part of the company, in removing the broken wire. The contributory negligence of the person injured was also left for the determination of the jury. Cook v. Wilmington City Electric Co. 9 Houst. (Del.) 306.

On taking a telephone wire from a residence a telephone company is bound to look after it, and any of the issues before the court or jury. The 1st exception was not referred to in argument, and we understand was abandoned.

The remaining exceptions present for our consideration the several instructions granted and rejected by the court, and this renders necessary a statement of the main facts of the case. On August 24, 1893, Michael Nelson, a child of eleven years, while walking on Eastern avenue near Luzerne street, came in contact with a telephone wire which hung from a pole owned and controlled by the Western Union Telegraph Company of Baltimore City. Along that part of Eastern avenue the City & Suburban Railway Company operates one of its lines of electric railway. Its iron poles are placed at intervals along the curb line, and carry wires strung across the street to support the trolley wire in the middle of the street. Besides these, they also support the railway's feed wires, which stretch from pole to pole along the street, over the curb line and parallel to it. The function of these feed wires is to supply electricity to the trolley wire, so that the potential of that wire may be always constant; and when the road is being operated they carry a voltage of 500 volts, sufficient to produce upon any one receiving it serious injury or death. By means of a preparation of braided cotton, saturated with insulating material, and covered with a waterproof compound, feed wires are kept insulated, so that, when the insulation is properly done, and in good condition, there can be no escape of electricity. If exposed, however, long to atmospheric influence, it becomes depreciated, and will not serve its purpose. Defects are also sometimes to be attributed to improper handling of the wire in the process of construction, so that the covering becomes broken, and the frictional contact of another wire rubbing against it would cause serious damage to the insulation, and in such a case the current would commence to be carried off before the insulation was "probably absolutely worn through." If imperfect insulation were due to such rubbing, so that the charged wire was laid bare, or so worn that the current found a path to the overhanging wire, there would be no sparks at the point of contact, unless there was an "arcing or air space" between the two. The defendant offered evidence tending to show that the particular feed wire was erected in 1893. It was not contended that the insulating material was not of the best, or that it was not originally put up in a proper manner. The defendants also offered evidence to show that at the time of the accident the insulating material was intact at the place where the telephone wire rested on it. It was shown the swinging wire did not belong to the telegraph company, but was suspended from a bracket or lug on one of its poles. It was erected, with the permission of the company, by a gentleman for his private uses. It had long been unused, but was permitted by the company to remain, a dead wire, on the poles where it was first placed. In some manner it parted and one of the ends, suspended from the lug, passed over or around the feed wire, and extended to the pavement, where it swayed to and fro in the wind. In this position it remained for at least two weeks. At first, it seems not to have been charged with electricity, for a policeman, at some time during that period, gathered up the swinging end and placed it in a tree box near by, so as to get it out of the way of persons passing along the street. The unbroken portion of the wire passed along for some distance into the city, but, further than to show there was no contact with other wires for two squares, there was no evidence tending to prove that it received its deadly charge elsewhere than at the place where it crossed the feed wire. It is not contended that Nelson was guilty of contributory negligence. How he came in contact with the wire does not clearly appear. Some of the witnesses thought it was blown against him by the wind. However that may be, it passed between his fingers, and as he recoiled from the shock he drew it about his neck and throat. He was badly burned. In a few days lockjaw set in, and he died. At the conclusion of the plaintiff's testimony, the court was asked by the defendants to instruct the jury that there was no legally sufficient evidence to show that the death of Nelson was caused by the negligence of the defendants, or either of them; and this the court refused to do. To entitle the plaintiff to recover, it was requisite that the proof should establish some duty on the part of the defendants in respect to the person injured, and that the injury was occasioned by reason of the failure of the defendants to perform that duty. This principle is stated in Maenner v. Carroll, 46 Md. 212, as follows: "To constitute a good cause of action, in a case of this nature, there if it leaves it hanging upon an electric light company's pole it is liable for an injury to a traveler upon a sidewalk by contact with it after it has been removed by the employees of the electric light company and hung upon a telephone pole and becomes charged with electricity by contact with the electric light wire or electric railway wire. Ahern v. Oregon Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 24 Or. 276, 22 L. R. A. 635.

Negligence in leaving a telephone wire where it is touched accidentally by a traveler on a sidewalk is the proximate cause of an injury to him from an electric shock, although this was occasioned by the accidental contact of the telephone wire with the wires of an electric light company or of a street railway company,—at least where it does not appear that these were out of their proper position. Ibid.

So, a telegraph company is held to be liable for the acts of its employees in leaving wires hanging down in the street in contact with wires of an electric light company if a passenger on the street is injured by contact with them. Henning v. Western U. Teleg. Co. supra.

Where a messenger call wire owned by a telegraph company hung above an electric light wire supported on the same pole, and became rusted and rotten so that it broke and fell across the electric light wire charging it with a dangerous current of electricity, the telegraph company was held liable for injury to a boy who attempted to break off a piece of the broken wire hanging down between two poles. It was held to be a fair question for the jury to decide whether the company had failed in its duty to the public by allowing its wire to get into such a condition that it would easily should be stated a right on the part of the plaintiff, a duty on the part of the defendants in respect to that right, and a breach of that duty by the defendants whereby the plaintiff has suffered injury." Now, the deceased, at the time of the injury, was upon a public highway, at a spot where he had a right to be, and was going along it, to his home in a lawful and proper manner. The sidewalks of the streets in a city are for the use of all persons who have occasion to pass along them, and Nelson, while in the exercise of this unquestioned right, was entitled to be protected and safe from all injury on account of dangerous obstructions. On the other hand, both of the defendants were using the streets, under the permission of the state and municipal authorities, for purposes of private gain, by means of agencies such as could and would become dangerous to human life if not properly and carefully employed. The railway company pursued its business by means of cars propelled by electricity partially supplied through feed wires over and along the edge of the pavement. The telegraph company had its poles also along the curb line, and its wires, extending along the street, were over and along the feed wire, which, though insulated, carried a deadly current. The privileges, so granted thus to encumber the public highway with appliances so likely to become dangerous to the public safety, unless properly employed and controlled, imposed upon them, and each of them, the duty of so managing their affairs as not to injure persons lawfully on the streets. They owed it to Nelson that his lawful use of the street should be substantially as safe as it was before the telegraph and railway plants had so occupied it. It was their plain duty, not only to properly erect their plants, but to maintain them in such condition as not to endanger the public. It follows from this that if the property of the defendants was not in proper condition, and by reason thereof Nelson was injured, these facts alone, in the absence of other evidence to show that the defect originated without the fault of the companies, afford a prima facie presumption of negligence. In such a case the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur ("a simple question of common sense." Whittaker's Smith, Neg. 423) fairly applies. In the leading case of Kearney v. London, B. & S. C. R. Co. L. R. 5 Q. B. 411, Affirmed in the exchequer chamber (L. R. 6 Q. B. 759), and cited approvingly in Houser's Case, 80 Md. 148, 27 L. R. A. 154, Cockburn, Ch. J., said: "Where it is the duty of persons to do their best to keep premises, or a structure, of whatever kind it may be, in a proper condition, and we find it out of condition and an accident happens therefrom, it is incumbent upon them to show that they used that reasonable care and diligence which they were bound to use, and the absence of which it seems to me may fairly be presumed from the fact that there was the defect from which the accident has arisen." In Burne v. Boodle, 2 Hurlst. & C. 722, also cited in Houser's Case, the plaintiff, while walking in the street was injured by a barrel falling from an upper window of a warehouse belonging to the defendant, and on these facts alone it was held there was evidence of negligence to go to the jury. In Thomas v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 100 Mass. 156, where two horses driven along the highway became entangled in a telegraph wire, swinging across a public way at such a height as to obstruct and endanger ordinary travel, it was held these facts alone, unexplained and unaccounted for, were evidence of neglect on the part of the company, and should have been submitted to the jury.

Haynes v. Raleigh Gas Co. 114 N. C. 203, 26 L. R. A. 810; Uggle v. West End Street R. Co. 160 Mass. 353; 2 Thomp. Neg. 1220 et seq.; Thompson, Electricity, § 178; Southwestern Teleg. & Teleph. Co. v. Robinson, 1 C. C. A. 684, 50 Fed. Rep. 813, 16 L. R. A. 345, 2 U. S. App. 205; Stephens & C. Transp. Co. v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 8 Ben. 502, Fed. Cas. No. 13,371; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Euser, 2 Colo. 163; Blanchard v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 60 N. Y. 510; Wolfe v. Erie Teleg. & Teleph. Co. 38 Fed. Rep. 322.

Was there evidence before the jury, when these instructions were asked, from which they could find that the property of the defendants was out of proper condition at the time of the accident, and that by reason thereof Nelson was injured? There was evidence that the telephone wire had been hanging over the feed wire for at least two weeks; that in that position it was swayed by the wind, causing it to rub against the insulating material; that such rubbing for two weeks would cause a very serious damage to the insulation. No information had been given to the jury of any means by which the telephone wire was charged, otherwise than from the feed wire, and that could have been possibreak and in breaking would be likely to fall across the electric light wire and become dangerously charged. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Thorn, 64 Fed. Rep. 247.

b. Presumption of negligence as to broken or fallen wires.

"The construction and maintenance of electric lines in the highways being a matter wholly under the control and care of the parties building them, and the maintenance being wholly under the care of the parties owning them, the court usually holds that the fact of an electric wire falling or sagging into the street in such a way as to obstruct travel, and cause injury, is prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of the company.

The court, in Haynes v. Raleigh Gas Co. 114 N. C. 31 L. R. A.

203, 26 L. R. A. 810, says: "Proof that there was a live wire (carrying a deadly current) down in the highway surely raised a presumption that some one had failed in his duty to the public. When to this was added proof that this death-carrying wire was put above the street by the defendant and was its property and under the management and control of its servants, and that by contact with that wire the deceased, having a right to be on the street, was killed, a complete prima facie case of negligence was made out, and the burden was cast upon the defendant to show that this live wire was in the street through no fault of its servants and agents." This was a case where the guy wires of an electric light company had come in contact with a trolley wire and conveyed the electric current to a boy in the street.

ble only by a defect in the insulation. This was, assuredly, evidence tending to prove that the telephone wire was charged through the feed wire. Whether sufficient, or not, to establish it as a fact, was for the jury to determine. It was within the province of the defendants to rebut the plaintiff's case in any manner they were able, to show that the insulation was perfect, or, if that could not be done, that the defect was caused by circumstances over which they had no control; or that it existed for so short a time that they could not be reasonably expected to have been informed of it, and thereby have had an opportunity to mend it. To raise the presumption of negligence in this case however, it was not necessary for the plaintiff to negative all possible circumstances which could excuse the defendants. If the jury were informed of but one point where the telephone wire was in contact with a live wire, it would not be a wild speculation for them to infer—in view of all the circumstances, and in the absence of any evidence of contact elsewhere with the feed wire, or with other live wires—that that was the source from whence the electricity came, although it may have been a physical possibility that there might have been such contact with other wires further along the line. This the defendants might have shown, if they could, by way of defense; but, in the absence of all evidence on the point, the jury could infer, without violence, that the electrical charge was in fact obtained by contact of the telephone wire with the feed wire. We find no error in the rejection of the instructions set out in the third exception. We deem it unnecessary to refer particularly to the action of the court in granting or rejecting prayers in the case. What we have said is sufficient to dispose of them. We are of opinion the case was fairly put to the jury.

Finding no error in the rulings of the court, the judgment will be affirmed.

SOUTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

John S. MITCHELL, Respt.,

v.

1. An instruction that if a "cyclone that could not be anticipated or reasonably foreseen" was the cause of a wire charged with electricity falling, and defendant company was not negligent in allowing it to remain for an unreasonable time, it would not be liable; but if the accident was due to the wires being improperly erected or maintained, or to their being allowed to remain on the streets an unusually long time, the company would be liable,—is not misleading.
2. An instruction that no blame would attach to defendant from the falling of a wire charged with electricity, and its remaining on the ground in a public thoroughfare, unless it was allowed to remain there "after notice" for an unreasonable time, is properly refused.
3. An electric light company may be guilty of actionable negligence in failing to take proper steps to receive information concerning the condition of its wires, as well as in not repairing them within a reasonable time after receiving notice of their bad condition.

4. An instruction the substance of which is contained in an instruction given is properly refused.
5. The trial judge is not required to strike out from a request to charge a part which renders it defective and charge the remainder.
6. An explanation of a charge given without objection is not error where it does not lay down a different proposition of law from that contained in such instruction.

(September 17, 1895.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Common Pleas Circuit Court for Charleston County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion and in the charge of the court below, which was as follows:

"It is a matter of congratulation to you, as well as to those engaged in this case, that it is about to draw to a close. After the able argu-

A prima facie presumption of negligence on the part of the owners of the wires is also held to exist in WESTERN U. TELEGRAPH CO. v. STATE, NELSON, p. 572, where an injury was received from contact with a broken telephone wire hanging over and in contact with the feed wire of an electric railway.

An electric light wire hanging down in a public alley so as to injure public travelers is also held to be prima facie evidence of negligence upon the part of the company maintaining it, in DENVER CONSOL. ELECTRIC CO. v. SIMPSON.

So, it was held that a prima facie case of negligence on the part of a street railway company is also presented when a horse steps on a broken wire charged with electricity by contact with a trolley wire over which it hangs in the street. Larson v. Central R. Co. 56 Ill. App. 263.

But in opposition to the doctrine of the above cases a Pennsylvania common pleas court, in Hand v. Central Pennsylvania Teleph. & S. Co. (Pa. Com. Pl.) 1 Lack. L. News, 351, denies that a telephone company can be held liable for the breaking of its wire which thereby was heavily charged with electricity by contact with the wire of an electric railway, although the telephone wire was badly rusted, if it is not shown that it was originally faulty or had remained in place so long that the company ought to have known its defective condition and removed it. The court says: "It is said that inspection would have disclosed the defect, but this is more a matter of argument than of proof. Upon this also the plaintiff's case is barren of anything tangible. We are not informed in what manner or how often wires of this character should be examined, much ment made on the facts, I trust you will not be delayed in your deliberations in forming a conclusion. Before charging you on what I conceive to be the law of the case, it may be proper to state to you what are the material issues made by the pleadings. The complaint charges that on the 16th day of December last, about a year ago, while walking on one of the thoroughfares of the city of Charleston, the plaintiff came in contact with a wire erected by the defendant, and, by such contact, received injuries to the extent of $20,000. The defendant joins issue with him, both as to the amount of his injuries, and sets up the affirmative defense that he, the plaintiff, contributed to his own injury, if he sustained any, and that thereby the company was absolved. The defendant sets up the further defense that the injury complained of was due to no fault on the part of the company, but to an act of God, over which the company had no control, and could not reasonably anticipate. These are the issues of fact presented to you.

"I charge you, as matter of law, that a company of this kind, using a thoroughfare or public highway for the purpose of its business, is charged in law with great care, not only in erection of the wires, but in maintaining and keeping them in repair. They must be so kept and conducted that a citizen pursuing the ordinary vocations of life will not come in contact with them. It is the business of the company to so erect them as not to interfere with the safety of the citizens of the community while pursuing their vocations in the ordinary walks of life. The question for you is, Were these wires erected so as to anticipate any ordinary occurrence in the weather? Was it the act of God, or was it the careless or loose manner in which the wires were erected, which caused this wire to break? If it were the act of God,—that is, such an act that a business man of ordinary forethought and prudence could not anticipate,—then the company would not be liable under those circumstances. But, on the other hand, the company is charged with so placing their wires, and so keeping them in repair, as to withstand the ordinary weather,—rain, heat, cold, and wind. It is alleged on the part of the company that that wire was broken in consequence of a severe windstorm. Was it an ordinary windy day, such as is liable to occur at that time of the year, or was it one that could not be anticipated. The law does not require impossibilities. If a cyclone that could not be anticipated or reasonably foreseen, was the cause of that wire falling, and the company was not negligent in allowing it to remain there for an unreasonable length of time, then, under these circumstances it would not be liable. But if the accident was due to the wires being improperly erected, or improperly maintained in repair, or, having been properly erected, were broken, and allowed to remain on the streets an unusually long time, then, if the injury to the plaintiff occurred under those circumstances, the company would be liable to compensate him in damages. These are the general observations that I desire to call your attention to before passing upon the points of law that I have been requested to charge you. Before reading these requests, I desire to state to you what is negligence, in words you will readily understand. Negligence is the want of due care. That expresses it in a few words.

"The plaintiff requests me to charge you as follows: 'Negligence is the failure to do what a reasonable and prudent person would ordinarily have done under the circumstances of the situation, or doing what such a person, under existing circumstances, would not have done, the essence of the fault being either in the omission or commission.' That I charge you as law. '2d. If the jury believe that the defendant company was notified by telephone from Mr. Street's office that there was trouble with its wires, and failed to take immediate steps to investigate such trouble and rectify the same, if trouble existed, and if a sufficient time between the notice to the defendant of the trouble to its wires and the accident to the plaintiff, for its investigation and attention, had elapsed, and thereafter, by reason of the failure of the defendant to attend to its said wires, such wire or wires, charged with electricity, hung suspended over the scene of the accident, so as to become dangerous to passengers on the street, then the defendant would be guilty of negligence.' I charge you that which, in plain words, is that if the company was notified that its wires were down, and did not take steps, in a reasonable length of time, to repair them, it would be guilty of negligence, if an accident occurred, in not repairing its wires in a reasonable length of time. '3d. The degree of care which the law requires in order to guard against injury to others varies greatly according to the circumstances of the case, and if the jury believes that electricity was the power used by the defendant in its business, and is a highly less is it shown that such examination on the part of the company was wanting." This case is directly in conflict with the others above cited on this subject, and is clearly against the weight of authority on this particular point.

c. Liability of party breaking them.

By the plainest application of the general doctrines of law as to negligence, a party who breaks an electric wire causing it to drop into the street where it injures other persons must be held liable for the damages thus caused, if he was guilty of negligence either in breaking the wire or in failing to remove it or guard against injuries by it after it was broken. In two cases such liability has been sustained against a defendant who broke the wires but did not own them.

Thus, the breaking of a telephone wire by a trolley pole which flew up and struck it as by accident it got off the trolley wire, and leaving it down, where it fell across a trolley wire until a horse stepped upon it and was killed, was found by the jury to be due to negligence of the electric railway company, and its liability was not prevented by the fact that the city or the telephone company may have been negligent in leaving the telephone wire suspended in the manner it was, and that the railway company had no right to remove it. Kankakee Electric R. Co. v. Whittemore, 45 Ill. App. 484. So, where a trolley pole slipped off the trolley wire, flew up and broke a suspension wire so that it fell across a trolley wire and was charged with electricity by contact with it, only three or four minutes before it was stepped on by a horse, which dangerous agency to life, unless exercised with constant and extreme care, then, to such extent, a high degree of care, in its supervision, management, and use, is required of defendant, and a failure on its part to exercise such high degree of care would be negligence.' That, I charge you, is a good proposition of law. '4th. If the jury believe that the defendant was negligent, according to the definitions given above, and that in consequence of such negligence the plaintiff accidentally came in contact with wires charged with electricity, operated and controlled by defendant, and was injured thereby, then the plaintiff would be entitled to recover.' That I charge you to be the law. The 5th and 6th requests I refuse to charge as having no application to this case. '7th. When one is placed by the negligence of another in a situation of peril, his attempt to escape danger, even by doing an act which is in itself dangerous, and from which injury results, is not contributory negligence, such as will prevent him from recovering.' That I charge you as law. If a man is in danger, and in order to avoid that danger, bona fide, does something which is dangerous, that would not be considered, in law, contributory negligence. No issue involving the 8th proposition is made in the pleadings nor in the evidence, and is hence refused. '10th. If the jury find that the defendant is liable, then they should give the plaintiff such damages as he has proved in this case, not exceeding $20,000; and, in estimating such damages, they must take into consideration the permanent injury to the plaintiff, the shock to his system, his pain and anguish, and a fair recompense for loss of what he might otherwise have earned, and has been deprived of the capacity for earning by the wrongful act of the defendant.' That, I charge you, is to be the rule in estimating damages, if you find that the defendant was negligent, and the plaintiff did not contribute to his injury. You may give him a reasonable amount of compensation for his pain and anguish, and you may take into consideration what he might have earned, and has been deprived of earning by reason of the accident, in estimating your damages. '11th. An injury is said to be caused by an act of God when it results immediately from a natural cause, without the intervention of man, and could not have been prevented by the exercise of prudence, diligence, and care by the party charged with liability by reason of his negligence in permitting said injury to occur; and a defendant so charged with liability, if he invokes the act of God as a defense, has the burden of proof upon him to show, not only that the act of God was the cause, but that it was the entire cause, of the injury, because it is only when the act of God is the entire cause of the injury, and said injury could not have been prevented by the exercise of prudence, diligence, and care by the defendant, that the said defendant can be shielded.' I charge you that, as I have already explained to you. For instance, the law would require the company to guard against ordinary windstorms when it erects an electric wire in a public thoroughfare.

"The defendant requests me to charge you certain propositions of law, and it may appear to you paradoxical that I charge the law on both sides. I put to you a hypothetical case. If you find a certain state of facts to exist, then the law which I give you follows from those facts. The defendant's requests are as follows: '1st. The law does not require impossibilities of any person, natural or artificial, nor does it require that the defendant should have ready for service at every moment, and at every point of exposure, an adequate force to overcome a sudden fracture of wire, or any other like casualty, in the shortest possible time. All that it can be required to do in this connection is to maintain an efficient system of oversight, and to be prepared with competent and sufficient force, ready to furnish, within a reasonable time, a proper remedy for all such casualties, defects, and accidents as, from experience, there was any reasonable ground to anticipate might occur.' That I charge you to be law. '2d. I refuse this request for reasons assigned upon the margin. ['Refused for the reason that there is no legal obligation on plaintiff to show notice to defendant that the wire was down.'] '3d. Upon that request I charge you as follows: 'That the defendant was entitled to a reasonable time, after the fall of the wire, to repair it, or to remove it out of the way of persons using the street; and if the jury find that the injury to the plaintiff occurred before the expiration of such reasonable time, then the plaintiff is not entitled to recover anything in this action.' If they removed or repaired the wire in a reasonable time, and were not negligent in allowing it to lie upon the streets, then they would not be liable, because want of due care would not be established. '4th. If the jury find that between the time when the defendant received notice of the breaking of the wire, and the time at was killed in consequence, and the street car conductor was not aware of the accident until a bystander told him that his trolley pole was off the wire, when he replaced it and moved on without examining to see whether any damages had been done by it, it was held that the street railway company was liable for the damages. Larson v. Central R. Co. 56 Ill. App. 233.

d. Negligent delay in removing or repairing them.

It is clear that although the maintenance of lines is wholly in the care of the electric company owning it, yet its supervision cannot be constant on all parts of the line, and that while most fallen or sagging wires show that the construction or repair of the line was not properly cared for by the company, yet in some cases, as where wires are loosened or thrown down by high storms, or other natural causes, the company is not to blame for its mere falling or sagging, but only for allowing it to remain in the highways an unreasonable time afterwards. Therefore the presumption of negligence raised by a fallen or sagging wire may be rebutted by showing that the falling was not caused by any faulty construction or lack of repair, and also that the falling or sagging took place so brief a time before the accident that the company could not with reasonable diligence, have discovered the imperfection.

The failure of an electric light company to take proper steps to receive information concerning the condition of its wires as well as its failure to repair them within a reasonable time after receiving notice of their bad condition was held to be negliwhich the plaintiff came in contact therewith, there was not reasonable time in which the defendant could have repaired the wire, or could have removed it out of the way of persons using the streets, then their verdict must be in favor of the defendant.' That I charge you to be the law. 5th. I have refused this proposition for reasons assigned. ['Refused for the reason that the evidence showed that the defendant did not know, nor had any means of knowing, that the wire was charged with electricity. It was not the contact with the wire that caused the injury, but the electricity, which was a hidden force.'] 6th. If the jury find that a want of ordinary care on the part of the plaintiff in any degree contributed to the injury, then the plaintiff cannot recover in this action.' That I charge you to be the law. 7th. If the jury find that the wire was broken by some object, such as a slate or tile, hurled upon it by a storm, the wire being in good condition, the break would be attributable to the act of God.' I charge you that it would be the duty of the defendant to use precautionary measures not to allow the wire to remain on the streets after it was broken; and if it remained there longer than a reasonable time, and could have been removed sooner, by a due exercise of care, then that was negligence, and the defendant would be responsible. If you find for the plaintiff, you will say, 'We find for the plaintiff' so many dollars and cents; writing it out in words. If you find for the defendant, simply say, 'We find for the defendant,' and sign your name as foreman."

The words written on the margin of defendant's 2d and 5th requests to charge were not repeated by the judge to the jury on the trial of the case.

Messrs. Ficken & Hughes for appellant.

Gary, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant is a corporation engaged in generating and furnishing electricity in the city of Charleston, S. C., for the purpose of illumination and motive power. On the 16th of December, 1893, during the prevalence of a violent windstorm, one of the electric wires of the defendant, fully charged with electricity, broke, and the two severed ends rested on the ground in one of the thoroughfares of the city.

gence in MITCHELL v. CHARLESTON LIGHT & P. Co., p. 577.

A similar question as to delay in removing dangerous wires which have fallen arises in respect to the duty of a company which does not own them, but which owns other wires across which they have fallen; as to these, see the cases referred to infra, V.

The question whether or not an electric light company should have discovered and removed a broken electric light wire before an accident at six o'clock in the morning after the wire had been broken by a storm during the night was held, in Cook v. Wilmington City Electric Co. 9 Houst. (Del.) 306, to be one of the questions for the jury to determine.

Where an electric wire was broken during a very severe storm about midnight, which threw down the lines of the company in many places and frightened the employees of the company in the power station by its effect on the machinery, it was held that it was a question for the jury to say whether an accident which happened about 6 o'clock in the morning of the same day, caused by one of the fallen wires, was or was not so immediately consequent upon the time of falling that the company could not, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, have prevented the accident. Texarkana Gas & E. L. Co. v. Orr, 59 Ark. 215.

The evidence showed in this case that the employees at the power-house had made tests which showed a ground along the lines somewhere, and

The defendant's testimony tended to show that the wire broke about 2 o'clock, while the testimony of the plaintiff tended to show that it broke at an earlier hour in the day, and that between 12 and 1 o'clock on the day of the accident the defendant was notified that there was some trouble with its wires, and that they were dangerous. At about 8 o'clock p. m. the plaintiff, while passing through this thoroughfare, was injured by the fallen wire. He was instantly shocked, upon coming in contact with it, and fell to the earth unconscious. For some time thereafter he was confined to his bed, during which period he suffered greatly. His hand was badly burned, and he lost the use of two fingers. This action was instituted to recover damages for such injuries. The plaintiff charged negligence on the part of the defendant, in that it permitted its wires charged with electricity to hang suspended over a thoroughfare of the city, so as to become dangerous to passers on the street, and that the plaintiff, a passenger, in consequence thereof, was seriously injured by the said wire charged with electricity, and was damaged to the extent of $20,000. The defendant joined issue on these allegations, and set up the defense of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff; also, set up the further defense that the injury resulted from the act of God. The jury found a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $10,000. The defendant moved for a new trial before his honor, Judge Gary, who granted an order for a new trial unless the plaintiff would remit $2,500 of the verdict, which the plaintiff did. The charge of the presiding judge will be set out in the report of the case.

The appellant's 1st exception is as follows: "(1) That the presiding judge erred in charging the jury as follows: 'If a cyclone that could not be anticipated or reasonably foreseen was the cause of that wire falling, and the company was not negligent in allowing it to remain there for an unreasonable length of time, then, under those circumstances, it would not be liable.'" It is not contended that the detached portion of the charge, in itself, states an erroneous principle of law, but that it is misleading, inasmuch as the jury might have inferred that if a cyclone which might have been anticipated, or reasonably foreseen, was the cause of the wire falling, and the company was not negligent in allowing it to remain there for an unreasonable length of time, still, under those circumstances, it would be liable. The appellant also contends "that the presiding judge, in confining his declaration to the effect of the class of storms commonly designated as 'cyclone,' rejected the proposition that any other class of storm, or that a storm of not quite the same degree of violence as a cyclone, would operate to relieve the defendant from liability, were it in other respects free from negligence." Under the numerous decisions of this court the principle is well established that the charge of the circuit judge to the jury must be considered as a whole. When an exception is taken to a certain portion of the presiding judge's charge to the jury, it is the duty of this court, in considering the exception, to look to the entire charge, to ascertain whether or not the detached portion of the charge correctly states the views of the law which the presiding judge intended to convey to the jury. In his charge to the jury touching this question, his honor said: "The question for you is, Were these wires erected so as to anticipate any ordinary occurrence in the weather? Was it the act of God, or was it the careless or loose manner in which the wires were erected, which caused this wire to break? If it were the act of God,—that is, such an act as a business man of ordinary forethought and prudence could not anticipate,—then the company would not be liable, under those circumstances. But, on the other hand, the company is charged with so placing their wires, and so keeping them in repair, as to withstand the ordinary weather,—rain, heat, cold, and wind. It is alleged on the part of the company that the wire was broken in consequence of a severe storm. Was it an ordinary windy day, such as is liable to occur at that time of the year, or was it one that could not be anticipated? The law does not require impossibilities. If a cyclone that could not be anticipated, or reasonably foreseen, was the cause of that wire falling, and the company was not negligent in allowing it to remain there for an unreasonable time, then under those circumstances, it would not be liable. But if the accident was one due to the wires being improperly erected, or improperly maintained in repair, or, having been properly erected, were broken, and allowed to remain on the streets an unusually long time, then, if the injury to the plaintiff occurred under those circumstances, the company would be liable to compensate him in damages. These are the general observations that I desire to call to your attention before passing upon the points of law I have been requested to charge you."

had not followed up these tests by examination of the lines to find where the ground was during the four hours which elapsed between their finding out about the ground and the happening of the accident.

e. Municipal Liability.

The liability of a municipality for the unsafe condition of its streets because of dangerous electric wires which have fallen into them seems to be governed by the same principles that govern its liability for the unsafe condition of a street on account of other wires or obstructions of any kind, except when the municipality is itself the owner of the dangerous wires.

In Bourget v. Cambridge, 156 Mass. 393, 16 L. R. A. 606, a city was held liable to a traveler who was injured by an electric shock from a loose telephone 31 L. R. A.

wire hanging in a street so low as to endanger travelers. The opinion says nothing about the ownership of the wire, and it may be presumed that the city did not own it.

Likewise, in Graham v. Boston, 156 Mass. 75, the city was held liable for injuries to children by an electric shock from a wire hanging in a street, and nothing is said about the ownership of the wire, but the case turns chiefly on the right of the children injured to be regarded as travelers. It is held that although they were playing tag as they went along, returning to their homes from a place at a considerable distance therefrom, they had the rights of travelers, especially as the one first touching the wire was walking straight ahead when he came in contact with it and the others received shocks in attempting to assist him.

When that portion of the charge set out in the exception is considered in connection with the entire charge on the question, we see no ground for sustaining the objection to it that it might have misled the jury. We come next to a consideration of the appellant's second objection to the language of the presiding judge contained in the 1st exception. The presiding judge used the word "cyclone," in his charge to the jury, because the witnesses had testified that the day when the injury as sustained was cyclonic. The charge was therefore based upon the testimony and applicable to this case. When the charge was considered in its entirety, we do not see how it can be construed as announcing the proposition of law that, if the defendant was free from negligence, it would still be liable, if the falling of a wire was caused by a class of storm other than a cyclone, or by a storm of not quite the same degree of violence as a cyclone. The 1st exception is overruled.

The 2d exception is as follows: "(2) That the presiding judge erred in refusing to charge the defendant's second request to charge, viz., that 'if the jury find that the wire in question was broken by a storm, or from some cause beyond the control of the defendant, then no blame can attach to the defendant from the fact that the wire fell, and remained lying on the ground in a public thoroughfare, unless it was allowed to remain there, after notice, for an unreasonable length of time; that is, for a period of time longer than would furnish a reasonable opportunity for the removal of the wire.'" The words "after notice" rendered the proposition of law therein stated unsound, for the reason that the negligence of the defendant might have consisted in its failure to know the facts connected with the breaking of the wire. In other words, the defendant might have been negligently ignorant. District of Columbia v. Woodbury, 130 U. S. 463, 34 L. ed. 477; Branch v. Port Royal & W. C. R. Co. 35 S. C. 405. It was not the duty of the circuit judge to strike out that part of the request to charge which rendered it defective, and then charge so much thereof as embodied a sound proposition of law. Gunter v. Graniterille Mfg. Co. 15 S. S. 443, and numerous other cases in this state. The second exception is overruled.

The 3d exception is as follows: "(3) That the presiding judge erred in refusing to charge, and in striking out from the defendant's 3d request to charge, the words 'being informed of,' where they occur in said request, immediately following the words 'a reasonable time after.'" The 3d request to charge is as follows: "That the defendant was entitled to a reasonable time after [being informed of] the fall of the wire, in which to repair it, or to remove it out of the way of persons using the streets; and, if the jury find that the injury to the plaintiff occurred before the expiration of such reasonable time, then the plaintiff is not entitled to recover anything in this action." This exception cannot be sustained. The jury might have found that the injury to the plaintiff occurred before the expiration of a reasonable time after the defendant was informed of the fall of the wire; yet this would not necessarily have precluded the plaintiff from recovering damages, because the negligence of the defendant might have consisted in failing to take proper steps to receive the information concerning the condition of its wires. Under this request to charge, if the defendant was not informed of the wire until a week or a month thereafter, it would still have been entitled to a reasonable time to remove the obstruction, after such notice, although it might have been negligently ignorant. The defendant was bound to exercise due diligence to receive information as to the condition of its wires, and its failure to use proper diligence in this respect would constitute negligence. The 3d exception is overruled.

The 4th exception is as follows: "(4) That the presiding judge erred in refusing to charge the defendant's 5th request to charge, viz., that 'if the jury find that the plaintiff was injured by coming in contact with defendant's wire, and that by the exercise of ordinary care he could have avoided such contact, then the plaintiff is not entitled to recover anything in this action.'" It would have been error on the part of the circuit judge to refuse this request, were it not for the fact that he, in substance, charged the proposition of law therein contained in another part of this charge to the jury, to wit, in charging the defendant's 6th request to charge, which is as follows: "If the jury find that a want of ordinary care on the part of the plaintiff in any degree contributed to the injury, then the plaintiff cannot recover in this action." Whether or not the plaintiff had knowledge that the wire was filled with electricity, was a fact to be considered by the jury in determining the question of negligence on the part of the plaintiff in coming in contact with the wire, but the failure to make mention of the electricity in the request to charge did

V. Failure to guard wires from falling wires of other owners.

There is little room for dispute that the owner of a wire is liable for an injury caused by its breaking and falling into the street, if the owner was negligent in respect to its maintenance; but the liability of the owner of other wires bearing a high current of electricity across which such broken wire falls and becomes charged with a dangerous current is more debatable. This question seems to turn on the further question whether or not the owner of such unbroken wires was guilty of negligence in failing to prevent other wires from coming in contact with them. In several cases this has been held to be negligence, and the railroad company held liable for an accident caused by broken telephone or telegraph wires falling across the unbroken wires of the railway company. A strong illustration of this is CITY ELECTRIC STREET R. CO. v. CONKRY, p. 570.

In that case a broken telephone wire had for two days been hanging suspended, and for some days before that after it was broken had been tied to a post, and an electric railroad company, on the verdict of a jury, was held negligent and liable for the injury, where a boy was injured by the telephone wire, which conveyed electricity to him from the trolley wire.

If a telephone wire broken down by storm is allowed by an electric railway company to remain across its trolley wire charged with a dangerous current therefrom after it should have discovered and removed it, it will be liable for the accident if not render the proposition of law therein stated unsound. For the reason that this request was substantially presented to the jury, the 4th exception is overruled.

The 5th exception is as follows: "That the presiding judge erred in commenting upon the plaintiff's 7th request to charge, and explaining the same, as follows: 'If a man is in danger, and in order to avoid that danger, bona fide, does something which is dangerous, that would not be considered, in law, contributory negligence.'" These words are to be construed in connection with the 7th request to charge, which is as follows: "When one is placed by the negligence of another in a situation of terror, his attempt to escape danger, even by doing an act which is in itself dangerous, and from which injury results, is not contributory negligence, such as will prevent him from recovering." It will be observed that the exception does not question the correctness of the law as charged in the 7th request, but only complains of error on the part of the presiding judge in using the foregoing words after charging said request. When the words used by the circuit judge are considered in connection with the 7th request, it will be seen that they do not lay down a different proposition of law from that contained in said request, and that they are simply explanatory of said request. Even if considered alone, these words do not state an erroneous principle of law, although, in themselves, they are not as comprehensive as might have been desired.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

Frank HUBER, Respt.,

v.

LA CROSSE CITY RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.

(.....Wis.....)

1. Reasonable care and caution in the use of an electric current by a street railway company is required for the safety of the employees of an electric light company which was engaged by the railway company to move electric lamps during the operation of the railway.
2. Negligence is the proximate cause of an accident only when under all the circumstances the accident might have been reasonably foreseen by a man of ordinary intelligence and prudence. It is not enough that the accident is the natural consequence of the negligence.
3. The coiling of a trolley wire over a span wire pending the continuation of the line, thereby charging the span wire with electricity, is not negligence which will render the street railway company liable to an experienced workman familiar with such wires and their insulation who is injured by contact with the span wire while standing on a wooden pole moving electric lamps, where the span wire had circuit breaks to prevent its charging the iron post which sustained it, and injury from it could be sustained only by one who completed the circuit between it and the iron post by touching them both at the same time.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for La Crosse County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for injuries caused by contact with electric wires alleged to have been negligently left unprotected by defendant. Reversed.

Statement by Pinney, J.:

An action to recover damages sustained by the plaintiff by reason of alleged negligence of the defendant. The complaint charges that at the time of the injury the plaintiff was an employee of the Brush Electric Light Company, which maintained, at the northwest corner of the intersection of Main and Fourth streets, in La Crosse, a wooden pole, to support one end of a wire stretching across the intersection of the streets from northwest to southeast, from the center of which an electric street lamp was suspended, and, to the knowledge of the defendant, the employees of the light company were obliged to and did climb said wooden pole to attend to such street lamp; that the defendant erected an iron post or pole close to and adjoining such wooden pole, and to which one end of a span of wire was attached, which supported its trolley wire in and over the center of Fourth street, and such span wire was so near to the wooden pole as to be dangerous to employees of the light company while climbing it, unless it was properly insulated and free from the electric current in a horse is killed by stepping upon it. Godfrey v. Streator R. Co. 56 Ill. App. 378.

In this case the accident happened in the morning about half past eight o'clock when there had been a heavy storm of wind and sleet the night before. The court held that the street railway company knew, or should have known, that the wire was down in time to have removed it and prevented accidents, and that in an action against it it was error to direct a verdict for the defendant.

Similar to the above case, except that the electric railway company was also in fault for breaking the wire which fell across its trolley wire and caused the death of a horse which stepped upon it, are the cases of Larson v. Central R. Co. 56 Ill. App. 263, and Kaukaee Electric R. Co. v. Whittemore, 45 31 L. R. A.

Ill. App. 484, which are more fully described, supra, IV. c.

The cases are not altogether harmonious in respect to the duty of the owner of electric wires to place guard wires above them to guard against the falling upon them of other wires which may conduct a dangerous current from them to persons in the streets. The question is clearly one as to negligence. In the cases above the negligence was, in part at least, in allowing broken telephone wires or other wires to lie across a trolley wire when the fact was known or ought to have been known. But several cases have touched upon the duty to have guard wires or other precautions to keep overhanging telephone or other wires from striking the trolley wire if they fall or sag.

The duty of an electric railway company to have the trolley; that the defendant negligently allowed said span wire to become charged with a powerful current from the trolley wire, which it supported, and the plaintiff, a lineman of the light company, while climbing the wooden pole, without fault on his part, came in contact with said span wire and said iron pole, so as to form a circuit, and he received a shock which caused him to fall a distance of about 20 feet, to the ground, whereby he was seriously injured; that, at the time, said light company, by its agents and employees, of whom the plaintiff was one, was engaged, at the request of the defendant, the railway company, in removing the said lamp from its position. The acts of negligence relied on were: (1) The erection of said iron pole in such close proximity to the pole of the light company as to render the climbing of the latter dangerous, unless the defendant's span wire was properly insulated from the trolley; (2) in operating a portion of its railway before it was fully completed, with the span wire in question uninsulated, and charged with a heavy current that escaped from the trolley wire. The answer denied the negligence charged, and averred that the defendant, at the time, had constructed and maintained its posts, trolley wires, and other appliances in accordance with the city ordinance; that at the time the light company, by the plaintiff as its employee and by its superintendent, was engaged in carrying out a contract between it and the defendant for the removal of its wires, lamps, etc., where they interfered with the erection of the defendant's line, and that, while so engaged, the plaintiff carelessly came in contact and connection with said span wire at a point beyond which it was insulated, and received the alleged shock; that he well knew the point at which the span wire was insulated, and the consequences of making a connection with the same, and that he was guilty of contributory negligence. The defendant moved for a nonsuit, at the close of the plaintiff's case, which was denied, and at the close of the evidence requested the court to direct a verdict for the defendant, which the court refused. The plaintiff had a verdict and judgment, from which the defendant appealed.

The evidence was that the trolley wire and span wire and the street lamp and poles were situated as stated in the complaint,—the wooden pole of the light company being about 30 feet high and 10 feet higher than the iron pole, and had a return wire from the lamp to the pole passing down it, to a ratchet near the bottom, so that the lamp could be raised and lowered to renew the carbons without climbing the pole, but to remove anything that got on the wires they would have to climb the pole; and at many street intersections in the line of the defendant's trolley, the light company maintained street lamps in a similar way, the position of which had to be changed when the defendant built its line, but at the defendant's cost. Accordingly, the defendant entered into a contract with the light company to make such changes or removals, and it entered upon the work thereof, the defendant not interfering with or taking any part in it. The defendant had constructed its line south on Fourth street to Main street, which runs east and west, and it was intended that its line should turn upon Main street in both directions. The method of construction was that iron poles or posts were erected opposite each other on both sides of the street at intervals. Wires called "span wires," cross the street at the top of these poles and support the main or trolley wire, which is attached to them by a "bell hanger" or "bell insulator," which, when properly constructed, and in good condition, will prevent any escape of the trolley current to the span wire; and, as an additional precaution, where the poles are iron, as in this case, and to guard against any possible leakage or defect in the "bell insulator," there was placed in the span wire, and between the trolley and each iron pole or post, about 16 or 18 inches from the post, a "circuit break," so that any current that escaped from the bell insulator would be arrested and would not reach the iron post. The evidence was that these appliances used by the defendant were of the best kind, and in good order, and tended to show that the construction and management of the defendant's line was under the control of a competent electrical engineer. The wooden pole of the light company, in question, was crooked, inclining towards the east and south, and its base was 7 or 8 inches east, and a little south, of the defendant's iron pole or post. About 10 feet from the ground, by reason of the crook in the wooden pole, the two were in contact, and by reason of the inclination of the wooden pole to the south and east, there was an interval, from the point between them, gradually increasing to about 8 inches at the top of the iron post, and opposite the span wire,—the iron post being west and a little north of the wooden pole. The span wire, guard wires between its trolley wire and a telephone wire which it knew to be unsound that hung above the trolley wire is declared in United Electric R. Co. v. Shelton, 89 Tenn. 423, but in this case the court seems to base the duty upon the fact that the telephone wire was known to be unsound and liable to break and fall, and it does not declare any general rule as to the duty to maintain guard wires.

This case was followed by MCKAY v. SOUTHERN BELL TELEPH. & TELEG. CO., p. 589, holding both telephone company and trolley company jointly liable for negligence, where an insecure telephone wire was allowed to hang over a trolley wire without any guard wires between. It was alleged in this case that the mayor had made a lawfully authorized order or direction requiring the trolley company to maintain such guard wires and the telephone company attempted to escape liability by claiming that the injury was caused by the trolley company's failure to obey this order, but the court held that such negligence on the part of the trolley company would not excuse the negligence of the telephone company and that both companies were liable.

In Block v. Milwaukee Street R. Co., 89 Wis. 371, 27 L. R. A. 385, it was held that lack of guard wires between trolley wires and telephone wires will render a trolley company liable for injury to a person in a street by contact with a broken telephone wire which lies across the trolley wire, provided that the omission of the guard wires was negligent and was also the proximate cause of the injury.

running east from the top of the iron post, passed on the north side of the wooden pole, and about 8 or 4 inches distant. The west end of the circuit break in the span wire was $7\frac{1}{2}$ inches to the east of the wooden pole, and the end of the span wire east of the circuit break was $13\frac{1}{2}$ inches from the wooden pole, and the pole could be climbed from the south or east side without coming in contact with the span wire. A person climbing the wooden pole on the north side would have to pass over the span wire, and would usually come in contact with it in some way, but only with the portion of it between the iron post and the circuit break, which was dead or uncharged; but, in case of defect in both bell insulator and circuit break, should it be charged or "live," the person coming in contact with it, while adhering to the nonconducting wooden pole, would be safe, unless he at the same time came in contact with the iron post. The bell insulator and circuit break were in good order, and the span wire between the circuit break and the iron post which passed on the north side of the wooden pole was "dead." When the defendant company had reached the point in question with the construction of its line, its trolley wire was attached to this span wire by the bell insulator over the center of Fourth street and on the north side of Main street, and quite a length of the trolley wire, intended to be used in curving on to Main street to the west, remained projecting south of the span wire, and was coiled up as far back as the bell insulator, and laid around and over the bell insulator, and upon the span wire and trolley wire to the north, so that, while the defendant operated its line so far as constructed, as it did continuously from August 8 to August 19, when the accident occurred, this span wire became and was charged with the trolley current up towards said posts or poles as far as the circuit break. This coil of the trolley wire was bright new copper $\frac{1}{2}$ inch wire, about 4 feet in diameter, projecting 2 feet over on the span wire on each side, not more than 22 feet from the poles or posts, and in plain sight, and there was nothing to indicate that it was insulated from the span wire on which it rested. A person climbing the wooden pole of the light company could be injured by the current in the span wire in but one way, namely by touching the span wire east of the circuit break, and at the same time, touching the iron post in the opposite direction to the west, so as to form a circuit with his body between the iron post and the live span wire beyond the circuit break. After the defendant's wires had been put up the street lamp of the light company could not be lowered, because it would come in contact, and might cause an accident, and it was necessary to put the light away from the defendant's wires. At the time of the accident, McMillan, the superintendent of the light company, with nine years' experience as an electrician, and fully acquainted with the subject of insulation, with the plaintiff, undertook to make the necessary change in removing and changing the position of the street lamp. The plaintiff had done nearly all this work up to this time. He had had about five years' experience in attending to lamps, repairing, setting poles and other work, and had worked about a month in changing the lamps of the light company. He understood the method of construction and insulation of the defendant's lines, and the subject of insulation generally, had noticed both bell insulators and circuit breaks, and knew how they were attached and what they were for, and had examined the manner of insulating the defendant's span wires. By direction of McMillan the plaintiff climbed the wooden pole on the north side, over and above the span wire and iron post, nearly to the top of the wooden post, drew the lamp in from the center of the street, and let it down to McMillan, and came down the pole on the north side, climbing over the span wire again. McMillan then climbed the wooden pole on the east side, passed the span wire, and prepared to hang the lamp at the side of the wooden pole. Having occasion to let fall a piece of the lamp wire twisted into a spiral form or coil, he dropped it, intending to let it go down on the south side of defendant's span wire; but, for want of careful management, it caught the span wire at a point $3\frac{1}{2}$ or 4 feet east of the wooden post, and beyond the circuit break, so that from his position he was unable to get it off. He therefore directed the plaintiff to climb the pole again, and to take this coil off the span wire. The plaintiff climbed upon the north side of the wooden pole, as before, until his feet were about 17 feet above the ground, and his head was higher than the top of the iron pole. He testified: "I stood on my left spur, reached out, lifted this wire (an insulated one) off, and dropped it down, and came back to the pole, somewhere near, with the intention of getting in position, and I got caught. I supposed the span wire was a dead wire. I

But whether or not the omission of guard wires between trolley wires and telephone wires in a street is negligent is held in this case to be a question for the jury, and so is the further question whether or not the want of the guard wires is the proximate cause of a shock to a traveler from contact with a broken telephone wire which had fallen across the trolley wire.

But, on the other hand, the liability of an electric railway company for the killing of horses which stepped upon a telephone or telegraph wire which had broken and fallen across its trolley wire is denied in Albany v. Watervliet Turnp. & R. Co. 76 Hun, 136, although the wire which broke was suspended above the trolley wire without any guard wires between. The court held that it did not make any case for the jury, and said: "I find 31 L. R. A.

no evidence that such guard wires are either necessary or usual in the construction of single trolley lines for propelling street cars." It was held that the proximate cause of the injury was the falling of the telegraph or telephone wire, and that for this the railroad company was not responsible.

The duty of an electric railway company to use reasonable care and prudence to adopt all ordinary and usual appliances and methods to prevent contact between its trolley and feed wires and the wires of a telephone company stretched along or across the same highway is enforced in Central Pennsylvania Teleph. & S. Co. v. Wilkes-Barre & W. S. R. Co. 11 Pa. Co. Ct. 417, by an injunction against operating the railway until necessary precautions in this regard had been taken. It being conceded by the railway company that actual con-don't know how I made the connection by which the current went through me. I did not put my other hand on the wire. There was a burn across three fingers on the back of the right hand. The left arm or wrist was burned on the inner portion. I had not noticed the coil of trolley wire that lay coiled, in part upon the span wire and in part upon the trolley. I did not see it at all. I don't remember that I had ever been at this place while the defendant was operating its line." Both the plaintiff and McMillan knew that the trolley was in operation, and cars had been running to that point for eight days. The plaintiff testified that "if I had seen this coil of trolley wire lying upon the span wire at that point, I probably would have known and understood that the current of electricity would have been conveyed to the span wire up to the circuit break; but I don't know. . . . In order to form a circuit my bare person had to come in contact both with the iron post and the span wire. Was wearing woolen clothes. Woolen clothes against the iron post would not form a circuit, if it was dry. Clothing was dry, and the iron post too." That he lifted the wire off the span wire with his left hand, having, at the time, his right arm around the wooden pole. That he did not then take hold of the span wire or touch it with his left hand. "I got my left hand back somewhere near the pole. Can't tell you whether I was leaning against the span wire. Don't remember whether I touched the span wire or not."

Messrs. Losey & Woodward and E. C. Higbee, for appellant:

In order to render a negligent act the proximate cause of an injury it must appear "that the injury was the natural and probable consequence of the negligence or wrongful act, and that it ought to have been foreseen in the light of the attending circumstances."

Messrs. Fruit & Brindley, for respondent:

It is not necessary that injury in the precise form in which it in fact resulted should have been foreseen. It is enough that it now appears to have been a natural and probable consequence.

Appellant owed the exercise of reasonable care to the employees of the Brush Electric Light Company.

tact could in most instances be prevented by guard wires, the injunction was continued until the guard wires were put up. At the same time the court held that if the danger of contact between the wires could be obviated by insulation of the telephone wires or by stretching them on higher poles, and could not be obviated by the exercise or reasonable care and prudence in constructing the railway, the telephone company would have the duty to change the construction of its line, although it was first in the occupancy of the street. The relative rights of telephone companies and electric railway companies in a highway are not considered in this note, but are left for future annotation.

VI. Concurrent liability.

It is clear that there may exist a concurrent liability of different owners of electric wires for an injury caused by their contact to a person who touches one of them, provided both have been guilty of negligence toward the person injured. 31 L. R. A.

As to the owner of the wire which is not touched by the person injured, but from which the electricity is conveyed by another wire which has fallen upon it, the question is substantially that involved in the preceding division. That liability in such a case may exist seems clear. The question is as to negligence in each particular case. In several cases the existence of such negligence has been found, and both held liable for the accident.

Thus, in CITY ELECTRIC STREET R. Co. v. CONERY, p. 570, the jury found the owners of both wires guilty of negligence—the owner of a telephone wire in permitting that to fall and remain down, and the owner of a trolley wire in allowing the telephone wire to become charged with electricity by contact with the trolley wire. The court says: "If this be true, the injury was the result of the concurring negligence of the two parties, and would not have occurred in the absence of either. In that case the negligence of the two

Pinney, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. The plaintiff was engaged as a servant of the light company, and using its poles and appliances under the direction of its superintendent, performing an engagement that company had entered into with the defendant company to change the location and method of hanging the electric street lamps so that their use and management would not interfere with or embarrass the use and operation of the defendant's electric railway, for a consideration to be paid by the defendant. Under the circumstances, the defendant was bound to the exercise of reasonable care and caution in the management and control of its railway, and of the electric current which was its motive power, so as not to injure the employees of the light company while engaged in such work. It was bound to avoid acts the natural and probable consequences of which might be to inflict injury on persons thus employed, and, if it omitted such precautions as were reasonably necessary, under the circumstances, it would be liable for such damages as any one thus engaged might suffer, being the proximate result of such neglect of duty. The rule was stated by Brett, M. R., in Heaven v. Pender, L. R. 11 Q. B. Div. 503, 509, "that, whenever one person is by circumstances placed in such a position with regard to another that every one of ordinary sense who did think would at once recognize that if he did not use ordinary care and skill in his own conduct with regard to those circumstances he would cause danger of injury to the person or property of the other, a duty arises to use ordinary care and skill to avoid such danger." This principle was referred to in Zieman v. Kieckhefer Elevator Mfg. Co. 90 Wis. 503, in Bright v. Barnett & R. Co. 88 Wis. 307, 21 L. R. A. 524, and in Thomas v. Winchester, 6 N. Y. 397, 57 Am. Dec. 455. In Heaven v. Pender, supra, Cotton and Bowen, JJ., declined to approve the view expressed by the master of the rolls to its broadest extent. But, in the subsequent case of Thruswell v. Hundyside, L. R. 20 Q. B. Div. 359, 363, the view of Brett, M. R., was expressly approved; Hawkins, J., saying: "that where a man is employed to do certain work, and knows that the work which he is doing is dangerous to others, and that accidents are likely to happen, and knows that other persons are lawfully engaged in other work, and are under an obligation to perform such work, the person engaged in the dangerous work is subject to the duty of using reasonable care, and taking precautions to prevent accidents arising from the work in which he is engaged."

2. As was said by Newman, J., in Block v. Milwaukee Street R. Co. 89 Wis. 378, 27 L. R. A. 365: "The negligence is not the proximate cause of the accident unless, under all the circumstances, the accident might have been reasonably foreseen by a man of ordinary intelligence and prudence. It is not enough to prove that the accident is the natural consequence of the negligence. It must also have been the probable consequence." Atkinson v. Goodrich Transp. Co. 60 Wis. 141, 163, 50 Am. Rep. 352; Barton v. Pepin County Agri. Soc. 83 Wis. 19; McGowan v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (Wis.) 64 N. W. 891. A mere failure to ward against a result which could not have been reasonably expected is not actionable negligence. Whether the negligence of the defendant was the proximate cause of the injury, so that it and the result stand in the relation of cause and effect, is a question for the jury, where the evidence is not clear, or the proper inference from undisputed evidence is in doubt. It is not, however, necessary that injury, in the precise form in which it in fact resulted should have been foreseen. It is enough that it now appears to have been a natural and probable consequence. Lane v. Atlantic Works, 111 Mass. 136; Hill v. Winsor, 118 Mass. 258, 259. The evidence on this subject is not conflicting, and the real question is as to the inferences which may be fairly drawn from the evidence, and whether they are in doubt. It appears that the defendant had substantially complied with the statute (Laws 1889, chap. 375, § 1), and by bell insulators and circuit breaks had provided by suitable insulation against injury to persons or property by reason of the leakage or escape of the current of electricity from the trolley wire. The trolley wire and the span wires were sustained at an elevation of about 20 feet in the air. The bell insulators were to prevent the escape of the electric current from the trolley wire, and the circuit breaks to prevent the span wires, if was the proximate cause of the same, and both parties are liable."

Without any discussion of the concurrent liability, both telegraph company and electric railway company was held liable for the damages in case of such an accident from a broken telephone wire falling across a trolley wire, in WESTERN U. TELEG. CO. v. STATE, NELSON, p. 572.

So, both companies were held liable for the damages when a horse was killed by contact with a telephone wire which had fallen across the trolley wire of an electric railway company in the street when there was no guard wire over the trolley wire while the telephone wire was suspended above it and had become much impaired. United Electric R. Co. v. Shelton, 89 Tenn. 423. The court said: "While it was the primary duty of the telephone company to see that its wires were in a reasonably safe and sound condition, and protected against the contingency of falling, it was also the duty of the electric company to see that its trolley wire 31 L. R. A.

was in like manner protected from such contingency. . . . Both companies knew of the unprotected trolley wire, and the consequences of a contact of the wires of the one with those of the other. Both knew of the unsoundness likely to produce a fall of the one upon those of the other. Both were bound to guard against such likelihood, and, having failed to do so, are liable."

To the same effect, approving this case, is McKAY v. SOUTHERN BELL TELEPH. & TELEG. CO. p. 589.

The fact that a telephone company or the city may have been negligent in leaving a telephone wire suspended in a dangerous manner was held in Kankakee Electric R. Co. v. Whittemore, 45 Ill. App. 484, to constitute no defense to an electric railway company when by accident a trolley flew up against it and broke it, and it was left where it fell across the trolley wire until a horse stepped upon it and was killed.

Somewhat similar to these cases, although dis-they should become charged from the trolley, from charging the iron posts by the sidewalks. All reasonable and proper precautions had been taken, it must be conceded, against any probable injury to persons or property in the streets or on the sidewalks or elsewhere, except, possibly, to those whose duty it was to repair and give suitable attention to the span and trolley wires of the defendant, and the wires of the light company, so far as necessary in the operation of the respective lines. All such persons were understood to be, as the plaintiff was, familiar with the application of electricity to such uses, and with the theory of insulation, as well as the use and functions of the bell insulators and circuit breaks. The introduction and use of circuit breaks must be regarded, of itself, to the apprehension and judgment of these trained and experienced operatives, as a signal of danger,—a warning that any given span wire may be charged with a heavy current from the trolley, by leakage or otherwise. They cannot come near a span wire without being thus admonished, and of the general judgment in construction, that circuit breaks are necessary to secure immunity from electric shocks, and to prevent the iron posts from being charged with an electric current down to the streets. These are all parts of the lines with which they are familiar. It is to be considered that they understand the peril and the provided protection as well. The plaintiff was injured because the span wire became charged by coiling, over it and the trolley wire, a portion of the latter, designed to make the curve down Main street. There was no other apparent method of disposing of it for the time being, and no reasonable grounds for supposing that any prudent and careful operative would have failed to notice it under the circumstances; and, if he did not, the circuit breaks provided protection against the charged span wire, unless he came in contact with the span wire beyond the circuit break and the iron post at the same time. This we think the defendant had no reasonable ground to suppose, in the present instance, that the plaintiff would do. The defendant had been operating its railway to the point in question for eight days, beyond which it had not been completed, and the plaintiff had been at work all this time and for some time previous, along the line, in changing the location of the street lamps of the light company, and knew that the trolley wire had been kept charged to operate the railway, and the defendant must have understood that he was familiar with these facts, as well as the near proximity of the iron and wooden poles, and the space between the iron poles and the outer end of the current break. These were obvious facts, and not to be mistaken or misunderstood. The injury could occur in only one way, as the plaintiff substantially tells us, namely, by his bare hand coming in contact with the span wire beyond the "circuit break," and his other hand, or part of his bare person, coming in contact in the same instant with the iron post, so as to pass the electric current through him. Could the defendant have reasonably anticipated, under these circumstances, the occurrence of an accident such as this? Ought the defendant to have foreseen it, in the light of attending circumstances? We think not. It clearly appears that the use of the wooden pole in climbing up or coming down was not dangerous, nor was it possible for the plaintiff, while climbing or clinging to it, to have received a shock even by touching the charged span wire, unless he completed the circuit, at the same instant, by touching the iron post with his naked hand or person. The defendant had no right to expect that an inexperienced operative would have climbed to such a point, much less that an experienced and competent one, with his knowledge of the situation, at the only possible point of danger with the warning of the circuit break before him, would practically eliminate it as a means of safety, and, by placing his body substantially in its place, complete the electrical circuit, so that the current would necessarily pass through his body. It was not expected that he would have occasion to touch or come in contact with the span wire beyond the circuit break, or the iron post, for any purpose, and certainly not so as to complete an electrical circuit with his body.

We think the case of Illingsworth v. Boston Electric Light Co. 161 Mass. 583, 25 L. R. A. 552, where the right of use was given to the operatives of both companies in common, for that and other reasons, is distinguishable. We hold, therefore, that the evidence did not make a case to go to the jury to show that the negligence of the defendant relied on was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial.

inct from them, is the decision in Roodhouse v. Christian, 158 Ill. 137, that in case of an injury to a person thrown against a telephone wire charged with electricity and burned in consequence of a defective sidewalk, an action against the city for damages on account of the defective sidewalk was not affected by a prior judgment obtained by plaintiff against the owner of the wire, where this is not shown to have been satisfied and there is no joint negligence or joint liability alleged.

VII. Wires charged by lightning.

Injury caused by electricity generated by a thunder storm in a telephone wire, which was negligently allowed to hang across a highway so low that a traveler came in contact with it in the dark, renders the telephone company liable, as the wire furnished the means by which the dangerous force was communicated and the injury caused, 31 L. R. A.

although it was a new force or power which intervened. This new force or power would have been harmless but for the displaced wire. Southwestern Telek. & Teleph. Co. v. Robinson, 60 Fed. Rep. 813, 16 L. R. A. 545, 2 U. S. App. 205.

Somewhat similar to this case, although it is not a highway case, is that of Jackson v. Wisconsin Teleph. Co. 88 Wis. 243, 23 L. R. A. 101, in which a telephone company which had left an unused telephone wire hanging from a barn to a county fair building about 325 feet distant, while a ground wire in the latter building was left intact, although the telephone and the insulated wire in the interior of the building had been taken away, was held liable for the burning of the barn by lightning conveyed to it by this wire from the fair ground. In this case the owner of the barn had given no permission to attach the wire to it and did not know that it was so attached.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

v.

SOUTHERN BELL TELEPHONE & TELEGRAPH COMPANY et al.

(.....Ala.....)

1. A telephone company is not excused for negligence in the maintenance of a wire insecurely fastened above a dangerous trolley wire because the railroad company was chargeable with the duty of maintaining guard wires between the electric wires and failed to do so.
2. An electric railway company maintaining a trolley wire charged with a dangerous current without guard wires between it and an insecure telephone wire over it, and negligently permitting the telephone wire to remain suspended over the trolley wire after it has fallen upon it, cannot escape liability by showing how other trolley wires are erected and maintained by prudent and well-managed electric railway companies.
3. A telephone company and an electric railway company are jointly liable for negligence when both maintain their wires with knowledge of the danger caused by the want of guard wires between the trolley wire and a telephone wire insecurely suspended over it, and especially when they permit a broken telephone wire to remain suspended across the trolley wire.
4. Direct proof that defendants charged with negligence in respect to electric wires were the parties who maintained them is not necessary when the defendants, although pleading the general issue, impliedly admit that fact by the conduct of the trial, including cross-examination of witnesses, and fail to suggest that the wires were maintained by any other parties.

(April 8, 1896.)

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Mobile County in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover damages for the injury of plaintiffs' horses by defendants' negligently permitting live electric wires to hang in a public street. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. L. H. Faith, for appellants:

The pleas do not traverse the allegations of the complaint that it was the duty of both defendants respectively to so guard and protect their respective wires as not to allow the telephone wire to fall on the trolley wire, but they set up merely that it was the duty of the railroad to put up guards, etc., which duty it failed to discharge.

1 Chitty, Pl. pp. 252-254, 518; Savage v. Walshe, 26 Ala. 619.

The telephone company was under no compulsion to keep its weak, frail telephone wire stretched over the unguarded trolley wire of the railroad company.

Mayer v. Thompson-Hutchison Bldg. Co. 104 Ala. 611, 28 L. R. A. 483.

Even if the telephone company had priority of right, public security is of infinitely more importance than the question as to which company ought to put the guard between the wires.

Whether or not the use of guard wires or other barriers placed between the telephone wire and the trolley wire is useful and will keep the wires from coming in contact is not a question of science but one of legal or moral obligation,—of common observation upon which the lay or uneducated mind is capable of forming a judgment.

Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Kellogg, 94 U.

VIII. Contributory negligence.

The question of the contributory negligence of a person injured by an electric shock from a wire in a highway is within the ordinary rule as to contributory negligence. It depends upon the facts of each case and is ordinarily a question for the jury.

Thus, the direction of a verdict for the defendant in an action for injury to a person who stooped down and attempted to pick up and throw out of the way a loose telephone wire in the highway was held to be error in Bourget v. Cambridge, 156 Mass. 398, 16 L. R. A. 606. The supreme judicial court in sustaining the exception said: "It must be assumed that the jury might have found that the plaintiff was using due care, unless the contrary appears as matter of law." This case decides that the question is for the jury, and the other cases on the subject are all nearly to the same effect.

Thus, where a boy going along the street about six o'clock in the morning after a storm which had thrown down electric wires picked up a dead wire after it had been suggested to him that wires were dangerous, and when told by a policeman to throw it down started to do so but "flipped" it into the air so that it struck a live wire before he let go of it and thereby transmitted a deadly current which killed him, the court held that the question of his contributory negligence was for the jury, and that 31 L. R. A.

the question of his knowledge or ignorance of the position and condition of the wires was an element in the question of his negligence. Texarkana Gas & E. L. Co. v. Orr, 59 Ark. 215.

But where a boy ten years old took hold of the guy wire of an electric light pole which was on the sidewalk, it was held that it was not contributory negligence in the absence of anything to show that it was charged with electricity, although in fact by contact with another guy wire it was charged with electricity from a trolley wire. In this case it was said that the judge should have told the jury that there was no evidence of contributory negligence. Haynes v. Raleigh Gas Co. 114 N. C. 208, 26 L. R. A. 810.

The contributory negligence of a person injured on a dark and drizzly morning as he was going home from night work by coming in contact as he walked along the street with a live electric light wire which had been thrown down by a storm during the night was held to be a question for the jury. Cook v. Wilmington City Electric Co. 9 Houst. (Del.) 906.

The failure of the driver of a horse to see a broken telephone wire in the street, on which the horse steps and is killed, is held not to be so remarkable as to require a jury to find him negligent. Kankakee Electric R. Co. v. Whittemore, 45 Ill. App. 484.

B. A. R.

S. 469, 24 L. ed. 256; Mayer v. Thompson-Hutchison Bldg. Co. supra.

The question whether the failure to put guards between the trolley wire and the overhead wires was negligence or not, ought at least to have been left to the jury.

O'Brien v. Tatum, 84 Ala. 186; United Electric R. Co. v. Shelton, 89 Tenn. 423.

Said pleas, while professing to answer the complaint, wholly fail to traverse or confess and avoid the very gist of the complaint, namely, knowledge by the defendant of the likelihood of the telephone wire falling upon the trolley wire and the probable danger that would result therefrom, and the duty of the railroad company to guard against such apparent danger, which it omitted to do.

White v. Yarbrough, 18 Ala. 109; Werth v. Montgomery Land & I. Co. 89 Ala. 373; Savage v. Walshe, 26 Ala. 619; Gibson v. Marquis, 29 Ala. 668.

The pleas relying upon a license or ordinance of the city and the defendants' charter as authority for constructing the trolley wires, and averring that the railroad and trolley wires were constructed as authorized by said charter and ordinance, are defective in not setting out so much of the charter or ordinance as may have prescribed how the railroad and trolley wires should be constructed.

Hardy v. Montgomery Branch Bank, 15 Ala. 722; Kohn v. Haas, 95 Ala. 478; Furman v. Huntsville, 54 Ala. 263.

The ordinance granting to the street railroad company the privilege of using electricity as the motive power to run the cars provided that it should put up guard wires at all points where there are electric lamps.

In an action for injuries to the person or property of others this breach of duty would be evidence of negligence.

Hayes v. Michigan C. R. Co. 111 U. S. 228, 28 L. ed. 410; Northern P. R. Co. v. Sullivan, 53 Fed. Rep. 219, 10 U. S. App. 473.

Section 494 of the city ordinance provides that these electric, telephone, motor wires, etc., should be "so constructed and placed as to prevent the electric motor, or power, and telephone or telegraph lines coming in direct contact in case either should break or become detached from fixtures."

This ordinance would be evidence tending to show that a duty was imposed by positive law upon all these companies using wires over the streets, to so construct them as to prevent them coming in direct contact in case either should break or become detached from fixtures.

The plea of not guilty operates as a denial only of the wrongful act alleged to have been committed by the defendant, and not of the facts stated in the inducement.

The court takes judicial notice of the fact that applied electricity as used by street railroads, electric light companies, etc., is dangerous,—at least as dangerous as steam power.

Consolidated Electric Light Co. v. People's Electric Light & G. Co. 94 Ala. 372.

Messrs. Gregory L. Smith, H. T. Smith, and Russell & Deshon for appellees.

Head, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a joint action against the two appellees for damages to property alleged to have been caused by their negligence. The contest seemed to have been largely waged by and between the two defendants, each accusing the other, but the result was victory to both over the plaintiffs.

The complaint shows that the Mobile Street Railroad Company operated an electric street railway along Government street, in Mobile, with the electric motive power supplied by means of an overhead trolley wire, such as is generally in use, which wire was so heavily charged with electricity as to render contact with it highly dangerous to animal life. It was suspended from poles, over the middle of the street, in the usual way. Government crossed Lawrence street. The telephone company had suspended from poles, along Lawrence, crossing Government, as such wires are usually suspended, a wire which is used in its telephone business. This was stretched a few feet over and above the railway trolley wire which it crossed. The complaint charges, in the first count, that this was a frail, weak wire, and was not securely fastened upon its poles, and was liable to break and fall upon and across the said trolley wire, and to extend down to the ground, heavily charged with electricity, by reason of its contact with the trolley wire, and thereby become exceedingly dangerous to the lives of all persons and animals passing upon and along said streets, all of which was well known to both defendants; that it was the duty of the defendants, respectively, to so maintain, guard, and protect their said respective wires as not to allow the telephone wire, if it should break and fall to the ground, to come in contact with the trolley wire, and become charged with electricity from the latter; yet it is averred that at the time of the injury complained of, the defendants failed and neglected so to do, whereby the telephone wire, which broke, fell across the trolley wire, and extended to the ground, heavily charged with electricity, communicated from the trolley wire, and with which plaintiffs' two horses, while being driven along Government street by plaintiffs' servant, came in contact, producing electric shocks, which killed one of them, and seriously injured the other, and did injury to the harness. The second count charges the negligence of the defendants to have been that they "wrongfully and negligently suffered said telephone wire to fall upon and across said trolley wire, and extend therefrom down to the ground, heavily charged with electricity, from said trolley wire, and to be and remain in that condition." The third count charges that the negligence consisted "in suffering the telephone wire to be and remain lying upon and across the trolley wire, and extending down therefrom to, upon, and across Government street, heavily charged with electricity, from the said trolley wire." There were demurrers to these several counts, which were overruled. The defendants filed separate pleas. The telephone company pleaded, first, the general issue. Its second plea, as subsequently amended, set up contributory negligence on the part of plaintiffs' driver, upon which issue was joined. Its third plea averred that its wire was in good order and condition, was properly located and maintained, and was necessarily stretched across, over, and above the trolley wire; that it was charged only with such a low current of electricity as to be harmless to life or property brought in contact with it. The nature and dangerous electric charge of the trolley wire, as alleged in the complaint, are repeated, and the plea avers that it was the duty of the railroad company, which it could have performed, to so construct and maintain, guard and protect its said trolley wire as not to allow contact to be made with it and the telephone wire, if, by accident, the latter should fall where it crossed the former; yet the plea avers that the railroad company failed and neglected so to do, whereby, when the telephone wire did fall, it fell across the trolley wire, and communicated the electric current of the latter to plaintiffs' horses, doing the injury complained of by the plaintiffs. The fourth plea sets up the failure of the railroad company to obey an alleged lawfully authorized order or direction of the mayor of Mobile, requiring it and all other companies using trolley wires to guard and protect them by what is known as "guard wires." It avers that that company, by compliance with said order, in the construction of such guard wires, could have so protected its trolley wires that, in case the small telephone wire should fall, it would not come in contact with the trolley wire; and this failure is charged to have been the direct cause of plaintiffs' injury. The fifth plea is substantially the same as the third, with the additional averment that the telephone company was established and in operation along Lawrence street, crossing Government, before and at the time the railroad company constructed its road and erected its trolley wire. The sixth plea is substantially the same as the fifth, with an additional averment of municipal authority for the construction and operation of its telephone lines.

As we have seen, the complaint contains several charges of negligence against both defendants: (1) That the telephone wire was frail and weak, and not securely fastened to the poles, and was liable to break and fall across the trolley wire, etc., which facts were known to both defendants; and that it was the duty of defendants, respectively, to so maintain, guard, and protect their respective wires as not to allow the telephone wire, if it should break and fall to the ground, to come in contact with the trolley wire, etc., showing failure to observe these duties, with the resultant injury. (2) That defendants wrongfully and negligently suffered the telephone wire to fall upon and across the trolley wire, etc., and to be and remain in that condition. (3) That they suffered the telephone wire to be and remain lying upon and across the trolley wire, etc.

It is plain that neither the third, fourth, fifth, nor sixth plea of the telephone company answers either of these charges. The third does state that the telephone wire was in good order and condition, and properly located and maintained; but this cannot be accepted as a denial of the allegations that, known to the defendants, it was frail and weak, not securely fastened to the poles, and liable to break and fall across the trolley wire, and that it was the duty of the defendants to so maintain, guard, and protect their wires as to prevent such an occurrence. Nor is it excuse to the telephone company, derelict in these respects, that the railroad company was guilty of the negligence charged in its several pleas. Those allegations but emphasize the averments of the complaint, and accentuate the charges of the telephone company's own neglect. The fourth plea is, perhaps, more vicious than the third. It shows the violation, by the railroad company, of a lawful order of the mayor to erect guard wires to prevent just such catastrophes as now brought to view; and yet it confesses that the party pleading maintained a weak, frail wire, insecurely fastened, and, as known to both defendants, liable to fall across the trolley, and violated a duty to protect it against such consequences. And, more than this, it confesses that the party pleading, as well as its codefendant, after the wire fell across the trolley wire, extending to the ground, charged with the dangerous current of electricity, suffered it to be and remain in that condition, causing the plaintiffs' injury. The same may be said of the fifth and sixth pleas. The demurrers sufficiently raise these objections, and the court erred in overruling them.

It is apparent there is no answer in either of the special pleas of the defendant the Mobile Street Railroad Company to either of the charges of negligence contained in the complaint. It is not material to this controversy that the company had lawful authority to construct and operate its road with the motive power employed. It does not appear, unless by the statement of a conclusion of the pleader merely, that the charter and municipal ordinance authorized the defendant, knowing that a frail, weak, insecurely fastened telephone wire, liable to fall across its trolley wire, and extend to the ground, carrying a deadly current of electricity to persons and property lawfully passing along the highway, was being maintained by another, to maintain and operate its own wire without taking any steps to prevent destructive consequences; and particularly does no authority appear to suffer the wire of the telephone company to be and remain lying across its own, extending to the ground. Nor is it material that the defendant had no connection with the telephone company, and that the latter's wire broke and fell without the defendant's fault, and that it did nothing to cause it to break and fall as it did. Nor does the fact that defendant erected and maintained its wire in the manner that other trolley wires are erected and maintained by many prudent and well-managed electric railway companies, conducting the same character of business over and along the streets of other cities, justify it in knowingly suffering a wire to be suspended over its own, in a condition likely to fall across its own, with the attendant dangers mentioned, without providing proper safeguards, or, after its fall, suffering it to be and remain in that condition. The demurrers to these pleas ought to have been sustained.

It is said that the pleas are good, in that they show there was no joint liability of the defendants. The injurious act complained of consisted in one aspect of the complaint, in the concurrent maintenance of two wires, so related to each other, and so erected, that the one was likely to fall across the other, producing the dangers charged. This wrong was in the concurrent, common knowledge, contemplation, and intent of both defendants. Both knew that the one wire was likely to fall across the other, and cause such damage as the plaintiff sustained, and it was the common duty of both to abate the dangerous condition. It is not material by what special act or omission on the part of either, in the maintenance of its own wire, the dangerous condition was produced. So far as concerned the public, it was the maintenance of the two wires, so related to each other, in respect of injurious consequences, that they were inseparable. Known to both defendants, the two wires mutually depended upon each other for those consequences. Whether the condition was primarily brought about by the neglect of one or the other or both defendants, it yet existed with knowledge on the part of both, and both contributed to the continuance of its existence. The supreme court of Tennessee in United Electric R. Co. v. Shelton, 89 Tenn. 423, had occasion to consider a case substantially identical with this. The opinion being short, we reproduce it, as delivered by Turney, Ch. J., as follows: "Shelton's horse was killed by coming in contact with a wire of the telegraph and telephone company, which had fallen across the trolley wire of the electric railway company. The wire of the telephone company had become much impaired. The falling of a wall of a burning building broke a pole of the telephone company, breaking the wires at several points. At the point of the accident, the telephone wires crossed the railway track above the trolley. A broken wire fell across the trolley wire, and, while resting on it, the horse came in contact with it, and was instantly killed. There was no guard wire over the trolley wire. The case was tried by the circuit judge, without the intervention of a jury. The condition of the telephone wire was such as to arrest the attention of a prudent man engaged in the business of either company. The circuit judge found, under the facts, that both companies were guilty of negligence, and responsible for the loss, and gave judgment accordingly. The judgment is correct. While it was the primary duty of the telephone company to see that its wires were in a reasonably safe and sound condition, and protected against the contingency of falling, it was also the duty of the electric company to see that its trolley wire was in like manner protected from such contingency. While it was the duty of the one company not to use unsound and unprotected wires, it was equally the duty of the other not to operate its road under such defective machinery. It might as well insist that it was not responsible for damages resulting from the fall of a rock which it had constantly recognized as threatening to fall, or of a dead tree which it had frequently noticed, with decayed and giving roots, and knew would fall in the first wind or rain. The obligation to see that its road was in good repair, and its machinery in safe operating order, is not confined to the immediate and abstract presence of either, but extends to all surroundings that may depreciate the security of either. Both companies knew of the unprotected trolley wire, and the consequences of a contact of the wires of the one with those of the other. . . . Both were bound to guard against such likelihood, and, having failed to do so, are liable."

It is unnecessary to discuss the joint liability of the two defendants under the phase of the complaint which charges that they suffered the wire of the one, after falling, to be and remain across and in contact with that of the other, causing the injury. It is too clear for discussion that such liability is joint. The pleas were interposed to the whole complaint.

The special replications bring forward nothing new, and were improperly interposed. They might well have been stricken from the file. They will, probably, not be insisted upon.

There does not appear to have been any real question upon the trial as to the operation of the railway and telephone lines by the defendants, respectively; and the plaintiffs omitted to make direct proof thereof, at least as to the telephone company. There is clearly sufficient evidence, howsoever weak, to send the question to the jury as to the operation of the railroad by the Mobile Street Railroad Company at the time of, and for months prior to, the injury, and to authorize an inference by the jury of a failure of duty, as alleged, on the part of the company, proximately causing the injury. As to the telephone company, there was evidence tending to show that a telephone wire was being, and had been for months before the injury, maintained as alleged in the complaint, and that it fell across the trolley wire as alleged. The defendant the Southern Bell Telephone & Telegraph Company, being sued and charged with maintaining the wire, came into court, by counsel, and entered upon a trial of the general issue, as well as of special issues. So, also, as to the other defendant, the Mobile Street Railroad Company. The conduct of the trial by these defendants from beginning to end; the character and manner of the development and production of the testimony; the cross-examination of the plaintiffs' witnesses; the absence of a suggestion, express or implied, in the conduct of the trial, on the facts, that any other than the defendants maintained and operated the wires, respectively,—all tended to show an implied admission that they were the parties, and authorized the jury so to infer. It is certainly true that the plea of the general issue puts in issue all the material allegations of the complaint, and imposes upon the plaintiffs the necessity of proving them. But the rule is a reasonable one. No set form of proof is prescribed. The defendant may, by his course of conduct on the trial, show to the satisfaction of the jury that he does not really controvert a particular fact strictly within the issue, but waives formal proof thereof; and in such a case it should be left to the jury to say whether it is waived or not. Suppose an extrajudicial investigation, of precisely the same nature and incidents as the trial in question, had occurred by and between the parties to this suit, in reference to this subject; would not the conduct of the defendants thereon be admissible, upon a subsequent judicial investigation of the matter, to authorize the inference of an implied admission that they were the parties who maintained the wires? We think so. We will not therefore declare that the rulings upon the pleadings were erroneous without injury.

The city ordinance which was excluded may be so connected on another trial as to render it admissible, if it was not on the trial appealed from.

Reversed and remanded.

v.

KNOXVILLE CAR-WHEEL COMPANY

et al., Appts., and

KNOXVILLE SAVINGS BANK et al.,

Plffs. in Err.

(95 Tenn. 634.)

1. A creditor of a corporation may, without obtaining judgment against it, maintain a bill under the Tennessee statutes to wind up its affairs, if, after sustaining large losses, it has suspended business with no preparation for resumption, and has executed trust deeds in favor of certain creditors covering practically all its assets, while its claim to solvency is based upon extravagant valuations of its assets.
2. Trust deeds in favor of certain creditors, executed by a corporation after sustaining heavy losses and suspending business and when it cannot meet its accruing liabilities, will be set aside.
3. The term "capital stock paid in," in the charter of a corporation making directors liable for debts in excess of such stock, means the amount subscribed by the stockholders, and not the total value of the assets.
4. The term "indebtedness," in the charter of a corporation making directors liable personally for indebtedness in excess of capital stock paid in, includes bonded indebtedness.

5. Although the directors' liability for indebtedness of a corporation in excess of the capital stock is available only in favor of creditors whose debts were illegally contracted, yet it cannot be enforced by each creditor individually, but must be enforced by a bill filed for the benefit of all creditors similarly situated.

6. Consent to the creation of indebtedness of a corporation in excess of its assets, which will make directors individually liable therefor under a statute imposing such liability, must be given in their capacity as directors.

7. Dividends paid by the directors of a corporation when it is realizing a net profit on its business, and when the assets as honestly estimated by them exceed its liabilities, will not render them individually liable under a charter imposing such liability for dividends paid when the company is insolvent, although the assets prove to have been largely overestimated and the company in fact insolvent.

8. A purchaser at chancery sale of the unexpired term of a leasehold is not chargeable with the contract rental of the original lease for the balance of the term.

9. A claim for rent for property leased to a corporation which has been placed in the hands of a receiver in a suit in which the lessor joins, which accrues subsequently to his appointment, cannot be made a preferred claim against the funds in his hands, unless he in fact adopts the lease.

(November 12, 1895.)

NOTE.—On the question whether bonded indebtedness is within the provision making directors liable for indebtedness of a corporation in excess of its capital stock, the above decision is believed to be substantially one of first impression.

For some cases on the liability of directors for debts, see Leighton v. Campbell (R. I.) 9 L. R. A. 187, and note; also Gold v. Clyne (N. Y.) 17 L. R. A. 787.

APPEAL by defendants Knoxville Car-Wheel Company and its directors from a decree of the Chancery Court for Knox County declaring the defendant corporation insolvent and fixing certain personal liability upon its directors in favor of creditors, and writ of error by certain of the creditors to review so much of the decree as set aside deeds of trust which had been made by the corporation in their favor. Modified and affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Washburn, Pickle, & Turner, and Webb & McClung, for appellants:

The assets of an insolvent moneyed corporation become, from the date of its assured insolvency, a fixed trust fund for equal pro ratu distribution among its creditors, unless otherwise provided by law or stipulated by valid contract.

Marr v. Bank of West Tennessee, 4 Coldw. 471; Moseby v. Williamson, 5 Heisk. 286; Comfort v. Patterson, 2 Lea, 672; City Sav. Bank v. North Ala. Lumber & Mfg. Co. 91 Tenn. 15; Smith v. St. Louis Mut. L. Ins. Co. 2 Tenn. Ch. 787.

This principle has not been applied in this state to other than "moneyed corporations." The defendant company does not belong to that class.

But if the principle shall be extended to other than moneyed corporations much greater liberality should be shown in its application to corporations whose assets are not supposed to consist of money.

City Sav. Bank v. North Ala. Lumber & Mfg. Co. 91 Tenn. 12.

The corporation had abundant assets to pay its debts. Its suspension of business was enforced by a common calamity and was temporary.

When a corporation, in its business affairs, is thus in articulo mortis whatever may yet be maintained as to its right to dispose of its property so as to give a preference to some general creditor, the law is too well settled, at least in this jurisdiction, to admit of extended discussion, that its directors cannot make a disposition of the assets so as to secure to themselves, directly or indirectly, a preference over general creditors.

Mr. T. A. Gratz also for appellees.

McAlister, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a creditors' bill, filed—First, to have the Knoxville Car-Wheel Company declared an insolvent corporation and its assets equally distributed among all its creditors; and, second, to hold the directors of said company, who are made defendants, individually liable for all debts created in excess of the capital stock paid in. The complainant also seeks to have annulled certain mortgages, for the reasons: First, that they were executed by said corporation after its ascertained insolvency; and, second, because preferences are thereby created in favor of certain debts for which the directors are sureties: The directors are also sought to be held liable upon the ground that they had declared and received certain dividends from said corporation at a time when it was insolvent. It is alleged in the bill that on June 19, 1882, said car-wheel company issued bonds to the amount of $100,000, and to secure said bonds executed a trust deed on all of its real and personal property to R. C. Jackson, as trustee, and that this trust deed would mature July 1, 1892. It is then alleged that on January 27, 1892, said corporation, being then insolvent, executed a trust deed to R. S. Payne, trustee, conveying other real and personal property to secure the sum of $31,872.23, due the East Tennessee National Bank, the Mechanics' National Bank, the City National Bank, and Daniel Briscoe & Co. It is further alleged that on January 27, 1892, said corporation, being insolvent, executed to L. H. Spillman, trustee, a deed of trust on other real and personal property to secure the sum of $23,025.77, due to Knoxville Savings Bank, City National Bank, McNulty & Ransom, and Peter Staub. It is then charged that the last two deeds of trust were executed for the purpose of giving the creditors therein secured an illegal preference, and, having been made by an insolvent corporation, are fraudulent in law. There is no charge of fraud or bad faith; on the contrary, the bill recites, viz.: "Complainant expressly disclaims any reflection upon the integrity and high character of the individuals who compose the directors of said defendant, the Knoxville Car-Wheel Company, or of the individuals and officers of the corporation who constitute its creditors of the preferred class; but the charge is that the effort to thus prefer one class of creditors of a corporation over others less favored and influential is illegal and void, and will not be tolerated by a court of equity." It is next alleged that the capital stock of said company is $107,000, while its indebtedness amounts to $190,000 (less $10,000 paid by said Spillman, trustee), and that said directors assented to the creation of said indebtedness, and are therefore liable for the sum of $73,000, the excess of debts over the paid-in capital stock; that it will be necessary to sell all of the property of said company to pay debts, and, if that shall not suffice, then said directors are liable for the excess of the indebtedness above the capital stock. The bill asks the appointment of a receiver, the marshaling of assets, and the sale of the corporate property, and that the trust deeds to Payne and Spillman be adjudged void. L. H. Spillman was appointed temporary receiver for the corporation. The defendant car-wheel company answered the bill, and, among other defenses, denied its insolvency, and averred that its assets were worth more than double its debts, and that its business had been uniformly profitable until the recent panic which swept over the country, causing the railroads to cut off their purchases, and to default in the payments of goods already purchased; that this fact so depleted its revenues that it was deemed best to temporarily suspend operations until business should resume its normal conditions; that it had always done a good business, and paid the interest on its bonded debt, and promptly met all of its obligations; that it was in no sense insolvent, and its suspension of business was only temporary, and was not intended to be permanent. On May 23, 1892, the directors filed a joint demurrer and answer to the bill. The defenses are that they never assented to the creation of complainant's debt, and they further deny that the indebtedness of the company exceeds the capital stock in the sense of the statute, denying that the bonded debt of the company can be computed in ascertaining the liability of the directors under the statute, but that only the floating debt is to be considered. They further insist that the company has assets sufficient to pay all its bonded and floating debt and to redeem all its stock. On May 23, 1892, the Mechanics' National Bank, City National Bank, Knoxville Savings Bank, Daniel Briscoe & Co., beneficiaries under the trust deed aforesaid, filed their answers to the original bill, in which they deny the insolvency of the car-wheel company, affirm the validity of the trust deeds securing their debts, and resist the appointment of a receiver, and reserve the right to insist upon the liability of the directors for their debts, if it should become necessary. It appears that on June 6, 1892, upon motion of complainant, and upon the pleadings hereinbefore stated, the chancellor declared the car-wheel company an insolvent corporation, appointed L. H. Spillman permanent receiver, enjoined the company from exercising its corporate franchises, and assumed jurisdiction to wind up the affairs of said company as an insolvent corporation. A reference was ordered to ascertain assets and debts. On July 20, 1893, the clerk and master filed his general report, showing, viz.: First, the assets of the car-wheel company on May 1, 1892, were $317,424.73; second, the secured debts, including bonds and the debts mentioned in the trust deeds to R. S. Payne and L. H. Spillman, $162,100.51; third, the unsecured debts, $17,468.03. Total debts, $179,568.54. Complainants excepted to so much of the clerk's report as fixed the assets of the company at $317,424.73. On June 25, 1894, a decree was pronounced by the chancellor adjudging the trust deeds to Payne and Spillman void, and that the directors were warranted in paying the dividends to stockholders, and were not liable to the creditors of the company on that account. The court reserved the question of liability of the directors upon the ground that the debts exceeded the assets, and referred the cause to the master to report—First, the paid-up capital stock of the corporation; second, what debts were created in excess of the capital stock with the assent of the directors. August 7, 1894, the clerk reported, viz.: First, the paid-up capital stock of the car-wheel company was $107,000; second, the indebtedness has exceeded the paid-up capital stock at all times since April 30, 1885, and that all the debts were created with the assent of the directors, at a time when the indebtedness exceeded the paid-up capital stock, though there were assets sufficient to pay the debts. August 10, 1894, a decree was entered overruling the exceptions filed to this report by the directors, the chancellor adjudging that the capital stock was $107,000, and that all debts created after April 30, 1885, were created at a time when the debts exceeded the capital stock, and were created with the assent of the directors. The car-wheel company and the directors C. H. Brown, W. P. Washburn, W. W. Woodruff, D. A. Carpenter, and M. L. Ross, appealed, and have assigned errors.

The defendant banks whose debts were preferred in the deeds of trust have brought the case up by writs of error, and assign errors upon the action of the chancellor in adjudging their preferences illegal, and in ordering said deeds to be set aside. The second assignment is that the chancellor erred in adjudging the car-wheel company an insolvent corporation at the date of the execution of the second trust deeds herein attacked, and in holding the latter void for that reason, and on account of illegal preferences. It is insisted that the car-wheel company was solvent, and a going concern, and it had the right to make preferential assignments to its creditors, and that said deeds of trust are therefore valid. Mr. Morawetz, in his work on Private Corporations, referring to the cases which hold that corporate preferences are valid, says: "This doctrine, in the opinion of the writer, is wholly indefensible on principle. The capital provided for the security of the creditors of the corporation is a fund held for the benefit of all the creditors equally. That the unsecured creditors of a corporation are entitled to an equal distribution of the common security has often been recognized by the courts of equity in adjusting the rights of creditors among themselves and in relation to the company's shareholders. After a corporation has become insolvent, and has ceased to carry on business, the rights of its creditors become fixed. If a corporation, whose assets are not sufficient to satisfy all of its creditors in full, can prefer certain creditors, leaving others unpaid, this must be by virtue of a power reserved by implication to the company and its agents. But this power cannot justly be included in the general powers of management which a corporation must necessarily possess over its property in order to carry on its business and further the purposes for which the company was formed. The purposes of a corporation are not furthered in any manner by giving it or its agents the power, after the company has become insolvent and has ceased to carry on business, and after its shareholders have lost their interests in the corporate estate, to prefer a portion of the creditors, according to interest or mere whim, and to pay their claims in full, leaving the others wholly without redress." 2 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 803. The settled law of this state is that the assets of an insolvent corporation become from the date of its assured insolvency a fixed trust fund for equal pro rata distribution among its creditors, unless otherwise provided by law, or fixed by valid contract. Marr v. Bank of West Tennessee, 4 Coldw. 471; Moseby v. Williamson, 5 Heisk. 286; Comfort v. Patterson, 2 Lea, 672; City Sav. Bank v. North Ala. Lumber & Mfg. Co. 91 Tenn. 15; Smith v. St. Louis Mut. L. Ins. Co. 2 Tenn. Ch. 737. It has been held, however, in this state, that although the liabilities of a corporation may greatly exceed its assets, it is not insolvent in such sense as that its assets become a trust fund for pro rata distribution among its creditors so long as it continues to be a going concern, and conducts its business in the ordinary way. There must be some positive act of insolvency, such as the filing of a bill to administer its assets, or the making of a general assignment, or the permanent cessation to do business. Comfort v. McTeer, 7 Lea, 660.

With this preliminary statement of the law, we proceed to inquire whether, at the date of the execution of the trust deeds in question, to wit, on January 27, 1892, the Knoxville Car-

Wheel Company was an insolvent corporation, and if this fact had been signalized by a suspension of its corporate business, and the transfer of all its available assets. The complainants took the deposition of Charles H. Brown, the president, secretary, treasurer and general manager of the corporation. It appears from the testimony of Mr. Brown that this corporation had lost money continuously since October, 1890. This witness further testified that about January 30, 1891, the company suspended business. He was then asked, "Why did you suspend?" His answer was: "Because I did not have the money. Outstanding notes went to protest, and bills became payable faster than we could make collections. The railroads were all in a cramped condition, and, instead of paying their bills at the first of the month, as they had done, they kept us waiting, and we are waiting for some of them yet." The witness was then asked if the deeds of trust were executed for the purpose of giving preferences. He answered, "I believe it to be construed that way."

Question: "Did you, before suspending, consult with the directors as to the advisability of suspending?"

Answer: "Yes, sir. I called the directors together, explained the financial situation; that notes were coming due, and no funds to meet them, and the East Tennessee National Bank had refused to let us have any more money. We then decided to assign, or at least to execute trust deeds. The trust deeds were not executed until after the company suspended."

Witness states his impression, without giving actual figures, that the company had sufficient assets to cover the liabilities left unsecured after the execution of the deeds of trust. He is asked to specify any assets reserved by the company to pay the unsecured debts. The witness is unable to mention any item, but says "the only way to find out would be to take the deeds of trust and the balance sheet, and check them off." When the balance sheet is checked off, it is ascertained that the principal items not contained in the deeds of trust are the items of account due from the Georgia Railroad Company and the Ducktown Sulphur, Copper, & Iron Company, and which had been transferred, by authority of the directors, January 25, 1892, to the Mechanics' National Bank, and the item of account against the Richmond Locomotive & Machine Works, transferred to W. R. Turner, to secure the payment of a note in favor of William Fain, administrator, which was then past due. The record discloses that in these deeds of trust the company had conveyed its entire plant, including the wheels on hand and those in process of manufacture, its tools, stock in trade, all accounts and bills receivable and lands owned by the company which were not then under mortgage. The property conveyed in the deeds of trust apparently embraced everything owned by the corporation. The trustees were placed in possession of the property conveyed to them, and the business of the company was suspended.

It further appears that during the year ending April 30, 1891, the company had sustained a net loss of $12,831.04, and during nine months from April 30, 1891, to February 1, 1892, it had sustained a net loss of $20,987.83; making a total loss sustained by the company during the twenty-one months preceding the suspension of business on January 30, 1892, of $33,818.87. On the latter date the directors ordered the factory to be closed, stopped all salaries excepting the salary of a bookkeeper, which was to be continued only until such time when the books were written up. The president of the company was requested to remain in charge during the month of February, the salary to be arranged hereafter; and he was authorized to reopen the machine shop, and to complete such unfinished work as was on hand; and also empowering him to sell the Carter county property, which was all covered by the trust deeds made to Jackson and Payne. On March 30, 1892, the directors authorized the execution of an additional deed of trust to secure payment of claim of Jennifer Iron Company for $1,080. It further appears that no meetings of the directors were held from March 30, 1892, to May 10, 1892, when the present bill was filed. During this time no preparations were made for the resumption of business, but there was every indication of permanent suspension and a final liquidation of the affairs of the company.

The claim of the company that it was solvent is, in our opinion, based largely upon extravagant valuations of its assets, and especially upon an overestimate of the value of certain lands owned by the company in Carter county. The valuation put upon this land by the stockholders was entirely arbitrary, and without any sufficient reason to justify such an exaggerated figure. The evidence shows that there was no market for such real estate in 1892, that on account of the general depression in business it was impossible to sell real estate, and that such an asset was entirely unavailable. When this bill was filed the company's matured and unsettled floating indebtedness exceeded $70,000, its bonded indebtedness of $100,000 would mature in two months, the entire assets of the company were covered with deeds of trust, and the company was entirely without resources to liquidate this heavy indebtedness. The question, then, is whether a creditor, on May 10, 1892, after the trust deeds had been executed, and the assignees had taken possession of the entire property of the company, could file and maintain a bill to wind up the affairs of the company as an insolvent corporation. We think the right to maintain the bill is clear and unquestionable. Complainant, without obtaining a judgment at law upon its demand, had the undoubted right to file this bill, and have the company wound up as an insolvent corporation, and its assets distributed ratably among all the creditors. As stated in the brief: "While this bill was originally filed only to collect a debt of $400, there are now before the court $190,000 of creditors on whose behalf it was also filed, and who now join with the original complainant in the demand that it be sustained, and the assets of this insolvent corporation applied to the payment of its just debts." The bill is clearly maintainable under the following sections of the (Mill. & V.) Code:

"Sec. 5037. The creditors of a corporation may also, without first having obtained a judgment at law, file a bill in the court of chancery, to attach the property of the corporation, and subject the same, by sale or otherwise, to the satisfaction of their debt, when the corporate franchises are not used, or have been granted to others in whole or in part."

"Sec. 5038. In such cases the court may appoint a receiver, take an account of the affairs of the corporation, and apply the property and effects to the payment of debts pro rata, and divide the surplus, if any, among the stockholders."

"Sec. 4168. A corporation is not dissolved by the non-use or assignment to others, in whole or in part, of its powers, franchises, and privileges, unless all the corporate property has been appropriated to the payment of its debts; and any creditor, for himself and other creditors, whether he has recovered judgment or not, or any stockholder, for himself and other stockholders, may file a bill under the provisions of this chapter, to attach the corporate property, and have such property applied to the payment of the debts of the corporation and any surplus divided among the stockholders."

In Smith v. St. Louis Mut. L. Ins. Co. 6 Lea, 569, it was said that under these sections of the Code "the court may find [as] a fact that the corporation is involved, or has ceased to do business, or has granted its franchises in whole or in part to others, and upon the adjudication of any of these facts the right to administer its effects for the benefit of creditors follows."

We are also of the opinion that the execution of these deeds of trust under the circumstances was an overt act of insolvency, and was a preferential diversion of the corporate assets to the payment of debts of any class to the exclusion of other classes. The execution of the deeds of trust under the circumstances was a confession of insolvency. We therefore adjudge the several deeds of trust executed by the car-wheel company to Payne, Spillman, and McMillan void, and the decree of the chancellor in setting them aside was correct.

We do not decide, and do not wish to be so understood, that a corporation, although actually insolvent, so long as it is a going concern, may not deal with its property, and transfer it for value, in due course of business, to general creditors. A mere excess of liabilities over assets would not alone be sufficient to justify an interference and stoppage of business at the suit of a creditor. "A corporation is authorized to continue the management of its affairs, to deal with its property, and to assign it for value in due course of business, notwithstanding its actual insolvency, so long as there is an honest intention and a reasonable expectation on the part of the company of redeeming its fortunes; and it is only when a corporation is about to defraud its creditors by waste of its assets, or when the insolvency of the company is hopeless, so that further prosecution of the enterprise would clearly be at the expense of the creditors, that the latter may interfere to protect their lien." 2 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. 2d ed. § 786; Wait, Insolvent Corp. § 34, quoting the above with approval. 2 Spelling, Priv. Corp. § 712. "It has accordingly been held that a corporation which is insolvent, and unable to pay all of its creditors in full, may continue its operations and pay off debts in regular course of business, though a part of the creditors be thereby deprived of their security." 2 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 786. We hold, however, that this corporation, at the date of the filing of the bill, was not only actually insolvent, but had committed an overt act of insolvency by preferential assignments to creditors.

The next question presented is in respect of the individual liability of the directors. The charter of the Knoxville Car-Wheel Company contains the following clause, to wit: "If the indebtedness of said company shall at any time exceed the capital stock paid in, the directors assenting thereto shall be individually liable to the creditors for said excess." The chancellor found that the capital stock of the company subscribed and paid in amounted to $107,000, and that all debts created after April 30, 1885, were in excess of the capital stock paid in; that the directors had assented to the creation of such indebtedness, and were individually liable. He decreed, however, that this liability upon the part of the directors was secondary, and that the sum could not be ascertained until the property of the corporation was sold, and its proceeds distributed. The finding of the chancellor that the capital stock of the company was $107,000 is fully sustained by the record. The capital stock is shown by the first report made by the secretary and treasurer of the company to stockholders, on May 19, 1882, to be $107,000, and it appears at the same sum in every subsequent annual report from that time to February 1, 1892, upon which date the last report was made. The capital stock is proved to have been $107,000 by C. H. Brown, who was secretary and treasurer or president of the corporation from its organization. It is insisted in behalf of complainants that the excess of indebtedness over capital stock for which the directors are liable amounts to the sum of $78,000. It is conceded by defendants that if the term "indebtedness," employed in the statute, should be held to embrace the fixed bonded indebtedness of the company as well as its floating debts, then its indebtedness does exceed the capital stock paid in. The insistence in behalf of the directors on this branch of the case is twofold, to wit: First, that the term "capital stock paid in" includes, not merely the capital stock paid in by the subscribers, but the entire capital and available assets of the company; second, that the term "indebtedness" used in the statute, does not include the bonded indebtedness, but merely the floating debts of the company. The proper solution of this question involves the determination of the correct meaning of the terms "indebtedness" and "capital stock paid in" as employed in the charter of the company. What, then, is the meaning in this connection of the term "capital stock paid in?" The insistence of defendants' counsel is that the assets on hand and available for payment of debts, no matter how derived, must constitute the fund called "capital stock paid in." In support of this contention counsel cites 2 Beach, Priv. Corp. § 465, viz.: "In respect of corporate capital the word [capital] is in general use as signifying the sums paid in by the subscribers, with the addition of all gains and profits realized, with such diminutions as have resulted from losses incurred in transacting business. In this sense the capital of a corporation is the fund with which it transacts its business and embraces all its property, real and personal, constituting the assets of the corporation such as are subject to execution at law. So much of the capital as is represented by the capital stock issued must always be kept unimpaired during the existence of the corporation; but that portion of the capital which represents the surplus arising from the operation of the business of the corporation is subject to the discretion of the managers in regard to its disposition. Therefore profits remain a part of the fund constituting the capital until actually divided among the stockholders." We do not think the quotation from Beach sustains the position. It will be observed that Mr. Beach in this quotation is dealing with the word "capital," and he does not treat this term as synonymous with "capital stock." In the very next section the same author says, viz.: "There is a distinction between the capital of a corporation and its capital stock, though they are often used as interchangeable terms. The capital stock is clearly not the same as property possessed by the corporation; for the capital stock remains fixed although the actual property of the corporation varies in value and is constantly increasing or diminishing in amount. What the amount of the capital shall be is within the discretion of the managers, but the amount of the capital stock is limited and determined by the charter and the laws governing it. It follows, therefore, that a limit imposed upon the capital stock of a corporation does not restrict the amount of property which it may own." 2 Beach, Priv. Corp. § 466.

This distinction is clearly shown in § 781 of Morawetz on Private Corporations, in these words: "The amount of the capital stock of a corporation is usually fixed at a definite sum by the charter or other instrument which has been agreed to by the shareholders as containing the essential conditions of their contract of association. It is so fixed, partly for the purpose of determining the scope of the company's business and the relative rights and obligations of its shareholders as among themselves, and partly also for the purpose of obtaining commercial credit on behalf of the corporation, by indicating to the community what security has been provided for those who deal with it. Every person who becomes a shareholder in a corporation, and every person who deals with a corporation, understands that the fund contributed or agreed to be contributed as the company's capital shall be charged with the payment of corporate debts. It is likewise understood, where there is no express provision to the contrary, that the funds so charged shall be the only security for creditors, and that the shareholders shall not be individually liable for the corporate debts and obligations. Every contract entered into by a corporation therefore includes: (1) An implied agreement that the company's capital shall be held and used as a trust fund equitably pledged as security for the corporate debts. (2) An implied representation that the company's capital has been paid in or subscribed as indicated by the company's charter, and that the fund contributed or subscribed has been preserved for the purposes for which it was provided." "Capital stock is the sum fixed by the corporate charter as the amount paid in or to be paid in by the stockholders for the prosecution of the business of the corporation and for the benefit of corporate creditors. The capital stock is to be clearly distinguished from the amount of property possessed by the corporation. Occasionally it happens that under the terms of statutes relating to taxation which have been drawn without regard to the technical meaning of words, the courts will construe the capital stock to mean all the actual property of the corporation. But this is for the purpose of carrying out the intent of the statute, and is not the real meaning of the terms. At common law the capital stock does not vary, but remains fixed, although the actual property of the corporation may fluctuate widely in value and may be diminished by losses or increased by gains." 1 Cook, Stock, Stockholders & Corp. Law, § 9. See also Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Gainer, 97 U. S. 697, 24 L. ed. 1091; Ohio Life Ins. & T. Co. v. Merchants' Ins. & T. Co. 11 Humph. 1, 53 Am. Dec. 742; Union Bank v. State, 9 Yerg. 490; South Nashville Street R. Co. v. Morrow, 87 Tenn. 406, 2 L. R. A. 853; Memphis v. Ensley, 6 Baxt. 553, 32 Am. Rep. 532; Nashville Gaslight Co. v. Nashville, 8 Lea, 406. We therefore conclude that the term "capital stock paid in" means the amount subscribed and paid by the stockholders, and that amount is clearly shown by the proof to have been $107,600.

The next question presented is whether the word "indebtedness," in the clause of the charter imposing personal liability on the directors' assenting to an indebtedness in excess of the capital stock paid, includes bonded indebtedness. The chancellor so held. The contention of the directors' counsel is that the term means the floating indebtedness, and does not embrace the bonded debt. Counsel, in order to support this contention, go into a history of previous legislation on this subject, but we have been unable to derive much light from that source. The only material difference we note between the former acts and the statute in question is that in the latter the words "paid in" have been added. The former acts simply provided that the indebtedness should not exceed the capital stock. We think the addition of the words "paid in" strengthens, rather than diminishes, the force of the argument that bonded indebtedness is within the meaning of the statute. The construction contended for by counsel for the directors would lead to this anomaly: that directors having contracted indebtedness to the limit allowed by the charter may fund this liability in bonds, secure them by a recorded mortgage, and then, without risk to themselves, incur additional indebtedness, and repeat the process toties quoties. We have been furnished with no direct authority on the point now being adjudged. Counsel, however, cite Stone v. Chisolm, 118 U. S. 302, 28 L. ed. 991, where it appears that the indebtedness with which the directors were sought to be charged under a North Carolina statute was a registered bonded indebtedness; but the precise point raised here was not presented or decided. We think this section of the charter of the car-wheel company is unambiguous, and the term "indebtedness" clearly includes the bonded debt.

It is insisted by defendants' counsel that the directors' liability does not constitute a fund for the benefit of creditors generally, but that it is a specific liability in favor of individual creditors whose debts were illegally contracted, and that other creditors, whose debts were legally contracted, cannot avail themselves of it. That proposition is true, but in conceding this we do not wish to be understood as agreeing that each creditor whose debt has been illegally contracted may maintain a separate suit against the directors for the assertion of his individual claim. We held in Moulton v. Connell-Hall McLeester Co. 93 Tenn. 377, that the liability of the directors is a fund created by the statute for the benefit of all the creditors whose debts were incurred in excess of the capital stock paid in with the assent of directors, and that the bill must be filed for the benefit of all creditors so situated. In this view the present bill is properly framed. Hornor v. Henning, 93 U. S. 231, 23 L. ed. 879; Stone v. Chisolm, 113 U. S. 302, 28 L. ed. 991; Pollard v. Bailey, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 520, 22 L. ed. 376. In Stone v. Chisolm, 113 U. S. 302, 28 L. ed. 991, Justice Matthews, in stating the reason of the rule, said, viz.: "The conditions of the personal liability of the directors of the corporation, expressed in the statute, are that there shall be debts of the corporation in excess of the capital stock actually paid in, to which the directors sought to be charged shall have assented. . . . To ascertain the existence of the liability in a given case requires an account to be taken of the amount of the corporate indebtedness, and of the amount of the capital stock actually paid in—facts which the directors, upon whom the liability is imposed, have a right to have determined, once for all, in a proceeding which shall conclude all who have an adverse interest, and a right to participate in the benefit to result from enforcing the liability. . . . The evident intention of the provision is that the liability shall be for the common benefit of all entitled to enforce it according to their interest; an apportionment which, in case there cannot be satisfaction for all, can only be made in a single proceeding to which all interested can be made parties. . . . It is immaterial," continues the court, "that in the present case it does not appear that there are other creditors than the plaintiffs in error. There can be but one rule for construing the section, whether the creditors be one or many."

The next assignment is that the chancellor erred in decreeing that all the debts of the company contracted after April 30, 1885, were created with the assent of the directors. It may be conceded that this assignment presents a question of some difficulty, and probably the determining issue in the case. The language of the statute is viz.: "If the indebtedness of said company shall at any time exceed the capital stock paid in, the directors assenting thereto shall be individually liable to the creditors for said excess." It may be remarked that this clause is peculiar to charters of mining and manufacturing companies, and is a discrimination, to some extent, against this class of domestic corporations. It has been uniformly held that such statutes, being in derogation of the common law, must be strictly construed. As stated by Mr. Cook in his work on Stock & Stockholders: "They [such statutes] are a wide departure from established rules, and, though founded on considerations of public policy and general convenience, are not to be extended beyond the plain intent of the words of the statute." Hind v. Cole, 88 Tenn. 402, 403, 7 L. R. A. 96; 2 Spelling, Priv. Corp. § 921; Allison v. Coal Creek & N. R. Coal Co. 87 Tenn. 62, 63. Says Mr. Thompson, in his Commentaries on Private Corporations, vol. 3, § 4271: "It is a principle of legal procedure that when a party sues to enforce a liability created by a statute in derogation of the common law, he must not only distinctly aver, but he must make strict proof of, a case within the terms of the statute. The principle operates, if possible, more strongly where, as in the cases under consideration, the statute creates a liability in the nature of a penalty. The principle is believed to be a rule of right rather than a rule of procedure, and hence applicable in the equitable, as well as in the legal, forum." Where the liability is imposed upon "the directors assenting thereto," the creditor . . . must both allege and prove that the directors against whom he proceeds did assent to the unlawful contract." 3 Thomp. Priv. Corp. § 4266. Again, the same author, at § 4264, says: "On the other hand, where the liability . . . is 'for the excess,' an interpretation has been fallen into which assimilates their liability to that of guarantors of final payment, which is believed to comport best with the real policy of all such statutes, by holding that the effect of the statute is to make the directors individually liable for such specific debts only as were contracted with their assent in excess of the paid-up capital, and which remained unpaid after the exhaustion of the corporate assets."

These principles have all been recognized and applied by this court in the case of Allison v. Coal Creek & N. R. Coal Co. 87 Tenn. 62. The liability of a director is contingent, and is made to depend upon four conditions, namely: First, assent by him to the creation of the particular debt upon which he is sued; second, that the debt has not been paid; third, that the assets of the corporation have been exhausted; fourth, that the particular debt is in excess of the capital stock. Judge Lurton, in delivering the opinion of this court in Allison v. Coal Creek & N. R. Coal Co. said: "Unless the very debt upon which it is sought to hold the director to individual liability was created by the assent of the director, it is not the case provided for by the charter." The cardinal inquiry, then, upon this branch of the case is whether there is proof in this record of assent by the directors to the creation of the particular debts for which the directors are sought to be held individually liable under this statute. It is insisted by counsel for the directors that the assent contemplated by the statute must be given by the directors, not as individuals, nor even as stockholders, but in their capacity as directors. We are constrained to believe, upon mature consideration, that this construction is the proper one to be given this statute. This construction accords with the general rule that directors must act as an official body. Mr. Cook, in his work on Stock & Stockholders, states the rule thus: "Moreover, the directors can contract and act only as a board, duly notified and assembled. The members of the board cannot agree separately and outside of the meeting, and thereby bind the corporation. Nor can a minority of the board meet and bind the board. A majority must be present, and then a majority of that majority binds the corporation. A single director has no power to contract for the corporation." 2 Cook, Stock & Stockholders, & Corp. Law, § 712. So we think, when it is sought to hold a director to individual liability under the provisions of this highly penal statute, it must be shown that his assent was given in his capacity as director, acting concurrently with a majority of the official board. We do not hold that the only evidence of this official assent must be found in the minutes of the board, but we do hold there must have been an official meeting when assent was given, whether it appears in the minutes or otherwise. In other words, we hold the official minutes do not constitute the only evidence of official assent, provided it is made otherwise to appear that at a meeting of the official body the directors sought to be charged assented to the creation of the particular debt. Tested by this rule, we find, upon an examination of the record, that only one of the debts with which the directors are sought to be individually charged was officially assented to, namely, that in favor of Peter Staub for lease of foundry.

It is next assigned as error that the chancellor refused any relief against the directors on account of the payment of dividends amounting to $28,000. It is contended by counsel that said dividends were paid at a time and under circumstances that rendered the payment unlawful, and was a diversion of the assets of the corporation. The charter of this company provides, viz.: "If the directors declare and pay any dividend when the company is insolvent, or which declaration of a dividend would diminish the amount of the capital stock, they shall be jointly and severally liable to creditors for the amount of dividends thus declared. Any director may avoid liability by voting against the dividend or by filing his objections in writing as soon as he ascertains a dividend has been made." The dividends in question were paid, viz.: April 30, 1884, 4 per cent, $4,280; April 30, 1886, 4 per cent, $4,280; April 30, 1887, 4 per cent, $4,280; April 30, 1888, 4 per cent, $4,280; April 30, 1889, 5 per cent, $5,350; April 30, 1890, 6 per cent, $6,420. It is insisted that the first dividend, paid April 30, 1883, was paid out of the proceeds of the bonds which had been sold by the company at a discount of 22 per cent, and that the remaining dividends were paid at a time when the corporation was insolvent, and when its indebtedness exceeded the amount of its paid-up capital stock. The chancellor, upon the hearing, was of opinion that the directors were warranted in the payment of these dividends, and that the defendants were not liable to the creditors of the corporation. It is true, as argued by counsel, that when these dividends were declared the indebtedness of the corporation did exceed the amount of capital stock paid in; but under the statute last cited this fact does not determine the liability of directors. The inhibition of the statute is against declaring dividends when the company is insolvent, or when such dividends will diminish the amount of the capital stock. If the assets are reasonably worth, or are honestly believed to be worth, largely more than the company's indebtedness, and upon this basis profits are estimated, the company is not insolvent, although its indebtedness may exceed its capital stock paid in. The record discloses that when these dividends were declared this company was engaged in a very extensive business, and was realizing large receipts from the sale of the products of its manufacture. Its assets were estimated by its directors to be largely in excess of the company's liabilities, and the proof shows that said assets, which consisted largely of mineral lands, were largely more valuable then than at a later period. The proof indicates that during the years covering the declaration of dividends the company was realizing a net profit on its business, and there was no reason why those profits should not have been distributed among its stockholders. The conduct of the directors is to be viewed in the light of the financial status of the company at that period, and is not to be determined by its ultimate insolvency, precipitated, doubtless, by the universal paralysis of business then prevailing throughout the country. When the large volume of business transacted by this company is considered, it is not perceived how its insolvency could have been superinduced by the small dividends declared. We are of opinion there was no error in the action of the chancellor upon this branch of the case.

The next matter for consideration arises upon the answer and cross bill of Peter Staub. As a creditor of the car-wheel company, Staub, on May 13, 1892, became a party to the original proceedings, and filed an answer, in which he admitted the material allegations of the bill. His answer was also filed as a cross bill, in which it was alleged that on December 31, 1890, he leased to the car-wheel company his foundry property on Hardee street, in the city of Knoxville, for a term of five years, at a rental of $4,000 per annum, payable in monthly installments of $333.33. It is then alleged that the company is indebted to him in the sum of $1,500 on account of accrued rents, which he seeks to recover, and also asks a decree for the rents for the unexpired term as the same mature. It is further alleged that the directors of the company assented to the lease, and are individually liable to him, for the reason that at the time this lease was contracted the indebtedness of the company exceeded its paid-in capital stock. Complainant in the cross bill also joined in the prayer of the original bill for the appointment of a receiver. It further appears that on November 28, 1892, Staub filed a petition in said cause, stating that by reason of nonuser the foundry property was getting out of repair, and asking that proper repairs be made by the receiver. Petitioner further prayed that the leasehold be sold, alleging that the value of the lease was being deteriorated each day. It further appears that upon motion of counsel for Staub the chancellor allowed as a preferred claim all rents accrued and accruing upon the leasehold property from May 10, 1892, date of appointment of temporary receiver, up to date of confirmation of sale of leasehold, which the receiver was ordered to pay out of any funds in his hands belonging to the company. In accordance with the decree of the chancellor, the unexpired term of the lease was sold by the clerk and master, and purchased by the Clark Foundry & Machine Company at the price of $4,500. This amount not being sufficient to discharge balance of rent for the unexpired term, the chancellor decreed that the company should be liable for the difference between the amount realized from the sale of the leasehold and the sum contracted to be paid in the lease, and he accordingly pronounced a judgment against the company for this deficit, amounting to the sum of $3,600. Two assignments of error are based upon the action of the chancellor in his disposition of the matters presented in this lease. The first is that he erred in decreeing that the car-wheel company was indebted to Peter Staub in the sum of $3,600 on account of the unexpired term of the lease; that this unexpired term had been sold to the Clark Foundry & Machine Company, and the purchaser became obligated with the payment of the entire rental. We think the proposition embodied in this assignment, that the purchaser, after buying the unexpired term of the lease at chancery sale, should nevertheless be charged with the contract rental of the original lease for balance of term, carries on its face its own refutation. The second assignment is that the court erred in holding that the rents accruing from the Staub lease after the appointment of the receiver up to date of confirmation of sale of leasehold constituted a first charge upon the funds and property in the receiver's hands, and ordering same paid as an expense of the receivership. In support of this assignment counsel for appellant argue that complainant Staub became a party to the original bill in this cause by which the car-wheel company was enjoined from prosecuting its business or using its leasehold property, and had a permanent receiver appointed, and the leasehold sold; in a word, that the possession and holding of the leasehold estate from May 10, 1892, until it was sold, and sale confirmed, was all done at the instance and for the benefit of Staub, the lessor. It is contended, however, by counsel for Staub, that the receiver took possession of the property, and proceeded to rent some of it to tenants. The evidence wholly fails to show any renting of the property by the receiver, nor is there any proof that the receiver has ever charged or received any rent for such occupation. At most the record shows that one or two persons were permitted to occupy a part of the premises temporarily. As suggested by counsel, for aught that appears in this record, "this temporary use may have been for the protection and preservation of the property." It is insisted by counsel that such temporary occupation of the property by permission of the receiver would not be an adoption of the lease by the receiver, so as to bind the assets in his hands. Again, it is insisted that the receiver had no authority to adopt this lease, and, even if he had attempted to do so, it would not bind the complainant or the creditors. It is then suggested that complainant Staub in none of his pleadings had ever claimed that the receiver was liable for the rents, or that he had adopted the lease. "A receiver derives his authority from the act of the court appointing him, and not from the act of the parties at whose suggestion or by whose consent he is appointed; and the utmost effect of his appointment is to put the property from that time into his custody as an officer of the court for the benefit of the party ultimately proved to be entitled, but not to change the title, or even the right of possession in the property." Union Nat. Bank v. Bank of Kansas City, 136 U. S. 223, 34 L. ed. 341. As observed in another case: "The ordinary chancery receiver, such as we have in this case, is clothed with no estate in the property, but is a mere custodian of it for the court: and, by special authority, may become an officer of the court to effect a sale of the property, if that be deemed necessary for the benefit of the parties concerned. If the order of the court, under which the receiver acts, embraces the leasehold estate, it becomes his duty, of course, to take possession of it. But he does not, by taking such possession, become assignee of the term, in any proper sense of the word. He holds that, as he would hold any other personal property involved,—for and as the land of the court, and not as assignee of the term." Gaither v. Stockbridge, 67 Md. 222; Quincy, M. & P. R. Co. v. Humphreys, 145 U. S. 86, 36 L. ed. 633. "In order to bind a receiver, or one standing in a like relation to a leasehold estate, for rents, he must elect to accept the lease, and he thereby becomes vested with the title to the leasehold interest." Re Otis, 101 N. Y. 585. We infer, from briefs of counsel filed in this cause, that the chancellor allowed these rents to Staub as a preferred claim upon the idea that they were properly chargeable to the receiver as an operating expense. We find nothing in the record to warrant such an assumption; nor is there any basis for the other contention,—that there was in fact an adoption of this lease by the receiver. In our opinion, the action of the chancellor in allowing as a prior charge upon the funds in the hands of the receiver rents that accrued from the appointment of the receiver until the confirmation of the sale of the leasehold was clearly erroneous.

The result is that complainants are entitled to a decree against Staub on his refunding bond for the rents so improperly allowed him.

The decree of the chancellor in the particulars herein indicated will be modified, but in all other respects affirmed.

v.

George E. MILLER and Wife.

(.....Tenn.....)

1. The right of the owner of property destroyed by fire to recover damages from another by whose fault it was burned is, as against the defendant, unaffected by the fact that he may have already received full payment for his loss by insurance, and that the insurer is entitled to be subrogated to the claim.
2. The unauthorized storage of cotton by a tenant in a building hired for the storage of vehicles makes him liable for injury resulting to the building by fire which is due to the more dangerous nature of the cotton.
3. The measure of damages for partial destruction of a building is the reasonable cost of restoring it so that it will be as valuable as it was before, considering its age and depreciation; and it is not the cost of a new building the same as that destroyed.
4. The proximate cause of damages to a building by fire when cotton is stored therein without right is the storage of cotton therein, if except for that the fire could have been extinguished with little or no damage.

(January 17, 1896.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Davidson County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover loss caused by fire alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Robert L. Morris, for appellant Anderson, and Messrs. Steger, Washington, & Jackson, for appellant Grantland;

Upon payment by the insurers of a loss by fire communicated from the locomotive engine of a railroad the assured became a trustee for the insurers, and they might bring an action in his name against the railroad company which he could not release.

Hart v. Western R. Corp. 13 Met. 99, 46 Am. Dec. 719.

The insurance company having paid the loss, the debt is not thereby extinguished, but the company is subrogated to all rights of the mortgagee against the mortgagor, and may compel the assignment of the debt and mortgage to it.

Wilkes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for damages growing out of a fire upon premises belonging to plaintiffs, Miller and wife, but occupied by Anderson,

NOTE.—The above case is one of the few which have directly decided that the existence of insurance or the payment of a loss by insurers constitutes no defense to an action by the owner of property for tort or negligence causing its destruction or loss. The other cases are believed to sustain the present decision without conflict, while the 31 L. R. A.

principle of the decision is necessarily recognized in that large number of cases which establish the right of subrogation in favor of the insurer against the person causing the loss. For some of these, see note to Insurance Co. of N. A. v. Easton (Tex.) 3 L. R. A. 424.

and by Grantland as lessee or tenant under Anderson. The cause was tried before the court and jury, and judgment rendered for plaintiffs for $1,700, and defendants have appealed, and assigned errors.

It appears that Anderson and Mrs. Miller owned adjoining store or business houses in Nashville, the buildings being only a few inches apart; the roofs coming down together, and being drained by the same gutter. In August, 1891, Anderson, being pressed for room in his building, rented Mrs. Miller's building, or a part of it, from her agent for the purpose of storing his buggies and carriages on the first floor. It is a matter of some controversy whether he was to have the use of the basement and second story, or only the first; and this question was submitted to the jury under a proper charge. However this may be, he subrented to Grantland the basement and second story for the storage of cotton, and it was occupied by him for this purpose from November, 1891, to February 24, 1892, so far as the record discloses, without the plaintiffs' knowledge. At that date a fire originated in Anderson's house or factory, completely destroying it, as well as the roof and part of the second story floor and the rear windows and frames of Mrs. Miller's house. Mrs. Miller's building was fully insured, and she collected from the insurance company $2,420 in full of her loss. She used $1,980.50 of this amount to repair her building, making it as valuable as before the fire. She then sued Anderson and Grantland, averring that Anderson only rented the first story of her building for storing buggies, etc., and he and Grantland had wrongfully taken possession of the second story, and permitted cotton to be stored therein, by reason of which fact fire was conveyed into the second story from the Anderson building, and burned the floor and roof, and made it difficult and well nigh impossible to extinguish the fire, so that the floor and roof were destroyed. A separate count admits the rightful possession of the second story, but alleges that cotton, a highly inflammable substance, was stored therein contrary to express agreement. Several pleas were filed, both general and special. Among the latter, it was set up that plaintiff had been already paid the full value of her house by the insurance company, and that the insurance company was subrogated to all of plaintiff's rights of action. These pleas were, on motion, stricken out as insufficient, and this is assigned as error. It is also assigned as error that the trial judge committed an error in his charge to the jury, which will be fully considered hereafter. It is also assigned as error that the court charged that the measure of damages was the reasonable cost of restoring property to its former condition. Other errors are assigned, which are not material, and need not be specially considered, except that the court charged the jury that the rights of Grantland were measured by those of Anderson, because it was through him he occupied the premises.

In regard to the proper parties to the action, we do not think the assignment well taken. If it be conceded that the insurance company, having paid the entire fire loss, is now entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the insured, 31 L. R. A.

as against the tortfeasor, or to recover back from him the amount he recovers, still it does not prevent a recovery in the name of the insured for the damages sustained. The question of who will be entitled to the proceeds of the recovery,—the insurer or the insured,—is a matter between them, and constitutes no defense to an action for the damages, caused by the wrong, which, in any event, must be brought in the name of the owner and insured, although it might be for the use of the insurer. 24 Am. & Eng. In Perrott v. Shearer, 17 Mich. 48, the defendant, a sheriff, wrongfully levied on goods, the property of the plaintiff, assignee. The assignee had insured said goods, and they were destroyed while in the possession of defendant sheriff. In an action to recover the value of the goods, the defendant pleaded that the plaintiff had been paid value of same by the insurance company. Cooley, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court, and said: "He [the defendant] is found to be a wrongdoer in seizing the goods, and he cannot relieve himself from responsibility to account for their full value, except by restoring them. He has no concern with any contract the plaintiff may have with any other party, in regard to the goods, and his rights or liabilities can neither be increased nor diminished by the fact that such a contract exists. He has no equities as against the plaintiff which can entitle him, under any circumstances, to an assignment of the plaintiff's policies of insurance. The accidental destruction of the goods in his hands was one of the risks he run when the trespass was committed, and we do not see how the law can relieve him from the consequences. If the owner, under such circumstances, keeps his interest insured, he cannot be held to pay the money expended for that purpose for the interest of the trespasser. He already has a right of action for the full value of the goods, and he does not give that away by taking a contract of insurance. For the latter he pays an equivalent in the premium, and is therefore entitled to the benefit of it, if any benefit shall result. The trespasser pays nothing for it, and is therefore justly entitled to no return. The case, we think, is within the principle of Merrick v. Brainard, 38 Barb. 574, which appears to us to have been correctly decided. The plaintiff recovers of the defendant for the wrong that has been done him in taking his goods; and he recovers of the insurance company a large sum for a small outlay, because such payment was the risk they assumed, and for which they were fairly compensated. It is not a question of importance in this inquiry, whether the act of the defendant caused the loss or not. His equitable claim to a reduction of damages, if he could have any, would spring from the fact that the plaintiff recovers pay for his property twice; but the answer to this is that he recovers but once for the wrong done him, and he receives the insurance money upon a contract to which the defendant is in no way privy, and in respect to which his own wrongful act can give him no equities." Perrott v. Shearer, 17 Mich. 55, 56.

Clark v. Wilson, 103 Mass. 219, 4 Am. Rep. 532, was an action for wrongful conversion of a boat. Plaintiff had received from an insurance company the full value of the vessel, but sued the defendant for conversion. It was pleaded that plaintiff had received from an insurance company full value of the vessel, and that therefore the right of action, if any, was in the insurance company. The court said: "The result is that, allowing to the abandonment made by the plaintiffs, and the recovery and payment of a total loss, the full effect, for which the defendant contends, of an abandonment by an absolute owner, and payment of a total loss to him, they did not defeat the right to bring an action at law in the name of the plaintiffs for the tort previously committed against them. The question whether the damages recovered will belong to them or to the insurers is a question in which the defendant has no interest, and which is not now in issue." Clark v. Wilson, 103 Mass. 227, 4 Am. Rep. 532.

In Weber v. Morris & E. R. Co. 35 N. J. L. 409, 10 Am. Rep. 253 (action of insured against a railroad company for the benefit of an insurance company, the insurance company having paid the amount of loss), the court said: "Notwithstanding such payment, an action will lie by the insured against the railroad company. The insurance is to be treated as a mere indemnity, and the insured and insurer regarded as one person; therefore payment by the insurer before suit brought cannot affect the right of action. In Mason v. Sainsbury, reported in 3 Dougl. 61, suit was brought on the riot act to recover damages for the demolition of a house in the riots of 1780. The property having been insured in a fire office, which paid the loss, the action was in the name of the insured, for the benefit of the insurance office. Lord Mansfield held that payment by the insurer was not in case of the hundred, and not as co-obligors, and that the case must be considered as if not a farthing had been paid. 'He likened it to the case of abandonment in marine insurance, where the insurer is constantly put in the place of the insured.' Chief Justice Abbott, in citing the case of Mason v. Sainsbury, in Clark v. Inhabitants of the Hundred of Blything, 2 Barn. & C. 254, says he could not entertain any doubt of its propriety; and he held that where the owner of certain stacks of hay and corn, which were maliciously set on fire, received the amount of his loss from the insurance office, he might,—nevertheless, maintain his action against the hundred. In Yates v. Whyte, 4 Bing. N. C. 272, which was the case of a collision at sea, the plaintiff recovered his whole loss, notwithstanding his prior recovery of a portion of it 81 L. R. A.

from the underwriters, the court saying that the plaintiff would hold in trust for the underwriters such portion as they had paid him. These cases are referred to and their authority recognized, by Chief Justice Shaw, in Hurt v. Western R. Corp. 13 Met. 99, 46 Am. Dec. 719, and in Monmouth County Mut. Ins. Co. v. Hutchinson, 21 N. J. Eq. 107, this rule is said to be settled." Weber v. Morris & E. R. Co. 35 N. J. L. 413, 10 Am. Rep. 253.

In Hayward v. Cain, 105 Mass. 213 (action by insured against the defendant for maliciously setting fire to plaintiff's building), the plaintiff received amount of damage from insurance company. The court said the transactions between the insurers and the owners of the property injured were matters in which the wrongdoer had no concern, "and which do not affect the measure of his liability."

In regard to the measure of damages the charge of the court was correct in directing the jury that it would be the reasonable cost of restoring the property to its former condition. This does not mean, as argued by counsel, that it was the cost of a new building, the same as that destroyed, and the jury could not have so understood it; but the proper construction was that the building, as restored, should be of equal value to that destroyed, taking age and depreciation into consideration,—in other words, to reinstate plaintiff as before the fire. The jury was told, in express terms, that no recovery could be had if Anderson rented the entire building, or had permission to store cotton therein, or that such storage was the ordinary and usual use of the building.

The only other question material to be considered is whether the act of the defendants in storing the cotton in the house was the proximate cause of the loss, and whether the charge of the court upon this point was misleading or not. It is insisted that the proximate cause was the fire which originated on Anderson's premises, and, no negligence of defendants being shown in connection therewith, defendants would not be liable. On the other hand, it is insisted that this fire would not have communicated to plaintiffs' house but for the cotton stored therein, and hence this storage was the proximate cause of plaintiffs' loss, and not the fire originating elsewhere. The definitions of "proximate cause" are easily given in general terms, but they are very difficult in practical application to the facts of each particular case. There is, however, a marked distinction between the proximate cause of an accident, and the proximate cause of the injury resulting from the accident. This is illustrated in the case of Deming v. Merchants Cottonpress Storage Co. 90 Tenn. 553, 13 L. R. A. 518, in which the court said: "It is true that the fire destroyed the cotton, and in that sense caused the loss, but it appears that, notwithstanding the occurrence of the fire, the cotton would not have been burned by it had not the breaking of the train while it was being removed happened so that, but for this fact, the cotton would have been saved. This [the breaking of the train] must therefore be held to be the proximate cause of the loss, and, if it was the result of negligence, the carrier must answer for it." In East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Kelly, 91 Tenn. 699, 17 L. R. A.

691, goods were consumed by fire which was not the result of defendant's negligence, but the goods would never have become exposed to the fire but for the negligent failure and refusal to deliver the goods on demand previous to the fire; so that, while the fire caused the loss, the failure to deliver caused the injury. In Postal Tel. Cable Co. v. Zopff, 93 Tenn. 374, the same distinction is illustrated, where the fall of a young girl was caused by the slippery condition of a walk way, but the injury proximately resulted from the telegraph company negligently leaving its pole where she fell upon it, and received an injury which would not have resulted but for the presence of the pole, even though she had fallen. In that case a hypothetical case is put, to further illustrate the distinction of a person falling upon an ice-covered pavement into an open cellar. In such case the ice is the cause of the fall, but the open cellar may cause an injury which, but for it, would not have occurred. This case collates many authorities recognizing and enforcing the same distinction. Id. 93 Tenn. 375. With this distinction in view, the question of liability of defendants is easily solved. The jury were properly instructed, in regard to Anderson's rights under his rental agreement, that if he rented the premises with the understanding that he might store cotton in them, or such storage was a reasonably safe use of the premises,—attended with no more danger than the purposes to which he intended to put them,—then the defendants would not be liable, but if the storing of cotton was a more dangerous use than the storing of vehicles, for which he rented the premises, or if he occupied the premises without authority for any purpose, then he would be liable for the injury which resulted. The jury evidently found this contention unfavorable to Mr. Anderson, and the record justifies and warrants such finding.

The only question remaining is, Did this unauthorized storage of cotton on the premises proximately cause the injury? The court instructed the jury that "if they found the fire was not communicated to plaintiffs' house by the cotton, but that the inflammable nature thereof prevented the firemen from being able to extinguish the fire, and that it could have been extinguished, but for the presence of this cotton, with little or no damage to the property, then the plaintiffs are entitled to recover such damages as immediately and proximately resulted therefrom." In connection with this he further said: "If you find that the cotton was the proximate cause of the burning of the plaintiffs' house, in being the means without which the fire would never have been communicated to plaintiffs' house, then plaintiffs can recover. On the other hand, if you find that the cotton did not, in the first instance, communicate the fire to plaintiffs' building, and that it was not the proximate cause of the burning of the house, and if you further find that it did not operate as the efficient cause which prevented the firemen from extinguishing the fire in time to save the building, but simply intensified the flame and smoke of the burning building, or if you find that substantially the same damage would have resulted to plaintiffs' property, even though there had been no cotton stored therein, then plaintiffs cannot recover for any damage to the building on account of said fire. So if the fire accidentally originated in the adjacent building, and this accidental fire was the proximate cause of the injury to plaintiffs' building, then plaintiffs cannot recover therefor. By 'proximate cause,' as used in the foregoing instructions to you, and as elsewhere used in this charge, is meant the efficient, controlling event or act that produced the injury,—the act or event which, without any intervening cause, brought about the injury complained of." This charge is altogether fair and favorable to the defendants. We think the court might even have said that if defendants had put their premises to an unauthorized use, by storing inflammable material therein, then they would have been liable for a fire, no matter when or how originating, if it communicated to the building by reason of the presence of such material, and would not have communicated with or injured the building but for the presence of the inflammable, unauthorized material stored. Here the wrong consisted and the injury resulted from the storage (unauthorized) of inflammable material where it was liable to be reached by a fire, no matter when or how originating, in adjoining premises, and which would have been harmless to this building but for the unauthorized presence of this inflammable material. The principle would have been the same if benzine, naphtha, gunpowder, or other easily inflammable or combustible material had been stored, without permission, where it could be reached by a fire which would not have communicated with other, less inflammable material, or could have been more easily controlled or prevented.

The court charged the jury that the rights of Mr. Grantland were to be measured by those of Anderson, because it was through him that he occupied the premises. This is correct, and the jury no doubt understood that his liability, as well as his right, was commensurate with that of Anderson, so far as plaintiffs were concerned. Although Mr. Grantland may have rented in good faith, believing that Anderson had the right to sublet to him, still the fact remains that he, as well as Anderson, was a trespasser and wrongdoer; and Anderson could no more authorize Grantland to put the premises to an unwarranted use than he could put them to such use himself, and both stand upon the same ground of liability to the plaintiffs. Smith v. East End Street R. Co. 87 Tenn. 636; Iron Mountain R. Co. v. Bingham, 87 Tenn. 523, 4 L. R. A. 622.

We find no reversible error in the record, and the judgment of the court below is affirmed, with costs.

MAINE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

George O. DANFORTH

v.

Etta M. DANFORTH.

(88 Me. 120.)

A divorce from a wife for "utter desertion continued for three consecutive years" may be granted under Rev. Stat. chap. 80, § 2, where she deserts her husband and remains away from him for the full period continuously, and unreasonably refuses to return, although once during that time he visited her and for two or three nights occupied the same bed with her.

(June 5, 1895.)

REPORT by the Superior Court of Kennebec County for the opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court of a question arising in a divorce suit upon the alleged ground of desertion as to whether the period of desertion had been uninterrupted. Ruling in plaintiff's favor.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Mr. W. T. Haines, for libellant:

Desertion means a breaking off of cohabitation, and one, two, or even three instances of intercourse should not work to renew cohabitation in marital relations, when all other conditions show it to remain completely broken off with intention of perpetual desertion.

Stewart v. Stewart, 78 Me. 549, 57 Am. Rep. 822.

To establish desertion, three things are necessary, first, cessation from cohabitation (to live together as man and wife) continuing the necessary time; second, the intention in the mind of the deserter not to resume cohabitation; third, the absence of the other party's consent to the separation, or conduct justifying the same.

Southwick v. Southwick, 97 Mass. 327, 98 Am. Dec. 95; Reid v. Reid, 21 N. J. Eq. 331; Steele v. Steele, 1 MacArth. 505.

Although the parties are apparently together for a time, this is not a renewal of cohabitation if the intention of desertion continues.

Kennedy v. Kennedy, 87 Ill. 250; Meldowney v. Meldowney, 27 N. J. Eq. 328; Gaillard v. Gaillard, 23 Miss. 152; Rie v. Rie, 34 Ark. 37.

Messrs. W. H. Newell and W. N. Judkins for libellee.

NOTE.—The general subject of divorces for desertion was considered in a note to Herold v. Herold (N. J.) 9 L. R. A. 696. See also, as to what constitutes desertion, Williams v. Williams (N. Y.) 14 L. R. A. 220.

For refusal of marital intercourse as desertion, see Fritts v. Fritts (Ill.) 14 L. R. A. 685, and note. 31 L. R. A.

Walton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question is this: If a wife deserts her husband, and remains away from him for three consecutive years, and during all that time continuously and unreasonably refuses to return, will the fact that, within the three years, her husband once visited her and occupied the same bed with her for two or three nights, necessarily interrupt the desertion, and bar his right to a divorce for that cause?

We think not. Desertion, such as will be a valid cause for a divorce, is not easily defined. Stewart v. Stewart, 78 Me. 548, 57 Am. Rep. 822, and cases there cited. And it may be equally difficult to define what will constitute an interruption or condonation of desertion. The authorities are conflicting and confusing.

In Kennedy v. Kennedy, 87 Ill. 250, where a wife, without justification, refused to go to a new home which her husband had prepared for her, and remained away for the statutory length of time necessary to create a valid ground for divorce, the court held that the fact that, on one occasion, he cohabited with her at her brother's house, did not interrupt the desertion or bar his right to a divorce.

And we have reached the same conclusion. "Utter desertion, continued for three consecutive years," is one of the causes for which a divorce may be granted. Rev. Stat. chap. 80, § 2. And we think that if a wife deserts her husband, and remains away from him for the full period of three consecutive years, and, during all that time, continuously and unreasonably refuses to return, his right to a divorce is complete, and cannot be defeated by proof that on one occasion, within the three years, he visited his wife, and, for two or three nights, occupied the same bed with her.

Such a visit is not illegal or improper. On the contrary, it has often been held to be the duty of the husband to visit his absent wife, and to endeavor by all proper means to effect a reconciliation. If he succeeds, and his wife returns to her home, and to her duties as his wife, undoubtedly her prior desertion will be interrupted or regarded as condoned, and cannot be added to a subsequent desertion for the purpose of completing the three years necessary to entitle her husband to a divorce. But if, in spite of his efforts, his wife persistently and unreasonably refuses to return, and continuously remains away from him for three consecutive years, we think her husband's right to a divorce is complete; that the mere fact that on one occasion he visited her, and for two or three nights occupied the same bed with her, does not interrupt the continuity of her desertion.

Case remanded, for further hearing in the court below.

I. Necessity of participation; general doctrine.

The statute of 13 Eliz. chap. 5, made perpetual by 29 Eliz. chap. 5, which is the last of a series of statutes on the subject, though repeatedly held and stated to be merely declaratory of the common law, seems to be regarded as the foundation of all the modern law of fraudulent conveyances. It declares all conveyances or other disposition of property, real or personal, made with the intention of defrauding creditors, to be null and void as against them, with the proviso that nothing therein contained shall extend to defeat any estate or interest made on good consideration and bona fide to any person having at the time no notice of such fraud. It is still in force in England and has been re-enacted in Ireland and has been adopted by a number of the American states including Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Delaware, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Iowa, while the statutes of the other states are modeled after it and are in the main simply a re-enactment of it.

Under these statutes the rule may be said to be practically universal, that a transfer by a debtor to a creditor in payment of his claim, made with intent upon the part of the vendor to hinder, delay, or defraud his other creditors, participated in by the purchaser, is invalid as against such creditors.

80b, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 1, decided in 1801, which is a leading case with relation to fraudulent conveyances, and which seems to have always been regarded as the fountain and source of modern law on the subject, in which it was held that a gift made by a debtor in satisfaction of a debt exceeding in value the property given was void where the creditor knew of a judgment and execution against the debtor and took the property with a view to defeat their collection.

And substantially the same rule was laid down and acted upon in Pulliam v. Newberry, 41 Ala. 168 (1867); Martin v. Estes (Mo.) 34 S. W. 53 (1896); Henderson v. Henderson, 55 Mo. 534 (1870); Meyberg v. Jacobs, 40 Mo. App. 128 (1890); Devries v. Phillips, 63 N. C. 53 (1868); Gillespie v. Allen, 37 W. Va. 675 (1893).

And it will be seen that it is supported, either directly or indirectly, by numerous cases cited below in this as well as in other subdivisions.

A transfer of property to a creditor, intended to cut off the redress of other creditors, may be fraudulent by reason of the delay and hindrance to which it subjects them, though it was made to pay a debt. Hough v. Dickinson, 58 Mich. 89 (1895).

And a transfer by a debtor to a creditor, made to hinder, delay, and defraud the other creditors of the debtor, of which intent the creditor was aware and participated in by accepting the transfer to enable him to consummate his fraudulent purpose, renders the transaction fraudulent and void without reference to the question of the amount of the consideration. Commercial Bank v. Bolton, 87 Hun. 647 (1895).

And though the debtor finally intended to pay all his indebtedness. Roberts v. Radcliff, 35 Kan. 502 (1896).

So, a purchase by a bona fide creditor, the real object of which was not the payment of his debt but simply to give a colorable appearance of a sale when in fact nothing was intended, is fraudulent as against creditors of the vendor. Hartshorn v. Eames, 31 Me. 98 (1849).

And a conveyance made by an insolvent husband to his wife with intent on the part of the husband, participated in by his wife, to hinder, delay, or defeat a creditor in the collection of his debt, is invalid as against creditors, though the consideration may have been a valid pre-existing debt due to her. Peeler v. Peeler, 109 N. C. 623 (1891).

And a purchaser who takes a conveyance of his debtor's property with knowledge that he is about to abscond from his creditors, with the view of aiding him to convert his property into funds so that he may the more readily effect his purpose, participates in the fraud of the debtor so as to invalidate the conveyance as against creditors. Garr v. Hill, 9 N. J. Eq. 210 (1852).

So, a conveyance by a debtor after a verdict against him and previous to the entry of the judgment thereon, to a creditor to pay and satisfy a debt due him where the debtor had ample means, independent of the real estate, to pay and satisfy the debt owing by him, which is received and accepted by the creditor with full knowledge of that fact and with intent to defraud the creditor who obtained the verdict, is fraudulent and void and will

a proper disposition of the case can be arrived at from the acts of the parties without regard to the intent.

4. Fraud cannot be imputed to an honest creditor because in taking his debtor's stock of goods to settle his claim he advised him to keep the money he had in bank and his accounts.

be set aside. Waterbury v. Sturtevant, 18 Wend. 353 (1837).

And judgments obtained by a creditor against a debtor for the purpose of aiding him in hindering, delaying, and defrauding his creditors, and in covering up his property, under which his property is sold and placed in the name of his wife, are fraudulent and void and will be set aside independently of the question of the bona fides of the claims upon which the judgments are rendered. Smith v. Schwed, 9 Fed. Rep. 483 (1881).

So, the rule that a mortgage or trust deed made by a debtor to or for the benefit of a creditor with intent upon the part of the mortgagor to defraud his other creditors, participated in by the mortgagee or beneficiary, is void as against such creditors though founded upon a good consideration or given for a valid debt, is equally well settled and universal.

This is the rule substantially stated and acted upon in Wilson v. Horr, 15 Iowa, 489 (1884); Fish v. McDonnell, 42 Minn. 519 (1890); Alberger v. White, 117 Mo. 847 (1893); Moline Wagon Co. v. Rummell, 14 Fed. Rep. 155 (1882); Landauer v. Mack, 43 Neb. 430 (1895); Moore v. Williamson, 44 N. J. Eq. 496, 1 L. R. A. 398 (1898); Holt v. Creamer, 34 N. J. Eq. 181 (1881); Smith v. Hardy, 36 Wis. 417 (1874); Stinson v. Hawkins, 4 McCrary, 500 (1882); Rindskopf v. Vaughan, 40 Fed. Rep. 304 (1889); Farmers' Bank v. Douglass, 11 Smedes & M. 469 (1848); and it will also be found to be supported by cases below.

Thus, a valid consideration for a mortgage will not validate it where the mortgagee entertained a fraudulent purpose in taking it. Bussard v. Bullett (Iowa) 64 N. W. 658 (1895).

And proof that a mortgage executed by an insolvent debtor was given to secure a debt actually owing by the mortgagor does not as a matter of law disprove the existence of a fraudulent intent on the part of the parties. Billings v. Russell, 101 N. Y. 226 (1886).

So, a mortgage made by a partner upon partnership assets, the evident purpose of which was to use the firm assets to pay for the homestead of the partner, which purpose was known to the creditors claiming under the mortgage, and which they assisted in getting up, is fraudulent and void as to other creditors. Johnston v. Standard Shoe Co. 5 Tex. Civ. App. 896.

And a mortgage made by a debtor to a creditor to secure a valid debt, which was but one of a series of acts by which the mortgagor intended to delay certain other creditors, is invalid where the mortgagee consciously lent his aid in furtherance of the mortgagor's design. Bryant v. Fink, 75 Iowa, 516 (1888).

And a mortgage by a failing debtor not intended to secure any debt, but designed to secure the mortgaged property against attachment or execution in favor of other creditors, is void as to such creditors, and will be set aside at their instance. Wilson v. Horr, 15 Iowa, 489 (1884).

And a fraudulent combination between a mortgagor and a mortgagee of chattels after the execution of the mortgage in good faith to secure a bona fide indebtedness, but before possession taken thereunder, to defraud the creditors of the mortgagor and deprive them of the benefit of the surplus, renders the whole transaction, including the mortgage, void as against such creditors. Hadley v. Adair (Kan.) 42 Pac. 836 (1895).

5. A bill of sale in satisfaction of debts cannot be turned into an assignment by the fact that the creditor agrees to pay other claims against the debtor, if the liability is absolute and not dependent on the disposition made of the property.

(January 4, 1896.)

So, the title of a person claiming under a writ of sequestration issued by the court of chancery, is superior to that of a mortgagee under a mortgage made in order to avoid the effect of the writ and with full knowledge on the part of the mortgagee of all the circumstances, though given for full value. Ward v. Booth, L. R. 14 Eq. 195, 41 L. J. Ch. 729, 27 L. T. N. S. 364, 20 Week. Rep. 880 (1872).

And one who had made advances in good faith upon a consignment of property in the belief that the consignors were solvent and did not contemplate bankruptcy is entitled to hold as against a mortgage previously made upon the same property with intent to defraud the creditors of the mortgagor, in which intent the mortgagee shared. Blanchard v. McKey, 125 Mass. 124 (1878).

And a mortgage given by a father to his daughter pending a compromise with his creditors, which included a mortgage on his homestead with intent on his part to defraud and hinder such creditors, will be postponed to the mortgage given pursuant to the compromise where it was taken by her with knowledge of his object, though it is claimed to have been given to secure to her moneys advanced, and also for services rendered in his family. Miller v. Sauerbier, 30 N. J. Eq. 71 (1878).

And where it is apparent upon the face of a deed of assignment or mortgage made by an insolvent debtor, that it was made for the purpose of hindering, delaying, or defrauding creditors, it is the duty of the court to instruct the jury that the deed is void, and the question of the fraudulent intent of the grantor should not be left to the determination of the jury. Bigelow v. Stringer, 40 Mo. 185 (1867).

On the other hand, the rule is equally well settled that a sale by a debtor to his creditor in payment of his claim is not invalidated by the fact that it was made with an intent upon the part of the vendor to delay, hinder, or defraud his creditors where such intent was not known to or participated in by the purchaser. This was the ground of decision in H. B. Claffin Co. v. Rodenberg, 101 Ala. 213 (1893); Warren v. Jones, 68 Ala. 449 (1890); Christian v. Greenwood, 23 Ark. 264, 79 Am. Dec. 104 (1861); Smith v. Jensen, 13 Colo. 213 (1889); Schroeder v. Walsh, 120 Ill. 403 (1887); Hanchett v. Kintark, 118 Ill. 121 (1886); Kuhlenbeck v. Hotz, 53 Ill. App. 675 (1894); Stainbrook v. Duncan, 45 Ill. App. 344 (1892); Wilson v. Fawcner, 38 Ill. App. 438 (1890); Burtis v. Humboldt County Bank, 77 Iowa, 103 (1889); Citizens' Bank v. Rhutasel, 68 Iowa, 537 (1896); Schram v. Taylor, 51 Kan. 547 (1893); Beurmann v. Van Buren, 44 Mich. 498 (1890); Schroeder v. Bobbitt, 108 Mo. 289 (1882); Knox v. Hunt, 18 Mo. 174 (1853); Little v. Eddy, 14 Mo. 160 (1851); Peters-Miller Shoe Co. v. Casebeer, 58 Mo. App. 640 (1893); Frank v. Curtis, 58 Mo. App. 349 (1894); Rothell v. Grimes, 22 Neb. 526 (1887); Bank of Commerce v. Schlotfeldt, 40 Neb. 212 (1894); Archer v. O'Brien, 7 Hun. 146 (1876); Evans v. Kilgore, 29 W. N. C. 279 (1891); Anderson v. Pilgram, 41 S. C. 423 (1891); Haas v. Kraus, 86 Tex. 687 (1894); Kinnear v. White, 2 Kerr (N. B.) 235.

Satisfactory evidence of collusion in the fraudulent intent by the grantee is necessary. Smith v. Jensen, supra.

He must not only have had notice of, but must also have participated in, such fraudulent intent. Treusch v. Ottenburg, 54 Fed. Rep. 867, 6 U. S. App. 403 (1893).

And a creditor who takes property from his APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Garland County in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover damages for defendants' alleged wrongful interference by attachment with property belonging to plaintiffs. Reversed.

Statement by Harrod, Special Judge:
On the 15th day of December, 1890, Jones & Fulton, a firm of merchants in Hot Springs, Ark., executed the following instrument:
Know all men by these presents, that for and in consideration of the sum of $8,000.00, debtor at its fair market value in payment of a valid, subsisting mortgage held by him, acting in good faith, is entitled to recover the value thereof from another creditor who causes the property to be seized and sold under attachment as that of the debtor. Furth v. Snell, 6 Wash. 542 (1893).

And a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration without notice under a deed of trust, not void upon its face, cannot be affected by any intended fraud of the grantor in the trust deed. Ewing v. Cargill, 13 Smedes & M. 79 (1849).

So, a conveyance of real estate by a husband to his wife in payment of a valid debt held by her, against him, will not be set aside so as to subject the real estate to the payment of a debt of the husband, unless it clearly appears that the wife knew of the alleged fraudulent intent of the husband in conveying the real estate to her, and took the conveyance in order to delay or defraud his creditors. Lippert v. Edwards, 39 Ind. 165 (1872).

And such a conveyance, though accompanied by many badges of fraud, will not be set aside as against creditors where there is nothing to charge the wife with notice of the alleged fraudulent intention of her husband. Meyer v. Sulzbacher, 76 Ala. 120 (1884).

And a conveyance of lands to a husband in satisfaction of a demand for damages against the grantor for alienation of a wife's affections is valid as against creditors of the grantor where no fraud appears on the part of the husband. Carlisle v. Gaskill, 4 Ind. 219 (1853).

And the intent of a husband to defraud his creditors in conveying chattels to his wife equal in value to moneys handed to him by her, consisting of the proceeds from the sale of her lands and timber, which he then orally promised to repay with interest at 8 per cent, will not vitiate her title unless she participated in or had knowledge of such intent. State, Brown, v. Mitchell, 102 N. C. 347 (1899).

So, a conveyance by a son to his mother is good as against his creditors where she was an honest and meritorious creditor having loaned moneys to him at various times out of funds which she received from the estate of her husband, and stood entirely clear of any design to aid him in any fraud. Roe v. Moore, 35 N. J. Eq. 526.

And a purchase by a daughter of an owner of lands at execution sale with moneys furnished by him with intent to defraud his creditors vests title in her good as against such creditors, where he was indebted to her to the extent of the amount furnished at the time, and she purchased the lands for a fair consideration, not buying for his use, and not being a party to his fraudulent intent. Sharpe v. Williams, 76 N. C. 87 (1877).

And a partner in embarrassed circumstances may appropriate his private property to the payment primarily of his private debts in preference to partnership debts by transferring such property to his private creditors, and such transfers will be valid where there is nothing to impeach the good faith of the grantees or to show that they aided in any concealment or fraudulent intent or purpose on the part of the grantor. Auburn Exch. Bank v. Fitch, 48 Barb. 354 (1867).

So, a purpose to defraud creditors on the part of a pledgor of property, not participated in by the pledgee, does not affect the pledge. Rose v. Coble, Phill. L. 517 (1868).

And a garnishee, whose deed or mortgage was executed with an actual intention on the part of the grantor to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors, may retain a bona fide debt due to himself out of the funds in his hands with respect to which he is garnished, unless he accepted the trust with knowledge of the grantor's fraudulent intention. Price v. Masterson, 85 Ala. 483 (1890).

And a conveyance of property, made by a debtor to pay a debt justly due by him, will not be held fraudulent although he made false representations as to his condition and intentions, where the grantees in such deed were not parties to the fraud. Chouteau v. Sherman, 11 Mo. 385 (1848).

So, also, a mortgage, trust deed, or other security given by a debtor to a creditor to secure the payment of his claim is not invalidated by an intent upon the part of the debtor to defraud his other creditors, where the creditor receiving it or the beneficiaries therein did not know of or participate in such fraudulent intent.

This rule was adopted in Howell v. Carden, 99 Ala. 100 (1892); Coleman v. Smith, 55 Ala. 368 (1876); Governor v. Campbell, 17 Ala. 566 (1850); Christian v. Greenwood, 23 Ark. 258, 79 Am. Dec. 104 (1861); Hempstead v. Johnston, 18 Ark. 123, 65 Am. Dec. 458 (1856); Herkeleath v. Stookey, 63 Ill. 486 (1872); Meixsell v. Williamson, 35 Ill. 529 (1864); Brown v. Riley, 22 Ill. 45 (1859); Straight v. Roberts, 126 Ind. 383 (1890); McFadden v. Ross, 126 Ind. 341 (1890); Citizens' Bank v. Rhutassel, 67 Iowa, 816 (1885); Kohn Bros. v. Clement, 58 Iowa, 589 (1882); Hadley v. Adsett (Kan.), 42 Pac. 696 (1895); First Nat. Bank v. Nail, 52 Kan. 211 (1898); Standard Implement Co. v. Parlin & O. Co. 51 Kan. 632 (1899); McLarren v. Thompson, 40 Me. 284 (1856); Eureka Iron & S. Works, v. Bresnahan, 66 Mich. 489 (1877); Andrews v. Fillmore, 46 Mich. 315 (1881); Adams v. Niemann, Id. 135 (1876); Hausmann v. Hope, 20 Mo. App. 193 (1896); Johnston v. Dunn (N. J.), 29 Atl. 361 (1894); Carpenter v. Muren, 42 Barb. 300 (1864); Hall v. Arnold, 15 Barb. 599 (1853); Woodruff v. Bowles, 104 N. C. 197 (1899); Currie v. Bowman, 25 Or. 364 (1894); Magovern v. Richard, 27 S. C. 272 (1886); Mills v. Haines, 8 Head, 332 (1859); Ellis v. Valentine, 65 Tex. 532 (1886); Kraus v. Haas, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 665 (1894); Ogden State Bank v. Barker (Utah) 40 Pac. 769 (1895); Paul v. Baugh, 85 Va. 955 (1899); Johnson v. Hope, 17 Ont. App. Rep. 10 (1890); Ex parte Games, L. R. 12 Ch. Div. 314, 40 L. T. N. S. 789, 27 Week. Rep. 744 (1879); Hedman v. Anderson, 6 Neb. 392 (1877).

A creditor may take a mortgage from his debtor to secure his debt in good faith without reference to the motives of the mortgagor in giving it. Funk v. Staats, 24 Ill. 632 (1860).

Affirmative evidence of fraud on the part of the mortgagee must be given in order to invalidate a mortgage given by a debtor to a creditor for a valuable consideration. Straight v. Roberts, 126 Ind. 383 (1890); Chandler v. Colcord, 1 Okla. 290 (1893).

Thus, to avoid a mortgage given by a husband to his wife to secure payment of moneys received by him from her as a loan, which she obtained from her father's estate or other outside sources, for fraud, it is not enough to show that the mortgagor intended to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors, it must also appear that the mortgagee received the mortgage with like intent, and the burden of proof is with the one alleging the fraud. Benson v. Maxwell, 21 W. N. C. 446 (1888).

And a mortgage made by a husband to his wife, covering all his property, given to secure a bona fide debt or made with intent to defraud the to be paid as follows: $4,892.86 credited on the debt we owe Rice, Stix, & Co., of St. Louis, Mo.; $1,804.78 credited on the debt which we owe the Clark Shoe Company, of St. Louis, Mo.; $278.58 credited on the debt we owe Pratt, Simmons, & Co., of St. Louis, Mo.; $147.00 to be paid by the purchasers to J. R. Jones, Sr., being the amount of our debt to him for borrowed money; to N. L. Cathran, of Norman, Oklahoma territory, said purchasers are to pay $104.00 for borrowed money due him; $65.00 to Maurice mortgagor's creditors, is good in the hands of the mortgagee, where she was not present at the time the mortgage was given but was in Europe and knew nothing of the transaction. McIntyre v. Legon, 38 S. C. 457 (1892).

So, the acceptance by the beneficiaries in a trust deed of its benefit without participation in or knowledge of any purpose upon the part of the grantor to defraud other creditors renders it effective without regard to the grantor's intent. White v. Sterzing (Tex.) 82 S. W. 909 (1895).

And a mortgage made by a party to a contract who has assigned it to secure the fulfillment thereof is not voluntary and without consideration, and is not void as against the mortgagee in the absence of proof of a fraudulent intent on his part, though the mortgagor designed thereby to defeat and delay his creditors. Currier v. Taylor, 19 N. H. 189 (1848).

And a mortgage for a sufficient consideration, given to rearrange and secure certain debts, giving time for the payment, is not fraudulent and void as against creditors in the absence of proof of any combination with the mortgagees, most of whom were not present and had nothing to do with procuring the execution of the mortgage. Monaghan Bay Co. v. Dickson, 39 S. C. 146 (1896).

And a mortgage given by a member of an insolvent firm who had bought out his copartner, to his father to protect him as security on notes given to his copartner for the copartner's interest, and a subsequent conveyance of the land to the father in satisfaction of the mortgage debt and a previous encumbrance, are not fraudulent and invalid as to creditors where the debts assumed equaled the value of the land and the father had no notice of the firm's insolvency when he signed as security. Willis v. Heath (Tex.) 18 S. W. 801 (1891).

So, in Chissom v. Lamcool, 9 Ind. 590 (1857), which was an action to set aside a mortgage as fraudulent as against creditors, in which an instruction was given not requiring any participation in the fraud of the mortgagor on the part of the mortgagee to vitiate the conveyance, the court refused to set aside a verdict in favor of the mortgagee upon the ground that if there was error in the instruction it was in favor of the mortgagor.

And in McCreary v. Skinner, 75 Iowa, 411 (1888), it was held that an instruction that before the jury can find fraud to exist in the execution of a chattel mortgage by a husband to his wife they must find that she joined with him with the intent to carry out his purpose to defraud his creditors, and actual participation therein with the pretense of securing a claim owing to her, is misleading in the use of the word "pretense."

The rule adopted in Alabama, however, is that the question of the existence of a fraudulent intent upon the part of the parties will not affect a sale by an embarrassed or insolvent debtor to a creditor in absolute payment of a bona fide existing debt, where there is no material difference between the value of the property and the amount of the debt, and no use or benefit is reserved to the debtor. Knowles v. Street, 87 Ala. 360 (1888); Pollock v. Meyer, 96 Ala. 172 (1892); First Nat. Bank v. Smith, 93 Ala. 97 (1890); Hodges v. Coleman, 76 Ala. 108 (1884); Bamberger, B. & Co. v. Schoolfield, 160 U. S. 149, 40 L. ed. 374 (1895).

And that it is immaterial whether the grantor alone, or the grantor and grantee both, in a conveyance by an insolvent debtor for the payment of an antecedent debt, devised and intended to get the advantage of other creditors, if in fact the effect of the transaction was solely to pay a debt honestly due and the property was received at a fair and adequate price, and no interest or benefit was reserved to the grantor. Pollock v. Meyer, supra.

And that a sale of goods by a husband to his wife in absolute payment of a debt, for a fair and adequate consideration in which no interest is reserved to the grantor, will be sustained against the creditors of the husband notwithstanding the fraudulent intent of one or both of the parties. Meyer v. Sulzbacher, 76 Ala. 120 (1894).

So, in Werner v. Zierfuss, 163 Pa. 380 (1904), it was held that a conveyance or payment in any form, taken by a creditor from his debtor to secure an actual debt, is valid against other creditors though he knew that the effect would be to postpone them and that the debtor intended it to have that effect, and he took it to aid the intent as well as to protect himself.

And in Jewett v. Noteware, 30 Hun, 192 (1883), it was held that the act of a bona fide creditor in taking security for the exact amount of his debt cannot be fraudulent as to other creditors no matter what the intent may have been.

The existence of a fraudulent intent participated in by both parties to a transfer is a question of fact for the decision of the jury. Leasure v. Coburn, 57 Ind. 274 (1877).

And the jury may take into consideration all of the acts of a mortgagee performed after the making of the mortgage as bearing on the question whether he participated in any fraudulent intent on the part of the mortgagor. Showman v. Lee, 86 Mich. 556 (1891).

II. Who are bona fide purchasers within the statute.

The courts of Mississippi seem to have adopted the rule that the mere settlement of an antecedent debt without the payment of any new consideration is not sufficient to render the creditor an innocent purchaser within the protection of the statute of frauds. Perkins v. Swank, 43 Miss. 349 (1871); Pope v. Pope, 40 Miss. 516 (1866).

And that a conveyance of lands or chattels as security for an antecedent debt does not operate as a purchase for value unless the purchaser advanced some new consideration, or relinquished some pre-existing security, or did some act on the faith of the purchase which cannot be retracted. Hinds v. Pugh, 48 Miss. 298 (1873).

And it was held that a trust deed by an insolvent merchant upon his stock of goods to secure a bank for past-due indebtedness with intent to place the property beyond the reach of creditors is void, even if the officers of the bank do not participate in the fraud, as it is not a purchase for value, and especially so where the president of the bank then holding for collection a check drawn by the insolvent advises against the employment of its regular attorney on the ground that he is the attorney of other creditors, and confederates with the insolvent to put the deposit into his hands in order to place it beyond the reach of creditors. Briester v. Moore (Miss.) 16 So. 596 (1895).

The courts of the same state, however, hold that an absolute extinguishment of an antecedent debt in consideration of a simultaneous transfer of property constitutes the vendee a purchaser for value within the protection of the statute of

Ran, to be paid by the purchasers, being the amount we owe him for clerk hire; $300.00 to be paid by the purchasers on the debt we owe Levi Newberg & Co., of Louisville, Ky.; $400.00 to be paid by the purchasers to Voorhees, Miller, & Rupel, of Cincinnati, Ohio, on the debt we owe them; $325.00 to be paid by the purchasers to M. Wolf & Sons, of Cincinnati, Ohio, on the debt we owe them; $182.83 to be paid by the purchasers to Rothschild Brothers, of St. Louis, Mo., on the debt we owe them: Now, in considerafrauds to the same extent as if he had paid it in money. Soule v. Shotwell, 32 Miss. 236 (1876).

And that one who takes a security or specific property in satisfaction and discharge of a pre-existing debt, which is thereby extinguished, is a bona fide purchaser, protected by the statute of frauds, and not affected by previous equities. Love v. Taylor, 26 Miss. 567 (1853).

And in Surget v. Boyd, 57 Miss. 485 (1879), it was held that security for a pre-existing debt, without a new consideration, does not, like a purchase for value, cut off secret equities and frauds, but, unless they are shown to exist, the recipient is equally entitled to protection.

And it was held that a creditor who accepts a pledge for a pre-existing debt is not a purchaser for value within the protection of the statute of frauds, and that the validity of the transaction as against other creditors of the pledgor is determinable, not alone by the good faith of the pledgee, but also by the lawful or unlawful intent of the debtor in making the pledge, though it would be otherwise if the creditor took the property as a purchaser, entirely relinquishing his debt. Harris v. Lombard, 60 Miss. 29 (1882).

But the rule that a conveyance or mortgage to pay or secure a pre-existing debt, made for a valuable consideration, is within the statute of frauds, and is not vitiated by a fraudulent intent upon the part of the vendor or mortgagor not participated in by the purchaser or mortgagee, would seem to be supported, in effect, by the cases cited supra, I., and is directly laid down and acted upon in Woodruff v. Bowles, 104 N. C. 197 (1889), and Battle v. Mayo, 102 N. C. 413 (1889). Potter v. Stevens, 40 Mo. 229 (1867).

And in McWilliams v. Rodgers, 56 Ala. 87 (1876), it was held that a debtor in failing circumstances may make a mortgage to secure the payment of pre-existing debts provided it is received in good faith without intent to aid the mortgagor in hindering, delaying, or defrauding his creditors.

And such a mortgage is good as against other creditors of the mortgagor where the mortgagee had no knowledge of any fraud upon the part of the mortgagor and acted in the utmost good faith. McFadden v. Boes, 126 Ind. 341 (1890).

And a mortgage is not rendered fraudulent as to creditors by the fact that it was given to secure an antecedent debt, and the mortgagee knew that the mortgagor was financially embarrassed. Cromelin v. McCauley, 67 Ala. 542 (1890).

So, mortgages, as well as transfers of absolute title, were intended to be protected by the provisions of the Texas assignment act, § 9, providing that if the purchaser of property bought the same in good faith he shall be held to have acquired, as against an assignee and creditors, a good and valid title to such property. Simmons Hardware Co. v. Kaufman, 77 Tex. 131 (1890).

And a mortgagee or an accepting beneficiary under a trust deed is placed upon the same plane with a purchaser, and is included within the meaning of the word "purchaser" as used in the statute of frauds, and a bona fide creditor who has thus obtained security for his debt will be protected to the same extent as a purchaser in good faith. Kraus v. Haas, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 665 (1894).

There is no obligation on the part of a creditor whose claim a debtor is willing to secure to examine into any of the circumstances for the purpose of ascertaining whether the debtor had any 31 L. R. A. ulterior object in view. Archer v. O'Brien, 7 Hun. 146 (1876).

And when a mortgage is given to secure a debt presently contracted or contracted on the faith and promise that it should be given, the mortgagee is a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration, and as such entitled to protection against equities of which he had no notice. Coleman v. Smith, 55 Ala. 368 (1876).

And in Levy v. Williams, 79 Ala. 171 (1885), it was held that a purchase made partly in payment of an antecedent debt and partly for money paid is subject to the same rule as purchases on a new consideration, and the payment of the past debt is a circumstance to be considered in determining the good faith of the transaction.

In Stinson v. Hawkins, 13 Fed. Rep. 833 (1882), the United States district court of the eastern district of Missouri, however, held that a mortgage given to hinder or delay creditors, both the mortgagor and mortgagee knowing the fraudulent purpose, cannot be upheld as against creditors, the same rule applying to a mortgage, especially for an antecedent debt of long standing, as that which applies to sales of property.

So, it was held that a creditor who takes a chattel mortgage and an assignment of accounts covering property worth from $15,000 to $17,000 to secure an indebtedness of from $1,200 to $2,000 and an advance of cash of $800, knowing of the insolvency of the debtor, is not a bona fide purchaser within the statute of frauds, in Herman v. McKinney, 47 Fed. Rep. 758 (1891).

And in Manhattan Co. v. Everton, 6 Paige, 457 (1837), it was held that where a creditor of a fraudulent grantee of real estate takes from him a mortgage on such real estate as a further security for a pre-existing debt, he is not protected against the lien of judgment creditors of the fraudulent grantor whose judgments were recovered subsequently to the fraudulent conveyance and prior to the mortgage, though he took without notice of the fraud.

So, creditors in whose favor judgments are confessed are not purchasers for value who cannot be affected by the fraudulent intent of the debtor unless they participated therein. Galle v. Tode, 74 Hun, 542 (1893).

III. What constitutes participation.

a. Generally.

The general rules laid down supra, I., give rise to the question, What constitutes such a participation in the fraud of a debtor as will invalidate a conveyance or security given to his creditor to pay or secure his claim?

The solution of the question would seem to depend upon the question of the good or bad faith of the purchaser or mortgagee.

Thus, a creditor who purchases property from his debtor, who is insolvent and attempting to dispose of his property to defraud other creditors to his knowledge, must act with the utmost good faith. Lewis v. Hughes, 49 Kan. 23 (1892).

And a security given by a person in insolvent circumstances is not impeachable, unless the person claiming the benefit of the transaction had notice or knowledge of the insolvency and did not act in good faith. Johnson v. Hope, 17 Ont. App. Rep. 10 (1890).

And a chattel mortgage is not void because made with a fraudulent intent on the part of the mort-tion of said sum of $8,000.00 to be credited to and paid as aforesaid, we hereby sell and transfer and deliver to Rice, Stix, & Co., Clark Shoe Company, and Pratt, Simmons, & Co. all our stock of goods, wares, and merchandise contained in our storehouse in the city of Hot Springs, Ark., Nos. 613 and 615 Central avenue, together with all the store fixtures and fixtures therein, and hereby assign to them our lease on said storehouse.

gagor; it must also appear that the mortgagee was not acting in good faith from an honest purpose to secure his own debts, but was aiding the debtor to defeat his other creditors by covering up the property in some improper way to the debtor's use and benefit. Hausman v. Hope, 20 Mo. App. 193 (1888).

It is only when a mortgage is given and received with the intent to hinder and defraud creditors that it is void, and not when it is taken by the mortgagee for the honest purpose of securing a valid claim whatever may have been the intent of the mortgagor. Currie v. Bowman, 25 Or. 364 (1894).

And a creditor may take the goods of his debtor at a fair price in payment of his debt where he does so for the sole purpose of collecting it without reference to the intent of the debtor in thus disposing of his goods. Stainbrook v. Duncan, 45 Ill. App. 344 (1892).

And a purchaser who acts for the purpose of satisfying his own claim against the vendor is entitled to protection where he takes without notice of fraud or of the fraudulent title of the vendor, or without notice of facts sufficient to put him upon inquiry. Hanchett v. Kimbark, 118 Ill. 121 (1896).

And the fact that the primary purpose of a debtor in conveying or mortgaging property to a creditor is to prevent some other creditor from subjecting it to the payment of a debt due him, does not render the transaction fraudulent, where the creditor's purpose is solely to get payment or security for the sum due him. Haas v. Kraus, 86 Tex. 687 (1894).

So, an execution creditor, securing the collection of his debt with no other purpose than to make himself safe, cannot be affected by an undisclosed fraudulent purpose on the part of the debtor. Evans v. Kilgore, 29 W. N. C. 279 (1891).

And a creditor of an insolvent firm is not answerable as garnishee to its creditors for taking its goods in payment of his claim, where he was acting without knowledge of any fraud and for the sole purpose of securing payment of his claim, taking no more goods than was necessary. Hellman v. Dick, 55 Mo. App. 168 (1893).

And a deed, the only purpose of which was to secure and protect the grantor's brother, to whom he was largely indebted, is not fraudulent as to creditors. Giddings v. Sears, 115 Mass. 505 (1874).

To impeach the payment or securing of an actual debt by a failing debtor, there should be evidence tending to show, either some other advantage or benefit to the debtor beyond the discharge of the obligation, or some other benefit to the creditors beyond mere payment of his debt, or some injury to the other creditor beyond postponement of his debts. Werner v. Zierfuss, 162 Pa. 360 (1894).

A mortgage given by a debtor to a creditor to secure his claim will not be set aside as to creditors in the absence of evidence that the mortgagee had a purpose to aid the fraudulent plans of the mortgagor in addition to his purpose to protect himself. Kohn Bros. v. Clement, 58 Iowa, 589 (1882).

And to render a mortgage void as to creditors, it would be necessary to show that it was made and contrived with the actual intent to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors, as, for instance, to cover up and conceal the property of the debtor, or to raise funds which were to be kept from the reach of process for collection of debts, and that the mortgagee participated in this intent. Hurley v. Taylor, 78 Mo. 238 (1883).

And a purchase by a creditor from his debtor for a fair price, of no more than is necessary for his protection, is not invalidated by the vendor's fraud unless the purchaser participated in it by assisting the vendor to put the property out of the reach of creditors and appropriate it to himself with a knowledge of such fraudulent design and with intent to further its accomplishment. Christian v. Greenwood, 23 Ark. 264, 79 Am. Dec. 104 (1861).

And a compromise by a debtor with certain creditors, made with the intent on his part to defeat the collection of another claim against him which he did not think he was morally bound to pay, is good as to the creditors with whom he compromised, where they did not participate in his fraudulent intent, or having knowledge or notice of such intent, did not avail themselves of such knowledge for the purpose of obtaining a personal advantage to themselves at the expense of the debtor's other creditors. Anderson v. Pilgram, 41 S. C. 423 (1891).

But a creditor of an insolvent debtor must stop at securing his debt, and if he goes farther and assists the fraudulent debtor in carrying out his fraudulent purpose, his preference so obtained will be avoided in favor of other creditors. Alberger v. White, 117 Mo. 347 (1893); Foster v. Grigsby, 1 Bush, 86 (1896); Meyberg v. Jacobs, 40 Mo. App. 128 (1890).

And a mortgage made with a fraudulent intent upon the part of the mortgagor to cheat, hinder, or delay his creditors, and accepted by the mortgagee with knowledge of that design and with intent to promote its accomplishment, is void as against other creditors. Rindskopf v. Vaughan, 40 Fed. Rep. 394 (1889); Smith v. Hardy, 36 Wis. 417 (1874).

And the rule is the same though it is founded upon a perfect consideration. Moore v. Williamson, 44 N. J. Eq. 496, 1 L. R. A. 336 (1888); Holt v. Creamer, 34 N. J. Eq. 181 (1881); Schmidt v. Opie, 33 N. J. Eq. 136 (1880); David v. Birchard, 53 Wis. 492 (1891).

And the fact that a valuable consideration has been given for a mortgage or transfer of property is not, as a proposition of law, inconsistent with the existence of an intent on the part of a debtor, or of such knowledge thereof on the part of the mortgagee or purchaser as will avoid the conveyance, whether the consideration consisted of an existing debt or arose in any other manner. Billings v. Russell, 101 N. Y. 226 (1896).

So, a mortgagee who takes a mortgage made by a mortgagor with intent to defraud his creditors, who besides securing his own debt undertakes to aid and assist the mortgagor in his fraudulent purpose to hinder and delay other creditors, can claim nothing under it as against such creditors. Moline Wagon Co. v. Rummell, 14 Fed. Rep. 155 (1892).

The whole transaction is vitiated. Meyberg v. Jacobs, supra.

So, a mortgage given by a debtor to a creditor upon the advice of the mortgagee, intended to prevent other creditors from enforcing their claims out of the property, and compel them to wait until he could get around to pay them, is void as to such creditors. Fish v. McDonnell, 42 Minn. 519 (1890).

Possession of the property was delivered immediately to the agents of the vendees. Two days later, one James McGuire sued out an attachment against the property of Jones & Fulton; and when the writ of attachment came to the sheriff's hands, before levying it, he demanded an indemnity bond. Thereupon the appellees, Wood & Henderson, executed and delivered to the sheriff the following instrument:

Common Pleas Court of Garland County.
John M. McGuire & Co.

J.
Jones & Fulton.

We undertake to indemnify the sheriff of Garland county against all damages which he may sustain by reason of the levy of the attachment herein.

[Signed] James B. Wood.
Dec. 17, 1890. J. P. Henderson.

And a note and deed of trust given by a debtor to a creditor with intent to delay, hinder, and defraud other creditors, is void as to them where the creditor receiving it knew of such intent and aided or assisted him in carrying it out. Alberger v. White, 117 Mo. 347 (1898).

And where a debtor conveys away his property with intent to get it beyond the reach of a pressing creditor, to a purchaser, though for value, who has notice of such intention and aids the debtor in getting his property beyond the reach of the creditor, such purchaser participates in the debtor's fraud, and his conveyance will be held void at the instance of the creditor. Gillespie v. Allen, 37 W. Va. 675 (1893).

So, an intent upon the part of the parties to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors is sufficient to invalidate a mortgage. It is not necessary that there should also be a combination and confederation between the mortgagor and mortgagee. State, Bindfeutel, v. Nauert, 2 Mo. App. 295 (1876).

And the grantor and the grantee need not be actuated by like motives to cheat and defraud creditors. If the grantee purchases with such knowledge of facts as would put a prudent man on inquiry and lead him to infer a purpose to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors, the sale will be fraudulent though he purchases because he considers the property cheap or to save a debt due him. De Walt v. Doran, 21 D. C. 163 (1892).

And a creditor who takes a bill of sale from his debtor, not for the purpose of securing the amount due him and for which he was security, but for speculation, is a mere volunteer, and the purchase will be held invalid as to creditors where he knew that mortgages had been made by the debtor and that he had been pressed for the settlement of claims which he could not pay. Redhead v. Pratt, 72 Iowa, 99 (1897).

An intent to hinder and delay creditors which will invalidate a conveyance by a debtor to a creditor, however, must be one which will cause an unlawful as distinguished from a lawful hindrance. Sonnen- theil v. Texas Guaranty & T. Co. (Tex.) 30 S. W. 945 (1895).

And whether or not notice on the part of the beneficiary in a trust deed of a purpose on the part of a grantor to hinder, delay, or defeat other creditors, would defeat their claim, depends upon the character of the obstructions or obstacles by which such hindrance or delay was intended to be accomplished. When there exists a fraudulent intent proper, the creditor cannot aid in executing it by accepting a mortgage given for that purpose, but if the conveyance which the debtor purposes is no more than the law permits him to make, the intent does not constitute the fraudulent intent denounced by the statute, and notice to the creditor of such a motive is not notice of a fraudulent intent which will invalidate the transaction. Ibid.

And a deed made by a debtor to his father-in-law as trustee for the purpose of preferring a creditor is not invalidated by the fact that the trustee received it with a view of concealing a felony committed by the debtor in his transactions with his creditors and preventing a prosecution therefor, if it was not executed with the concurrence of the cestui que trust and a knowledge of the motives which influenced the trustee, and was not afterwards assented to by them under some engagement to suppress the prosecution. Marbury v. Brooks, 20 U. S. 7 Wheat. 556, 5 L. ed. 522 (1822).

Nor is an assignment given by a debtor for the purpose of preferring one creditor over another invalidated by the fact that it was made and received in the hope and expectation and with a view of preventing prosecution for a felony connected with the debtor's transactions with his creditors, if the preferred creditors have done nothing to excite that hope and the assignment was made without their knowledge and concurrence and without a knowledge of the motives which influenced the assignor and which were not assented to by them under some engagement, express or implied, to suppress or forbear the prosecution. Brooks v. Marbury, 24 U. S. 11 Wheat. 78, 6 L. ed. 423 (1826); Marbury v. Brooks, supra.

b. Securing a preference.

The intent of this subdivision is to treat the question of when and to what extent the securing of a preference by a creditor by taking a transfer from his debtor by way of payment or security will amount to a participation in the fraudulent intent of the debtor, and not to deal with the broad general question of preferences and the right to prefer.

The acceptance by a creditor of a transfer from his debtor for the purpose of preferring him involves no fraud on other creditors where the preferred creditor was actuated by the sole purpose of securing the indebtedness due him. Schroeder v. Bobbitt, 108 Mo. 289 (1892); Brigham v. Hubbard, 115 Ind. 474 (1888); Stock-Growers' Bank v. Newton, 18 Colo. 245 (1890).

And an intent by a mortgagee to obtain a preference will not invalidate the mortgage. Davis v. Schwartz, 155 U. S. 631, 39 L. ed. 299 (1894); West Coast Grocery Co. v. Stinson (Wash.) 43 Pac. 35 (1895).

And under the rule adopted in Alabama the intent of both parties to the transaction to defraud other creditors will not invalidate it where it was had in good faith and a fair price was allowed and no reservation made in favor of the vendor. Bamberger, B. & Co. v. Schoonfield, 160 U. S. 149, 40 L. ed. 374 (1895).

And an absolute sale by an insolvent or failing debtor to his creditor in payment of an antecedent debt by way of preference and for a fair and adequate consideration, without reserving any interest, is an act which is itself legal, and is not vitiated by fraud. Hodges v. Coleman, 78 Ala. 103 (1884).

The danger of other creditors taking a debtor's property is a justifiable motive for a purchase by a creditor from his debtor at a fair price to secure his claim. Pearson v. Rockhill, 4 B. Mon. 296 (1846).

And the principal case goes still further, holding that an effort on the part of the creditor to keep other creditors from finding out his purpose does not invalidate the transfer.

So, a bill of sale by way of mortgaging all personal chattels as a security for money actually loaned is not fraudulent and void under the statute of Elizabeth, though its object is to defeat the expected execution of a judgment creditor. Darvill v. Terry, 6 Hurlst. & N. 807, 30 L. J. Exch. 335 (1861).

After receiving the indemnity bond, the sheriff levied the order of attachment upon part of the goods mentioned in the bill of sale, of the value of $260.12. On the 20th day of February, 1891, Rice, Stix, & Co. and the other vendees mentioned in the bill of sale brought suit in the Garland circuit court against Wood & Henderson, to recover the value of the goods levied upon and sold by the sheriff in the McGuire case. The complaint alleged that the plaintiffs were the owners of the goods, and that, when Mc-

And a mortgage deed executed by a debtor for the benefit of some of his creditors is not invalidated under that statute because made in expectation that a writ of sequestration would issue against the property. Alton v. Harrison, L. R. 4 Ch. 622, 38 L. J. Ch. 609, 21 L. T. N. S. 232, 17 Week. Rep. 1034 (1890).

So, a preference among creditors will not be held invalid for fraud on the part of the debtor alone. The preferred creditor must have participated in the fraud. Forrester v. Moore, 77 Mo. 651 (1883).

And the fact that a grantor was embarrassed and in failing circumstances would not invalidate a deed made by him to one creditor to the exclusion of others, provided the deed was made in good faith in payment of an honest debt. Totten v. Brady, 54 Md. 170 (1880).

A creditor may purchase his debtor's property in payment of his debt as safely as he can take it by legal process, although the effect of the transaction would be to place the property beyond the reach of creditors. Kirtland v. Snow, 20 Conn. 23 (1849).

And the fact that the preferred creditor is the debtor's wife does not make the transaction fraudulent, and is not evidence of fraud. Becker, Stull, v. Yeager, 1 Super. Ct. (Pa.) 107 (1896).

So, a preference given to some creditors over others by a transfer of property is not invalidated by the fact that the debtor had previously been engaged in a scheme to defraud his creditors, in the absence of evidence tending to show fraud upon the part of the preferred creditors in accepting the preference. Hard v. Foster, 98 Mo. 297 (1889).

And a debtor may prefer a creditor either by way of payment or security where it is disassociated with a common-law assignment, and where it is not intended or made for the purpose of delaying or defrauding creditors, and so understood and participated in by the creditor taking the security. Eureka Iron & S. Works v. Bresnahan, 66 Mich. 499 (1887).

So, a debtor may give preferences to one of his creditors by a fair and honest transfer of goods and chattels adequate to the payment of his debt where no more was transferred than is sufficient to pay the debt intended to be secured, and there is no collusion between the parties to cover the remaining property from the claims of other creditors. Bruce v. Smith, 3 Harr. & J. 499 (1806).

And a security given by a person in insolvent circumstances to secure an actual advance, made without notice or knowledge of the insolvency and in good faith, is not impeachable because the moneys advanced are, pursuant to the directions of the insolvent, paid over to one of his creditors, who thereby obtains a preference. Johnston v. Hope, 17 U. C. App. Cas. 10 (1889).

So, a creditor who purchases the personal property of his debtor without fraud is entitled to the advantage obtained as against a judgment confessed by the debtor to another creditor, where the purchase was made before the issue of execution, though the judgment debtor may have acted in bad faith towards his judgment creditors, the purchaser having no notice thereof. Ball v. Barnett, 36 Ind. 55.

And a creditor does not become liable to other creditors for taking a mortgage or conveyance of property from his debtor who is in failing circumstances to secure his claim, provided he acts in good faith and does not obtain more than is justly due him. Kurtz v. Miller, 26 Kan. 314 (1881).

And a mortgage given to the cashier of a bank to secure the payment of notes with intent to prefer the holders of such notes, made with a fraudulent design or with the intent to hinder and delay creditors, is good where neither the trustee nor the owners of the notes participated in the fraud or had knowledge of it. Ogden State Bank v. Barker (Utah) 40 Pac. 799 (1895).

And a deed of trust executed for the purpose of preferring the creditors mentioned therein is good as against other creditors where the debts preferred were bona fide, and neither the trustee nor the beneficiaries in such deed had notice of fraud, perpetrated by means thereof, though the intent of the grantor was fraudulent. Sonnenhell v. Texas Guaranty & T. Co. (Tex.) 30 S. W. 945 (1896).

So, it is not fraudulent for a creditor to accept a conveyance of property in payment of his debt from an insolvent debtor which will disappoint other creditors. Flewellen v. Crane, 38 Ala. 627 (1877).

And a conveyance by a debtor to a creditor giving him a preference is not invalid though the grantee knew of the insolvency of the debtor. Dana v. Stanford, 10 Cal. 299 (1858); Wheaton v. Neville, 19 Cal. 41 (1861); Crawford v. Neal, 144 U. S. 585, 36 L. ed. 552 (1891); Frazer v. Thatcher, 49 Tex. 26 (1878); Bamberger, B. & Co. v. Schoolfield, 160 U. S. 149, 40 L. ed. 374 (1895).

And though the effect of the preference may be to delay his other creditors, where the transaction was in good faith and made with the intention to pay a preferred debt, and without any secret trust. Crawford v. Neal, supra.

Provided he does not come within the prohibition of the bankrupt law; and the fact that the debtor's object may have been to defeat his creditors will not interfere with the right, unless the creditor is chargeable with notice of that fact. Frazer v. Thatcher, supra.

Where property goes to pay an honest debt, that use of it is lawful though it may cut off the redress of all others, and though intended to do so. Nichols v. Bancroft, 74 Mich. 191 (1890).

A bona fide creditor may take a conveyance of the goods of his debtor in the discharge of his debt for a fair consideration and hold them till other creditors may lose their entire debts, without reference to what the motive of the seller may have been. Wilson v. Fawcner, 38 Ill. App. 438.

And the mere fact that a creditor by receiving a deed from his debtor has obtained a preference over other equally meritorious creditors, or that the transfer to him had the effect of hindering and delaying other creditors and was so intended by the grantor, will not vitiate the transfer where the transaction was in truth bona fide. Iglehart v. Willis, 58 Tex. 306 (1883); Warren v. Jones, 68 Ala. 449 (1890); Frank v. Curtis, 58 Mo. App. 349 (1894).

And a creditor may take a chattel mortgage to secure the payment of his debt, if the debt is a bona fide indebtedness, and if taken in good faith as security the mortgage will be valid although the effect may be to delay and entirely defeat other creditors in the collection of their claims against the mortgagor. Hadley v. Adsit (Kan.) 42 Pac. 636 (1895); Standard Implement Co. v. Parlin & O. Co. 51 Kan. 632 (1893).

So, a purchaser who in good faith takes the property of his debtor at a fair value in payment of an honest debt will be protected against creditors, though his claim may absorb the entire property of the debtor, where there is no evidence of bad

Guire sued out his attachment, the sheriff demanded an indemnity bond before serving it, and that the defendants executed the bond, and that thereafter the goods were taken; that they were of the value of $260.12; and asked judgment for that sum. The defendants, demurring to the complaint, and the demurrer being overruled, saved their exceptions, and afterwards answered, denying the allegations of the complaint, and setting up, further, that the McGuire attachment was sustained, and alleging as a further defense faith. Schram v. Taylor, 51 Kan. 547 (1896); Davis v. McCanthy, 52 Kan. 116 (1898).

And a mortgage given for a valuable consideration, and not taken for the purpose of hindering, defeating, or delaying creditors, is not void under the statute of Elizabeth, though the mortgagor was insolvent and the mortgage embraced all the debtor's visible property and by agreement was not recorded for forty days. Magovern v. Richard, 27 S. C. 272 (1896).

The acquisition of a lien on a part or the whole of an insolvent's property to secure a bona fide debt is valid as against creditors though the debtor gave it with intent to secure to the favored creditor an advantage over other creditors, and thus hinder, delay, or defeat the collection of their debts. Ellis v. Valentine, 65 Tex. 532 (1896).

So, a debtor has a right to prefer one creditor to another in payment, and his private motives for giving the preference cannot affect the right if the preferred creditor has done nothing improper to procure it, but any unlawful consideration moving from the preferred creditor to induce the preference will avoid the deed which gives it. Marbury v. Brooks, 20 U. S. 7 Wheat. 556, 5 L. ed. 522 (1882).

And preferences given to certain creditors in executing a mortgage are not evidence of fraud though they may be considered by the jury with other facts and circumstances in the case in determining whether the mortgage is fraudulent. Haben v. Harshaw, 49 Wis. 379 (1890).

And where there is an actual debt, the jury cannot be permitted to infer a fraudulent intent from the mere fact of the payment or preference given to it. Werner v. Zierfuss, 162 Pa. 390 (1894).

So, fraud will not be imputed to an honest creditor who is preferred by a failing debtor as against another creditor who had been promised payment by the debtor out of the proceeds of the property assigned to the former to secure him. McKeown v. Coogler, 18 Fla. 866 (1892).

And a transfer of property by a debtor to his creditor for the purpose of preferring him over other creditors is valid though such preferred creditor knew at the time that the debtor did not intend to pay other creditors. State, Glaser, v. Mason, 24 Mo. App. 321 (1887).

So, an instruction in an action to set aside a sale for fraud, that if the vendor intended to hinder or delay his creditors in a collection of their demands, and if the vendee knew of such intention and participated in it, the transaction was fraudulent as to creditors, is not erroneous as taking away the right of the vendee who was a creditor to take a preference, though he knew his getting it would hinder and delay other creditors. Hardwick v. Cox, 50 Mo. App. 509 (1892).

And a deed of trust given by a corporation to secure certain of its creditors is valid though it gave a preference to and secured the debts of several of the directors who participated in the resolution of the board authorizing its execution. Foster v. Mullanphy Planing Mill Co., 92 Mo. 79 (1887).

But a director of a corporation whose duty it is to know its financial condition cannot avail himself of any dereliction of such duty to secure a personal advantage over other creditors of the corporation by taking an assignment of its property in payment of his claim. Clay v. Towle, 78 Me. 86 (1896).

firm which is consulted by another creditor with reference to collecting and securing his claim is not legally bound to disclose the existence of its claim to such firm, but may keep silent, and protect its own interests, provided it is guilty of no fraudulent conduct and does nothing more than is necessary to its own protection. First Nat. Bank v. Nall, 52 Kan. 211 (1896).

And an arrangement between a debtor and a creditor by which the debtor gives the creditor a confession of judgment which is not to be entered if the debtor succeeds in obtaining from his other creditors an extension, but may be entered on the confession and execution issued if such creditors refuse such extension, is valid and effectual as to other creditors where it was not used or intended to be used to influence the negotiations of other creditors, but simply designed to secure a preference to the preferred creditor. Meeker v. Harris, 19 Cal. 278, 79 Am. Dec. 215 (1861).

And the affirmation, by stipulation with the debtor, of a judgment for an honest lien debt against him, which results in a judicial sale of his property, notwithstanding the judgment is reversed on appeal, being in effect a transaction which amounts simply to the collection by a creditor of his debt by taking his debtor's property at a full and fair valuation and by force of a preference to which he was legally entitled, is not necessarily fraudulent but depends upon the good faith of the parties and the absence of a fraudulent intent, which are questions of fact. Inglehart v. Thousand Island Hotel Co., 109 N. Y. 454 (1896).

So, if a debtor conveys to a creditor property at a fair valuation for the purpose of the payment of a debt due him, or sells to some other person for a fair price to raise money to pay debts, which by the terms of the sale the purchaser is bound to see, and does see, is at once appropriated for such purpose, the sale cannot be said to be one made to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors, though the complaining creditors are ones who did not receive any part of the proceeds. Ellis v. Valentine, 65 Tex. 532 (1896).

But though creditors may accept preferences in the way of receiving transfers of property in the payment of their debts, they cannot accept them in consideration of terms, express or implied, to further the plans of the debtor to hinder, delay, or defraud other creditors. J. W. Butler Paper Co. v. Robbins, 151 Ill. 588 (1894); Alberger v. White, 117 Mo. 347 (1893); Foster v. Grigsby, 1 Bush, 86 (1896).

So, the rule that a debtor has a right to prefer one creditor to another is subject to the qualification that it must be done openly and fairly, without any other object than the fact on its face embraces. Hancock v. Horan, 15 Tex. 507 (1855).

And the fact that a preference by an insolvent by way of a chattel mortgage upon his goods is given to a bona fide claim, is not alone sufficient to protect the mortgagee where he was at the time of accepting the security aware of and participated in the purpose of the mortgagor to fraudulently delay or defeat the claims of other creditors. Landauer v. Mack, 43 Neb. 430 (1895).

And a mortgage given pursuant to and to carry out a secret arrangement by a debtor who compounds with his creditors to pay one more than he does the others, is fraudulent and void as to such other creditors. Feldman v. Gamble, 26 N. J. Eq. 494 (1875).

And a stipulation in a trust deed, giving a prefer-that the sale by which Rice, Stix, & Co. et al. claimed the goods was fraudulent.

Upon the trial of the case, it appeared from the evidence that early in December, 1900, Jones & Fulton wrote to their creditors, asking an extension of time in which to pay their indebtedness. Among other creditors to whom they wrote were Rice, Stix, & Co., Clark Shoe Company, and Pratt, Simmons, & Co., all of St. Louis. When the letters reached St. Louis, these three firms consulted in regard to the best course to pursue in the ence to such creditors as will on receiving one half of their debts release the other half, renders it fraudulent and void as to other creditors. Palmer v. Giles, 5 Jones, Eq. 75 (1860).

A promise by a debtor, made upon obtaining credit from a creditor, that he would protect him if anything ever occurred by which he was not able to pay his debts, and that if he met with losses he would secure him, when the debtor was doing an apparently prosperous business and when there was no imperative reason for the belief that he was likely to become insolvent, will not invalidate the preferences given to such creditor upon the debtor subsequently becoming insolvent. Smith v. Craft, 17 Fed. Rep. 705 (1883); Smith v. Munroe, 1 App. Div. 77 (1896).

And an agreement between the manager of a corporation and a creditor, made when the company was organized, in consideration of goods furnished by the creditor on credit, upon which it commenced business, and the promise of an additional loan, if needed, that if the corporation should become involved or be sued for any indebtedness, notes held by such creditor should become immediately due unless secured, followed by an assignment to such creditor preferring his claim, does not of itself operate as a fraud upon other creditors, though such agreement was kept secret. Teitig v. Boesman Bros. 12 Mont. 404 (1893).

In Teitig v. Boesman Bros. supra, Blennerhassett v. Sherman, 105 U. S. 118, 28 L. ed. 1085 (1882), infra, III. n. was distinguished upon the ground that the question involved in that case related to an actual conveyance by way of mortgage of real estate of great value having been made by a debtor then insolvent to the knowledge of the mortgagee, which mortgage by prearrangement had been withheld from record.

But a trust deed given pursuant to a mortgage under which a lender of money was to be preferred in such deed, to be given by the borrower, both as to the money lent and as to previous indebtedness, is entirely void as against creditors, though the previous loans were made in good faith, where the lender knew at the time that the borrower was insolvent and that the trust deed was made with intent to defraud. Ewing v. Teague (Tex.) 20 S. W. 401.

And an arrangement between a creditor and a debtor, the debtor being insolvent to the knowledge of the creditor, by which the creditor agreed to advance such sums of money as the grantor might need in the prosecution of a business enterprise within a designated time, the debtor promising that the proceeds of sales in the meantime should be paid to the creditor, and that if he should become embarrassed he would pay him in preference to other creditors, is fraudulent and void as to such creditors, where the creditor might have known that the proposed scheme of business involved heavy purchases on credit, when credit was not merited. Krippendorf v. Hyde, 28 Fed. Rep. 788 (1896).

As to the effect of accepting a preference under the bankruptcy and insolvency laws, see infra, XI. Participation under bankruptcy and insolvency laws.

c. Knowledge of fraud, insolvency, etc.

The mere knowledge of a creditor, to whom a transfer of goods is made by a debtor in payment of his claim, that the debtor thereby intends to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors, does not render the transaction void as against creditors where the preferred creditor acts in good faith and takes the property for the sole purpose of saving a bona fide debt, as simple knowledge does not amount to participation in the intended fraud.

This is the rule laid down in Sexton v. Anderson, 95 Mo. 375 (1888), and Banfield v. Whipple, 14 Allen, 13 (1867), and it was upon this ground that the principal case was decided.

And that a creditor may purchase goods of his debtor for the purpose of satisfying his claim, though he knows or ought to have known the object of the debtor in making the sale to be to defeat other creditors, where he is actuated only by a desire in good faith to secure payment of an honest debt, is held in First Nat. Bank v. Smith, 93 Ala. 97 (1890); Hornthall v. Schonfeld, 79 Ala. 109 (1885); Wood v. Keith, 60 Ark. 425 (1895); Christian v. Greenwood, 23 Ark. 258, 79 Am. Dec. 104 (1861); Gray v. St. John, 35 Ill. 222 (1884); Windmiller v. Chapman, 38 Ill. App. 276 (1890); Chapman v. Windmiller, 29 Ill. App. 393 (1893); Worland v. Kimberlin, 6 B. Mon. 608, 44 Am. Dec. 785 (1846); Holmes v. Braidwood, 82 Mo. 610 (1884); Albert v. Besel, 88 Mo. 150 (1886); Morgan v. Wood, 38 Mo. App. 255 (1890); Kendall v. Baltis, 26 Mo. App. 411 (1897); Knower v. Central Nat. Bank, 124 N. Y. 552 (1891); Dudley v. Danforth, 61 N. Y. 626 (1874); Sabin v. Columbia River Lumber & F. Co. 25 Or. 15 (1893); Uhler v. Maulfair, 23 Pa. 481 (1854); Reynolds v. Weinman (Tex.) 25 S. W. 33 (1894); Owens v. Clark, 78 Tex. 547 (1890); Smith v. Whitfield, 67 Tex. 124 (1896); Edwards v. Dickson, 66 Tex. 618 (1896); Lewy v. Fischl, 65 Tex. 311 (1896); Traders' Nat. Bank v. Day, 7 Tex. Civ. App. 569 (1894); Hamilton-Brown Shoe Co. v. Whitaker, 4 Tex. Civ. App. 360 (1893); Shelley v. Boothe, 73 Mo. 74, 39 Am. Rep. 481 (1890); State, Glaser, v. Mason, 24 Mo. App. 321 (1897).

In Uhler v. Maulfair, supra, Ashmead v. Hean, 13 Pa. 584 (1850), holding to the contrary, was overruled as not being the law of the land.

And the same rule applies though the creditor knew that the conveyance would deprive the debtor of the means of paying other creditors. First Nat. Bank v. Smith, Chapman v. Windmiller, Sabin v. Columbia River Lumber & F. Co., Smith v. Whitfield, and Lewy v. Fischl, supra; First Nat. Bank v. Lowrey Bros. 36 Neb. 290 (1893); Seaman v. Nolen, 68 Ala. 463 (1890).

And though the grantee knew that the effect would be to hinder and delay other creditors of the vendor. Ross v. Sedgwick, 69 Cal. 247 (1896).

It must also appear that the creditor in some way participated in the fraud, as that there was a purpose, beyond the mere effort to collect his debt, to aid the debtor in defeating, delaying, or defrauding other creditors, or to protect the debtor as well as himself. Holmes v. Braidwood, 82 Mo. 610 (1884).

A creditor who obtains property or security from his debtor, who is insolvent, in payment of an honest debt, where the debtor acted with the design of delaying or defrauding other creditors, will not lose his preference by reason of notice of the wrongful design of the debtor, though the payment of his debt may absorb the entire property of the debtor, where his only purpose was to obtain satisfaction or security for his own debt. Hasle v. Connor, 58 Kan. 713 (1894).

Thus, where goods are taken in satisfaction of bona fide debts, actual participation by the creditor in the fraudulent intent of the debtor is neces-matter. The agents of the last two named firms were in Hot Springs at the time, and Rice, Stix, & Co. sent their agent to Hot Springs. When he arrived there, on the 13th of December, he went to the store of Jones & Fulton, and shortly afterwards met the representatives of the Clark Shoe Company and Pratt, Simmons, & Co. These parties entered into an extensive investigation of the financial standing of Jones & Fulton, as they say, to determine whether the extension should be granted. After looking into the sary to make his acceptance of the goods fraudulent. Simple knowledge is not enough, as he has a right to look after his own interests and need not consult those of other creditors. State v. Mason, 112 Mo. 374 (1892).

And a debtor may secure a debt by a voluntary sale to his creditor, though the creditor knew that his object in making the sale was to deprive himself of the means of paying other debts, as the purchaser would be presumed to have acted, not with a purpose to defraud, but to secure himself. Christian v. Greenwood, 23 Ark. 254, 79 Am. Dec. 104 (1881).

And a sale and delivery of goods by a debtor to a creditor in satisfaction of an honest debt cannot be evaded by other creditors unless made and received with intent in fact to defraud them, and the fact that one of the preferred creditors was the debtor's wife, does not affect the question. Jewell v. Knight, 123 U. S. 423, 31 L. ed. 190 (1887).

So, the knowledge of a bank at the time of the execution of a deed of trust to it securing a debt, that the property covered by the deed was fraudulently procured by the grantor, together with its knowledge of the intention of the grantor to defraud its other creditors in making the deed, does not invalidate it where the debts secured were honest. Stokes v. Burns (Mo.), 33 S. W. 460 (1895).

And a son who takes a conveyance from his father, made with intent, first to prefer such son as a creditor, and second, to place the residue beyond the reach of his other creditors, of which intent the son had full notice, is protected to the extent of his father's indebtedness to him, but not in the additional payment made by him at the time of the transfer. Seller v. Walz, 17 Ky. L. Rep. 301 (1895).

And where a sale is made in fraud of the creditors of the vendor, and so intended by the purchaser also, it is necessary to prove that a mortgagee deriving his title from such purchaser had knowledge of and participated in the fraud in order to invalidate the sale. It is not sufficient that the mortgagee had reasonable cause to know of such fraudulent intent. Carroll v. Hayward, 124 Mass. 121 (1878).

Notice of a fraudulent transfer of property will not prevent a bona fide creditor from purchasing the goods so transferred in payment of an honest debt, or from taking them in execution. Stark v. Ward, 3 Pa. 323.

So, the same rule applies to mortgages and other securities taken by a debtor from a creditor as that applying to absolute transfers in payment of debts. Byrd v. Perry (Tex.), 28 S. W. 749 (1894).

And a mortgage or other security given by a debtor to a creditor to whom a bona fide debt is due, which is taken for the purpose of securing it, and not for the purpose of aiding the debtor to hinder, delay, or defraud other creditors, is valid when the debtor has the right to prefer a creditor, though the mortgagee had knowledge or notice, actual or constructive, of the mortgagor's fraudulent intent. Chase v. Walters, 28 Iowa, 480 (1870); Olmstead v. Mattison, 45 Mich. 617 (1881); Moline Wagon Co. v. Rummell, 14 Fed. Rep. 155 (1882); Alberger v. White, 117 Mo. 347 (1893); Deering v. Collins, 38 Mo. App. 73 (1889); Sabin v. Columbia River Lumber F. Co. 25 Or. 15 (1893); Rook Island Plow Co. v. Hill (Tex.), 32 S. W. 242 (1895); Byrd v. Perry, supra; Rider v. Hunt, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 238 (1894); Hulakamp v. Moline Wagon Co. 121 U. S. 310, 30 L. ed. 971 (1886); Russell v. Letton, 56 Mo. App. 541 (1894).

And the rule is also the same although he knows that the effect will be to delay, hinder, or defeat other creditors. Alberger v. White, supra; First Nat. Bank v. Lowrey Bros. 36 Neb. 290 (1893).

He must also have participated in the fraudulent design of the debtor, and intended to aid and abet the fraud. Deering v. Collins, 38 Mo. App. 73 (1889).

If a mortgagor's intention in making a mortgage was fraudulent, and the mortgagee knew it, the conclusion that he participated in it does not necessarily result therefrom or from the fact that it was not necessary to secure the mortgagee's debt. Worland v. Kimberlin, 6 B. Mon. 606, 44 Am. Dec. 785 (1856).

And a mortgage which is valid on its face, and is accepted by the mortgagee without any secret trust, or understanding, or connivance, or participation in the fraudulent intent of the mortgagor, but for the mere purpose of securing payment of the debt, is not fraudulent and void though the mortgagee may have thought that the mortgagor company was in failing circumstances and that its president sought by the mortgages to hold off its creditors until its financial difficulty could be tidied over. Currie v. Bowman, 25 Or. 334 (1894).

And a purchaser at a foreclosure sale under a mortgage made by a debtor to a creditor with the intent upon the part of the debtor to defraud his creditors, takes good title, though he knew of such fraudulent intent, where the creditor acted in good faith and took the securities solely for his own benefit without any knowledge of any fraud on the part of the debtor. Bergen v. Producer's Marble Yard, 72 Tex. 53 (1893).

So, cestui que trust for whose benefit a mortgage had been taken by a trustee to secure trust moneys, made upon lands which the trustee had fraudulently conveyed to his son, occupy the position of creditors, and not of purchasers, and it is immaterial that in accepting such preference they were aware that the vendee giving them a lien for a debt due from his vendor had taken his title in fraud of the creditors of such vendor; such a transaction is not a participation in the fraud. First Nat. Bank v. Cummins, 39 N. J. Eq. 577 (1885).

And a mortgage for $1,000 executed by an insolvent to his son, of the consideration for which $400 was a pretended debt to the son and $600 a pretended debt to the mother, which the son subsequently, under an arrangement with his father, transferred to a holder of notes of the father to the amount of $300, which notes were given by the son and $400 paid in cash, entitles the holder to claim for the full amount of the security in priority to subsequent execution creditors of the mortgagor, though he had notice of the character of the mortgage. Totten v. Douglas, 18 Grant, Ch. (N. C.) 341 (1871).

But if a creditor taking a conveyance acted with a desire to aid the debtor in defeating other creditors, or in covering up his property, or in giving him a secret interest, it is fraudulent and void. Shelley v. Boothe, 73 Mo. 74, 39 Am. Rep. 481.

And if he takes a chattel mortgage with a design to assist the debtor in cheating or defrauding other creditors, he will not be allowed to profit thereby. Russell v. Letton, 56 Mo. App. 541 (1894).

That a mortgagee knew that one of the purposes of the mortgagor in giving the mortgage was to hinder and delay his creditors, is strong evidence of a participation by him in the fraudulent pur-condition of the affairs of Jones & Fulton, they determined to refuse the extension asked for, and began immediately trying to secure a settlement of their debts. The making of an assignment and the giving of a mortgage were both discussed. Jones & Fulton wanted to make that disposition of their property that would realize most for their creditors, and the other parties wanted that done which would most certainly result in their protection. The representatives of these St. Louis houses acted in perfect concert for their own pose, though it does not of itself constitute such participation. Carr v. Briggs, 156 Mass. 78 (1892).

It is held in a late Pennsylvania case, however, that if a creditor takes a conveyance or payment in any form to secure an actual debt, the transaction will be valid against other creditors, although he knew that the effect would be to postpone others and that the debtor intended it to have that effect, and although he took it to aid that intent as well as to protect himself, the criterion being, not the effect, but the fraudulent intent. Werner v. Zierfuss, 162 Pa. 380 (1894).

But the contrary rule was adopted in Moore v. Williamson, 44 N. J. Eq. 496, 1 L. R. A. 386 (1888), that where a mortgage is made with intent to defraud creditors, and the circumstances are such as to awaken the suspicion of the mortgagee and put him upon inquiry as to the intent with which the mortgage is made, he will be charged with a notice of such intent.

So, the knowledge of a creditor that his debtor had made other conveyances to other creditors at about the same time, with the intent to hinder other creditors, will not defeat a conveyance to him in good faith in payment of an honest debt. Schroeder v. Mason, 25 Mo. App. 190 (1887).

And a transfer by an insolvent debtor of all his property in actual payment or discharge of a pre-existing debt is not fraudulent and void as to creditors, though he has other creditors known to the transferee, where it is unaccompanied by actual fraud. Johnson v. McGrew, 11 Iowa, 151, 77 Am. Dec. 137 (1890).

And when land is given in good faith to satisfy a debt, the knowledge of the vendee that there were other creditors who would take it if he did not, or his taking it to prevent them from securing their claims and effecting the loss of his, is not enough to make the transaction fraudulent and void. Covanhoven v. Hart, 21 Pa. 495, 60 Am. Dec. 57 (1853).

In Covanhoven v. Hart, supra, the court overruled Summers's Appeal, 16 Pa. 169 (1851), and Ashmead v. Hean, 13 Pa. 587 (1850), holding the contrary doctrine, saying that reason and justice have vindicated their supremacy against these judicial invasions of it.

So, the rights of a creditor to take property from his debtor in payment of his claim are not affected by notice of proceedings by other creditors to collect their debts. It is only when under guise of collecting or securing his own debt he obtains a transfer of or charge upon the property of his debtor with intent to hinder or defraud creditors that the title so obtained is void as to him. Storey v. Agnew, 2 Ill. App. 363 (1878).

And a trust deed executed by an officer and director of a corporation upon property belonging to the corporation, the title to which was in his name to secure money borrowed expressly for the use of the corporation and applied to the payment of its liabilities, is not fraudulent as against creditors, although the corporation was in embarrassed circumstances and the beneficiary had notice of the equitable interest of the corporation, where from its acquiescence in the manner of dealing with the property it is presumed to have approved or ratified the transaction. Donham v. Hahn, 127 Mo. 430 (1895).

So, a transfer or mortgage made by a debtor to a creditor, accepted with the honest design to secure the payment of his claim and without intent to defraud other creditors, is valid as against them, 31 L. R. A.

though the creditor knew that the debtor was in failing circumstances. Gage v. Chesebro, 49 Wis. 496 (1890); Cromelin v. McCauley, 67 Ala. 542 (1890); Rockford Boot & S. Mfg. Co. v. Mastin, 75 Iowa, 112 (1898); Olmstead v. Mattison, 45 Mich. 617 (1881); Sibly v. Hood, 3 Mo. 290 (1884).

And though the creditor knows that the debtor is insolvent. Bray v. Ely (Ala.) 17 So. 180 (1895); Crawford v. Kirksey, 55 Ala. 282, 28 Am. Rep. 704 (1876); Dana v. Stanfords, 10 Cal. 299 (1856); Wheaton v. Neville, 19 Cal. 41 (1861); First Nat. Bank v. Jaffray, 41 Kan. 694 (1890); Giddings v. Sears, 115 Mass. 505 (1874); Sibly v. Hood, supra; Stevens Lumber Co. v. Kansas City Planing Mill Co. 59 Mo. App. 373 (1894); Schroeder v. Mason, 25 Mo. App. 190 (1887); Frazer v. Thatcher, 49 Tex. 26 (1878); Hamilton-Brown Shoe Co. v. Whitaker, 4 Tex. Civ. App. 360 (1893); Erdall v. Atwood, 79 Wis. 1 (1891); Crawford v. Neal, 144 U. S. 585, 36 L. ed. 552 (1891); Huiskamp v. Moline Wagon Co. 121 U. S. 310, 30 L. ed. 971 (1886); Sweetzer v. Higby, 63 Mich. 13 (1896).

And a transfer or mortgage by a debtor to a creditor to pay or secure his claim is not subject to objection on the ground of fraud participated in by the purchaser or mortgagee, though he knew that the effect would be to prevent the collection by other creditors of their claims, or to hinder and delay them. Bray v. Ely, supra; Curran v. Olmstead, 101 Ala. 692 (1894); Bates v. Vandiver, 102 Ala. 249 (1894); Seaman v. Nolen, 68 Ala. 463 (1890); Crawford v. Kirksey, supra; Gilkerson-Sloes Commission Co. v. Carnes, 56 Ark. 414 (1892); Wheaton v. Neville, and Dana v. Stanfords, supra; Martin v. Duncan, 47 Ill. App. 84 (1892); Locke v. Duncan, 47 Ill. App. 110 (1892); Levi v. Bray, 12 Ind. App. 9 (1895); Ford v. Williams, 3 B. Mon. 550 (1843); Giddings v. Sears, supra; Banfield v. Whipple, 14 Allen, 13 (1867); Olmstead v. Mattison, 45 Mich. 617 (1881); Sweetzer v. Higby, Stevens Lumber Co. v. Kansas City Planing Mill Co., and Schroeder v. Mason, supra; First Nat. Bank v. Lowrey Bros. 36 Neb. 290 (1893); Hopkins v. Beebe, 26 Pa. 85 (1856); Covanhoven v. Hart, 21 Pa. 495, 60 Am. Dec. 57 (1853); Wood v. Castlebury (Tex.) 84 S. W. 653 (1896); Greenleive v. Blum, 59 Tex. 124 (1883); Young v. Dumas, 59 Ala. 60 (1893).

A creditor has a perfect right to purchase property of his debtor in payment of his claim where it is an honest one and he buys no more than is sufficient to pay it, notwithstanding the insolvency of the debtor. Owens v. Clark, 78 Tex. 547 (1890).

And the fact that a creditor taking the property of his debtor in payment of his claim has delayed until his debtor is on the eve of bankruptcy does not show that he was not acting in good faith. Young v. Clapp, 40 Ill. App. 312 (1890).

Thus, knowledge by a mortgagee that a verdict had been rendered against his mortgagor, and that he would be unable to pay the sum named in the verdict, does not make it a fraud on his part to take security for a debt due him or invalidate the mortgage as against creditors. Straight v. Roberts, 126 Ind. 383 (1890).

And a conveyance by a debtor to his creditor to secure a bona fide debt will be upheld, although the grantee had full knowledge that the grantor had no other property or means to pay other creditors and was insolvent after the transfer, where the property taken is of no greater value than the amount of the debt, though the debt be one barred by the statute of limitations. Hale v. Stewart, 7 Hun, 591 (1876).

And a conveyance of cotton by a debtor to his protection. While negotiations were pending between these parties, a representative of another firm, to whom Jones & Fulton were indebted, was in Hot Springs, and Armstrong, who represented the Clark Shoe Company, told Jones & Fulton that, if they wanted to, they could go over and look at his goods, to keep him from finding out what was going on. Mr. Fulton testified that Brown and Armstrong, who represented Rice, Stix, & Co. and Clark Shoe Company, when they were trying to get them to make the bill creditor, made in part satisfaction of a debt due him for which credit was given the debtor upon the indebtedness to the same amount as the value of the cotton conveyed, is not invalidated by reason of the creditor's knowledge that he was obtaining an advantage over other creditors and delaying and hindering them in the collection of their debts. Smith v. Whitfield, 87 Tex. 124 (1886).

And a mortgage made in good faith by an insolvent debtor, covering his property, to secure a bona fide debt executed in contemplation of an assignment which is made the next day, is valid and enforceable, and not a part of the assignment, though the mortgagee had knowledge that the assignment was contemplated. Gilbert v. McCorkel, 110 Ind. 215 (1886).

So, a chattel mortgage given by a husband to his wife to secure a bona fide debt is valid as against his creditors, although she knew at the time that he was indebted to others, and that suits were pending to enforce the collection of such claim. Dice v. Irvin, 110 Ind. 561 (1886).

And a conveyance for a valuable consideration by a husband to his wife, made with intent to defraud creditors, vests title in her as against such creditors where she had no notice of such intent, though she may have known of the existence of indebtedness and its amount. Brigham v. Hubbard, 115 Ind. 474 (1888).

And such a conveyance when she knew he was largely in debt but did not know that he had been sued thereon, will be treated as a security for the amount of his bona fide indebtedness to her, and creditors will be permitted to enforce their claims against the property subject thereto. Stamy v. Laning, 58 Iowa, 602 (1882).

And a purchase by a creditor from his debtor of the debtor's interest in his wife's estate for the purpose of securing the payment of an indebtedness due the creditor which was agreed to be deducted from the purchase price, will not be regarded as fraudulent and void as to creditors because the creditor had been told by the debtor that he expected that his interest would be attacked by creditors and that something would have to be done, in the absence of evidence of a positive intent on the part of the creditor to collude with the debtor to hinder and delay creditors as distinguished from his purpose to save his debt. Bear's Estate, 60 Pa. 430 (1869).

So, a purchase by a creditor of a firm and one of its members, with the assent of all of the partners in good faith and at a fair price, of goods from the firm to the amount of a joint and separate indebtedness then due, is not per se fraudulent as against the general creditors of the firm, though the purchasers had knowledge that such firm was insolvent in the popular sense of the term. Sigler v. Knox County Bank, 8 Ohio St. 516 (1858).

And a mortgage given by a debtor to his surety when, the debtor was in insolvent circumstances, to the knowledge of the mortgagee, in consideration of which the mortgagee raised money and advanced it with a large additional amount to the mortgagor, who thereupon paid the debt for which the mortgagee was surety and other notes on which relatives were indorsers out of the money thus raised, is valid whether the mortgagee knew of the insolvent's intention to apply the moneys to pay off certain creditors in preference to others or not. Campbell v. Roache, 18 Ont. App. Rep. 646 (1891).

And a memorandum made by a solicitor a fortnight before his death, in whose hands a client had placed money for investment and who had died insolvent without investing the money, declaring himself trustee of certain leaseholds then in mortgage to himself, and of a bill which he had indorsed to the client to secure the repayment of the sum placed in his hands, is good and entitles the client to the benefit of the security as against other creditors, even if the solicitor executed the memorandum with knowledge of his insolvency, as he retained no benefit to himself. Middleton v. Pollock, L. R. 2 Ch. Div. 104, 45 L. J. Ch. 298 (1875).

So, the fact that a person in failing circumstances engages with others in a business which requires money and credit, and executes a bill of trust for the performance of his engagements, does not indicate mala fides upon the part of those he thus engages with, though they are aware of his embarrassed condition. Dubose v. Young, 14 Ala. 139 (1848).

And proof that partners were in debt is not sufficient to raise a presumption of fraud and avoid mortgages made by them in the absence of anything to show that they were made with intent to defraud creditors of the firm and that the mortgagees had knowledge of such intention. Green v. Tanner, 8 Met. 411 (1844).

But, parties who take security from insolvents or from parties who are indebted to others must act in good faith and so as not to unnecessarily hinder, delay, or deceive other creditors. Showman v. Lee, 86 Mich. 556 (1891).

And the fact that a creditor knew of his debtor's insolvency when taking a transfer from him may be evidence of a fraudulent intent. Erdall v. Atwood, 79 Wis. 1 (1891).

And a creditor who takes a mortgage from an insolvent debtor with knowledge of his condition, and subsequently takes a transfer of the mortgaged property but a few days before an attachment was levied on it, may be considered as having aided the mortgagor in his fraudulent design to defraud the attachment creditor. Shultz v. Morgan, 27 La. Ann. 616 (1875).

As to the effect of notice or knowledge when more property is conveyed than is necessary to pay the debt, see infra, e.

d. Assumption of other debts as part of purchase price.

The question whether a transfer or security given by a debtor to a creditor to secure or pay his claim, in consideration for which he also pays or assumes the payment of claims of other creditors, will be regarded as a fraud upon creditors, participated in by the purchaser or mortgagee, seems to depend upon the bona fides and fairness of the transaction.

Thus, a stipulation by a purchasing creditor from a failing debtor at a fair and reasonable price, not materially less than the value of the property, to pay debts due to certain other creditors as a part of the agreed price, does not render the transaction fraudulent and void. Chipman v. Stern, 89 Ala. 207 (1890); Ford v. Williams, 8 B. Mon. 560 (1851).

And a sale by a debtor of his entire stock of goods to a creditor at a fair and reasonable valuation in payment of his claims is not rendered fraudulent as to creditors by the fact that an additional sum over and above the debt was paid under an express stipulation that it should be applied in payment of of sale, told them (Jones & Fulton) that they would always be their friends, and assist them in any way they could, but that this promise had nothing to do with their making the trade. He also testified that the parties said for them to keep the money they had in bank, about $850, and their accounts. Col. E. W. Rector, who represented some of the attaching creditors (among others, Voorhees, Miller, & Rupel, who were to be paid $400 by the terms of the bill of sale), states that he went to see Brown, who was in charge of the debt due another creditor. Rankin v. Vandiver, 78 Ala. 562 (1885).

And in Johnson v. McGrew, 11 Iowa. 151, 77 Am. Dec. 137 (1880), it was held that a sale by a debtor of all his property to a creditor for a fixed sum, which such creditor pays in part by discharging the indebtedness which he holds, and in part by undertaking to pay other debts of the grantor and paying them the balance in money, is valid in the absence of actual fraud, and does not constitute a general assignment.

The knowledge of a purchaser that the vendor's intent and the necessary effect of the transaction would be to place the property beyond the reach of others creditors will not invalidate a sale made in consideration and satisfaction of a debt due him from such vendor and his assumption of the payment of several other debts. Lewy v. Fischl, 65 Tex. 311 (1886).

So, a transfer by a debtor to a creditor of not more of the debtor's goods than was sufficient to pay the creditor's claim, besides which the creditor undertakes to pay the debts due certain other creditors, is not invalid as a transfer to defraud creditors, though it may result in delaying or even defeating them. Noyes v. Sanger Bros. 8 Tex. Civ. App. 388 (1894).

And a purchase by a vendee from an indebted vendor for a full and fair price, a considerable portion of which goes to discharge the vendor's debts for which the vendee is surety, furnishes cogent evidence that the intent of the vendee was to secure himself rather than to defraud the creditors of the vendor. Brown v. Foree, 7 B. Mon. 357 (1847).

And a sale of property at a fair price, made for the purpose of raising money to pay debts, by the terms of which the purchaser is bound to and does appropriate the purchase price to such purpose, cannot be said to have been made to hinder, delay, or defraud a creditor, though he received no part of the proceeds. Ellis v. Valentine, 65 Tex. 532 (1886).

So, a verdict that a creditor was a bona fide purchaser will not be disturbed where the evidence shows his purchase through an agent of the stock of goods of his debtor at their full value in satisfaction of his claim and the payment of certain other debts which he assumed, though there were still other debts of which he had notice. Keith Bros. v. Keffelfinger, 12 Neb. 497 (1892).

And a purchase by a creditor in good faith from his debtor for the purpose of securing his claim is valid after satisfying prior liens, though the goods were in the possession of an officer replevying them under a chattel mortgage. Morris v. Tillson, 81 Ill. 607 (1876).

So, a sale of property by a debtor to a creditor, a part of the consideration for which is the payment and cancellation of a claim of one of the vendor's creditors, is good if made in good faith and for an adequate consideration, but is void as to creditors if not so made, but for the purpose of enabling the debtor to pay one creditor in full and to hinder, delay, or defraud his other creditors, or for the purpose of putting him in a position to force a settlement with them. State, Heye, v. Frank, 22 Mo. App. 53 (1886).

And where a transfer is made by one anticipating a judgment in a suit pending against him, to his son with intent to prevent the collection of the judgment, the son agreeing to pay his father's debts to certain bona fide creditors and executing mortgages to them therefor while the action was still pending and after verdict but before judgment, executing other mortgages to his brother, the property will be relieved of the latter mortgages on a bill filed by a judgment creditor, but the mortgages to creditors will be held good where they did not participate in the fraudulent intent. Beam v. Bennett, 51 Mich. 148 (1883).

So, including in a mortgage debts claimed to be due to others, the mortgagee giving his parol undertaking to pay such debts, does not of itself make the mortgage fraudulent, but when considered in connection with other circumstances may be evidence of a fraudulent intent. Carpenter v. Muren, 42 Barb. 300 (1864).

And an agreement that a debtor shall execute a chattel mortgage upon his entire stock of goods, reserving the right to withdraw a certain amount of such goods to be turned over to another creditor in payment of a claim considered to be just, and a chattel mortgage executed and delivered pursuant to such agreement, are not fraudulent as against other creditors. First Nat. Bank v. North, 2 S. D. 480 (1892).

And taking a note and mortgage by a creditor from his debtor, intended to secure two creditors besides himself, does not invalidate the transaction as to creditors where the mortgagor refused to give such security unless the mortgagee would assume and agree to pay such creditors. Lycoming Rubber Co. v. King, 50 Iowa, 343 (1894).

And a mortgage given to trustees in good faith and without intent to defraud, to secure the indebtedness of the mortgagor to a third person named therein, by which the trustees were authorized to take possession of a hotel, leased by the mortgagor from a person to whom he was indebted, and to conduct the same and out of the proceeds pay the expenses of management, and from the balance pay off the indebtedness of the mortgagor to such lessor, and after the payment of a reasonable compensation to the trustees to return the remainder to the mortgagor, is not fraudulent either in fact or in law. Ottman v. Cooper, 81 Hun, 530 (1894).

A purchase of goods from an insolvent by a purchaser to whom such insolvency was known, however, is fraudulent and void as to creditors, unless the purchaser paid a fair price for them with a valid debt due him by the vendor and other valid debts, etc. Tennent, S. & E. Shoe Co. v. Partridge, 82 Tex. 329 (1891).

And the surrender of a note by a creditor to a debtor, the debtor at once giving it as security to other creditors, after which the creditor buys the stock of goods of the debtor, satisfying his own debt and paying debts of others, furnishes a question for the jury as to the existence of a fraudulent intent. Ibid.

In Tennent, S. & E. Shoe Co. v. Partridge, supra, Seligson v. Brown, 61 Tex. 182, in which the purchaser was not a creditor, was distinguished upon the ground that in that case the question arose upon a charge refused or asked, while in this one it arose upon an issue of fact, fraudulent intent or not.

So, a purchase by a creditor of his debtor of property in satisfaction of his debt and of the debts of other favored creditors, taking a large surplus over to the exclusion of a particular creditor, whose suit was then pending, is evidence of fraud. Peck v. Land, 2 Ga. L. 46 Am. Dec. 365 (1847).

And a sale by a debtor to a creditor under an the store, and told him that he wanted to get the $400, and see the bill of sale. He says that Brown told him that he wanted to see Col. Murphy before paying the money, and that on the next day Murphy and Brown came to his office, and said they were ready to pay the money, but wanted him to recognize the bill of sale, and that he declined to do so. Judge Leatherman, who represented M. Wolf & Sons, who were to be paid $325 by the terms of the bill of sale, testified that he went to Brown, and asked him when he agreement that the creditor should sell the property and pay himself out of the proceeds, and then pay certain other creditors and return the balance to the debtor, entered into for the purpose of preventing creditors of such debtor from attacking and seizing the property, is fraudulent and void. Menton v. Adams, 49 Cal. 620 (1875).

So, a transfer by a debtor in embarrassed circumstances of all his property not exempt from execution to one who was well acquainted with all the facts and who paid therefor nothing but the mortgages and judgment liens thereon and the debt of one creditor in addition to a debt due himself, taken in connection with other evidence tending to establish unfairness of the whole transaction, was held to be fraudulent and void as to creditors of the vendor in Ferguson v. Hillman, 55 Wis. 181 (1882).

And a conveyance by a copartnership in failing circumstances with a view to insolvency, authorizing the grantees to pay such claims of other persons not mentioned in the conveyance as the vendees may deem prudent, conditioned that such conveyance should be void in case of failure of the grantees to pay certain notes, is in violation of the act against fraudulent conveyances, and void. Harvey v. Mix, 24 Conn. 406 (1856).

And a transfer of goods paid for partly in a debt due the purchaser, partly in the assumption by him of other debts due by the vendor, and partly in a note made by the purchaser, payable to the order of the vendor, will be set aside where it was fraudulent as to the part of the consideration received in the form of the purchaser's note, though the transaction was fair and unimpeachable in so far as by it honest debts of the vendor were paid. Lambeth v. McClinton, 65 Tex. 108 (1885).

So, in Re Chaplin, L. R. 26 Ch. Div. 319, 53 L. J. Ch. N. S. 732, 51 L. J. 345 (1884), a conveyance in which the grantee undertook the payment of the grantor's debts and agreed to employ the grantor to manage the business, which was thereafter carried on in the grantor's name as before, with nothing to show a change, was held, in connection with the fact that the debt thereby paid was overstated, to be void as against a trustee in bankruptcy as in fraud of the bankruptcy act and of the assignor's creditors under the statute of Elizabeth.

Some of the cases, however, have proceeded on the theory that a transfer providing for the payment of other debts besides those of the transferee is to be regarded as a sale proper, and not a transfer in payment of a debt, within the rule charging a purchaser with participation in the fraudulent intent of the vendor from mere notice, though he did nothing in aid of it except to make the transfer.

Thus, a sale of all the property of a firm in embarrassed circumstances, which amounts in all to over $16,000, in consideration for which the vendee agrees to cancel his indebtedness to him, amounting to $9,850, and to pay $3,300 to another person, and to pay other items entitled to a preference, shows an intention to make an out and out sale as distinguished from a transfer in payment of a debt, the intent of which is to be determined by that of the purchaser as well as the vendor. Hine v. Bowe, 46 Hun, 196 (1887).

And in Bollman v. Lucas, 22 Neb. 796 (1888), a creditor who purchased the stock of goods of his debtor taking out of the consideration his own claim, and also paying the claims of several other debtors amounting in all to the consideration money in the bill of sale, was treated as a purchaser, and not as a creditor taking payment of his debt in property.

And in Allen v. Stingel, 95 Mich. 195 (1893), it was held that a purchase by a mortgagee in consideration of his assumption of prior mortgages and taxes where the land was worth $200 more than the amount of all the mortgages and taxes, is invalid as against creditors, where the intent of the mortgagor, of which the mortgagee had notice, was to defraud his unsecured creditors.

e. Amount of property taken.

The doctrine seems to be universal that a creditor may secure the payment of his claim from a failing debtor by taking a transfer of property where he acts in good faith and obtains no more property than will suffice to satisfy his claim.

This was held or stated in H. B. Clafin Co. v. Rodenberg, 101 Ala. 213 (1893); Smith v. Boyer, 29 Neb. 76 (1890); Elwood v. May Bros., 24 Neb. 373 (1888); Rothell v. Grimes, 22 Neb. 526 (1887); Sanger Bros. v. Colbert, 84 Tex. 668 (1892); Hellman v. Bick, 55 Mo. App. 168 (1893); Christian v. Greenwood, 23 Ark. 264, 79 Am. Dec. 104 (1861); Bruce v. Smith, 3 Harr. & J. 499 (1805); Owens v. Clark, 78 Tex. 547 (1890); Noyes v. Sanger, 8 Tex. Civ. App. 388 (1894).

And in Peters-Miller Shoe Co. v. Casebeer, 53 Mo. App. 640 (1893), it was held that a conveyance by a debtor to his creditor in payment of his claim is valid where there is nothing to show that more property was bought than was reasonably necessary to pay the debt, or that the purchaser was a party to or cognizant of any scheme or fraud on the part of his grantor.

Where property received by a creditor in payment of his claim is no more than is reasonably required to satisfy his debt, taking into consideration the expense incident to a conversion of the property into money, the invalidity of the transfer must result from proof of a fraudulent intent in fact on the part of both the debtor and the preferred creditor. Blankenship v. Willis, 1 Tex. Civ. App. 657 (1892).

And a conveyance by a debtor to a creditor to secure a bona fide debt will be upheld though the creditor knew that the debtor had no other means with which to pay other creditors, where the property taken is no greater in value than the amount of the debt. Hale v. Stewart, 7 Hun, 591 (1876).

So, the receipt of goods by a creditor from his debtor in payment of his debts is not fraudulent as against the debtor's other creditors, though it may result in hindering them, where the goods taken are of a value reasonably proportionate to the debt extinguished and the debtor reserves to himself no benefit in the goods transferred. La Belle Wagon Works v. Tidball, 69 Tex. 161.

And the creditor has a right to take the property from an insolvent debtor if it be openly done. Greenleve v. Blum, 59 Tex. 124 (1883); Smith v. Whitfield, 67 Tex. 124 (1896).

And a creditor who in good faith receives a transfer of his debtor's property for the purpose of satisfying his claim, receiving no more than is sufficient for that purpose, will be protected, although his debtor may be insolvent and may have intended to defraud his other creditors and such facts are known to the creditor at the time of his purchase. Hamilton-Brown Shoe Co. v. Whitaker, 4 Tex. Civ. App. 380 (1893); Smith v. Whitfield, was going to pay the $325; and Brown told him that he would do so when he returned to St. Louis, and, upon being asked when he expected to return, said: "When I dispose of this stock here." There was a difference in the testimony as to the amount of goods Jones & Fulton had in stock at the time of the sale. The inventory taken by the purchasers showed $10,129. Jones & Fulton testified that the stock amounted to $13,000 or $14,000. The defendants attacked the inventory taken by the purchasers, claim-supra: Traders' Nat. Bank v. Day, 7 Tex. Civ. App. 569 (1894); Edwards v. Dickson, 66 Tex. 613 (1893); Reynolds v. Weinman (Tex.) 25 S. W. 33 (1894); Owens v. Clark, 78 Tex. 547 (1890).

So, a mortgage or bill of sale given by a failing debtor to secure an honest debt is not fraudulent though the parties knew that the claims of other creditors would be thereby defeated, provided the fair value of the property purchased as security did not greatly exceed the amount of the debt, interest, and probable expense of foreclosure. First Nat. Bank v. Lowrey Bros. 36 Neb. 290 (1893).

And where a creditor who holds a mortgage as security for his debt takes from his debtor other property with the agreement to apply the proceeds to his claim, if the value of the additional property added to that of the mortgaged property is materially in excess of what was necessary to satisfy his claim, the sale of the additional property must be deemed fraudulent and the purchaser will be held to have participated in the fraud, but if no more was taken than was reasonably necessary to pay the debt the law will protect the purchaser. State v. Durant, 53 Mo. App. 493 (1895).

And a conveyance by a person indebted in a considerable amount, both on his private account and as partner, to his copartner, of all his real estate to secure an indebtedness to him, and of a quantity of personal property for cash, after which he removes to another state with the money and all his remaining property, his copartner knowing of his indebtedness and of his intention to leave the state without paying his debts and that no property would be left in the state, but having the intent to secure a settlement with him and to furnish him with money to set up business in the other state, is not fraudulent as against partnership creditors, as the copartner remains personally liable for the partnership debt and the property could still be attached by partnership creditors, and is not void as against private creditors where he was not insolvent, as it was not made by him while in failing circumstances and was not void under the statute against fraudulent conveyances where the copartner had no knowledge of any fraudulent intent. Hamilton v. Staples, 34 Conn. 316 (1867).

But the law will not suffer a creditor, although he has a just demand, to use it as a screen to protect the debtor's estate from his other creditors where the estate greatly exceeds in value the amount of the debt. Kuykendall v. McDonald, 15 Mo. 416, 57 Am. Dec. 212 (1852); Edrington v. Rogers, 15 Tex. 188 (1855); Smith v. Boyer, 29 Neb. 76 (1890); Collingsworth v. Bell (Kan.) 43 Pac. 252 (1896).

In Smith v. Boyer, supra, Grimes v. Farrington Bros. 19 Neb. 449 (1886), infra, III. m, was distinguished upon the ground that in that case it did not appear that the property would sell for more than the amount of the debt.

And a purchase of property in payment of a debt is not valid as to creditors unless the goods taken bear a just proportion to the amount of the debt sought to be paid thereby. Schram v. Taylor, 51 Kan. 547 (1893); Smith v. Whitfield, 67 Tex. 124 (1896).

A creditor cannot purchase the goods of his debtor at a price in excess of his debt, when he knows that the excess so paid will be placed beyond the reach of the debtor's other creditors. Such a purchaser is a participant in the fraud of the debtor whether he intended to aid him or not. Hart v. Sandy, 39 W. Va. 644 (1894); McVeagh v. Baxter, 82 Mo. 518 (1884).

Some of the cases have been decided upon the 31 L. R. A. theory that the creditor is limited to taking the exact amount of his indebtedness.

Thus, it was held that a creditor who takes from his debtor in payment of his debt more of his property than what appears to be reasonably worth the amount of the debt, commits a fraud upon other creditors which invalidates the transaction. Klein v. Hoffheimer, 132 U. S. 367, 33 L. ed. 373 (1890); Sanger Bros. v. Colbert, 84 Tex. 668 (1892); Edwards v. Dickson, 66 Tex. 613 (1893).

So, a transfer by a debtor to a creditor of property of value considerably in excess of the amount of the debt, the creditor not obligating himself to pay the excess to other creditors but executing his negotiable note therefor payable on a long credit to the vendor, is fraudulent in law, as the necessary consequence is to hinder and delay other creditors as to the surplus, and the purchaser cannot be permitted to say that his intent was fair and that the vendor agreed to appropriate the note to the payment of his other creditors. Elser v. Graber, 69 Tex. 222 (1897).

And where an involved debtor conveys property to his daughter to satisfy an indebtedness due her which greatly exceeds that indebtedness in value, and would tend to hinder, delay, and defeat the claims of other creditors, the whole transaction is fraudulent as far as such creditors are concerned. Reeves v. Shey, 39 Tex. 634 (1873).

And the assignment of a life insurance policy and the execution of a bill of sale absolute on its face but intended to secure a debt out of all proportion to the value of the property conveyed, made by a grantor utterly insolvent to a grantee of limited means, will be deemed fraudulent in the absence of explanatory evidence. Earnshaw v. Stewart 64 Md. 513 (1896).

So, in Oppenheimer v. Half, 68 Tex. 400 (1897), it was contended that a purchase of property by a creditor of a debtor for which the creditor satisfied his claim and paid the debtor $1,000 in cash in addition, was not fraudulent and void as to other creditors, where the value of the property did not exceed the amount of the debt, and the $1,000 in cash was given as an inducement or bonus to obtain the preference over other creditors; but the contention was not sustained purely upon the ground that the value of the property conveyed did exceed the amount of the indebtedness.

But the belief of a wife, who took a chattel mortgage from her husband who was financially embarrassed to secure a bona fide debt due her of $4,268.51, for which he executed a bill of sale to her for the property to secure such debt and another debt of $1,075 due to third persons for which she was surety, that the property thus conveyed was worth $10,000, while in fact it was worth only about one half that amount, will not invalidate either the mortgage or the bill of sale where she acted in good faith, believing that the property was only a fair security for the debts and not intended to defraud any one or to hinder or delay creditors, further than might result from the honestly securing of her own debt. Miller v. Krueger, 36 Kan. 344 (1897).

Such a transfer, however, has been held to be a badge of fraud. Peck v. Land, 21 Ga. 1, 46 Am. Dec. 368 (1847); Howerton v. Holt, 23 Tex. 53 (1859); Baylor v. Brown, 8 Tex. Civ. App. 177 (1893).

Which is admissible in evidence as tending in connection with other facts to establish fraud. Howerton v. Holt, supra.

And it is thought that the doctrine may be re-ing that in certain particulars it was fraudulent, and not a true statement of the actual assets. It seems to be conceded by all parties that all the debts mentioned in the bill of sale were bona fide. It was shown upon the trial that the attachment in the McGuire case was sustained, and that the goods attached sold for $115, several months after they were seized under the attachment.

The court gave eighteen instructions at the request of the plaintiffs, and refused the following asked by them: "(18) In this garded as established by the weight of authority that such a transfer is nothing but a badge of fraud, and that whether or not the transaction will be regarded as fraudulent in fact will depend upon the accompanying facts and circumstances.

Thus, a purchase by a creditor from his falling debtor in payment of his claim is good as against other creditors, even though the purchase exceeds the demand, in the absence of anything else to show a fraudulent intent. Young v. Stallings, 5 B. Mon. 307 (1845); Hobbs v. Davis, 50 Ga. 214 (1873).

A sale by a debtor to a creditor for the payment of his claim is to be considered as a whole, and if there is a balance due the debtor for which the purchaser gives his notes, it will not be set aside for that reason alone to that extent in favor of creditors. Beurmann v. Van Buren, 44 Mich. 496 (1880).

And a purchase by a creditor from his debtor for the purpose of the payment of his debt cannot be impeached though he may have paid the difference between the amount of the note due him and the price agreed upon for the property in money, where his motive was to obtain payment only. Reehling v. Byers, 94 Pa. 316 (1880).

So, a slight excess in value of goods taken by a creditor from a debtor in payment of his claim over the amount of the indebtedness, will not vitiate the transaction where the creditor acted in good faith. La Belle Wagon Works v. Tidball, 69 Tex. 161 (1887); Peters Saddlery & H. Co. v. Schoelkopf, 71 Tex. 418 (1888).

Thus, a purchase of goods by a creditor from his debtor in payment of the creditor's debt will be treated as a preference of one debtor over another, although the amount of the purchase far exceeded the debt, where the balance of the purchase price was appropriated to the discharge of other of the debtor's obligations. Tennent Stribling Shoe Co. v. Rudy, 53 Mo. App. 196 (1893).

And a purchase by a creditor of his debtor in payment of his claim of a negro woman and two children at $900 which was $240 more than the creditor's demand, made by the debtor with intent to defraud other creditors, will be held good where they were family slaves and it does not appear that the purchaser had knowledge of such fraudulent intent. Young v. Stallings, 5 B. Mon. 307 (1845).

And a conveyance from a husband to his wife to secure an honest debt is valid to the amount of such debt although the amount conveyed largely exceeds the amount thereof, where the wife honestly believed her husband indebted to her for other money sufficient to make the indebtedness equal to the value of the land, though the husband had no right as against his creditors to account to her therefor; but she will hold the excess in trust for the use of his creditors. Columbia Sav. Bank v. Winn (Mo.) 38 S. W. 457 (1895).

And a conveyance by an insolvent debtor of land in part satisfaction of prior indebtedness is not rendered invalid by a subsequent independent transaction on the same day, whereby the debtor sells merchandise to settle the rest of the debt to the same vendee, although the vendee then pays a small sum to the debtor to balance the account. Buford v. Shannon, 95 Ala. 205 (1891).

The rule would seem to be that a purchase by a creditor from his debtor in payment of his claim is not invalidated because the property exceeded the amount of the debt, when this was reasonably necessary to effect the lawful purpose of satisfying the debt, but the necessity must arise from the nature, situation, or condition of the property, and not from the debtor's demand for cash. Levy v. Williams, 79 Ala. 171 (1885).

Thus, a creditor may purchase lands of his debtor in satisfaction of his debt, and if necessary or convenient to effect the object he may advance cash to the debtor for a balance of the value without being pledged to see to the application of the cash to the payment of other debts. Gist v. Barrow, 42 Ark. 521 (1884).

And in Christian v. Greenwood, 23 Ark. 258, 79 Am. Dec. 104 (1861), it was held that a creditor purchasing of his debtor in payment of his debt must not buy more than is necessary for his own protection unless good reason appears why the property should be sold together and not separated so as to make the quantity equal to the amount of the debt.

But where a debtor's property is easily separable, if the creditor receives the same in excess of his indebtedness and pays the difference in money and has knowledge of the design of the debtor to transfer all of his property with intent to defraud his other creditors, the purchase is fraudulent in toto and cannot be separated as against creditors. McDonald v. Gaunt, 30 Kan. 693 (1883).

And the receipt by a creditor of property of his debtor in payment of a debt in excess of the amount of the indebtedness, paying the difference in money where the property is easily separable, is sufficient to establish the creditor's privity to a fraudulent intent of the debtor, and will invalidate the purchase. Ibid.

So, a conveyance taken by a creditor from his debtor of an amount of property more than sufficient to secure his debt for the purpose of enabling him to delay other creditors is fraudulent and void as against such creditors. McNichols v. Richter, 13 Mo. App. 515 (1883); Davis v. McCarthy, 40 Kan. 18 (1883).

And a transfer by a debtor of property which at a fair valuation is ample to satisfy all that he owes by way of sale and payment of a single creditor who is a near relative casts the burden of proof as to the entire bona fides of the transfer upon the purchaser. Demarest v. Terhune, 18 N. J. Eq. 532 (1867).

And a purchase by a creditor from a debtor in payment of his debt of more property than was necessary for such payment is fraudulent and void where there was a specific intent to hinder and delay other creditors, though the debtor subsequently used the money paid him by the purchaser in excess of his debt in the payment of debts due to other creditors, as the question of the validity of the transaction is governed by the facts existing when it was consummated. Willis v. Yates (Tex.) 12 S. W. 232 (1889).

So, a transfer by an insolvent debtor of all his property in payment of a debt, receiving a note for a balance with an understanding that he should get back part of the property for working out the stock sold, and that the money was to be made out of the stock before the notes should be paid, is fraudulent and void as to creditors. Bentz v. Rockey, 69 Pa. 71 (1871).

And a conveyance by an insolvent grantor justly indebted to his grantee in a comparatively smaller amount, of all or nearly all his property in satisfaction of the debt for a nominal consideration, falsely recited and claimed by the grantee to have case no evidence has been adduced upon which you would be legally justified in finding a verdict for the defendants. You are therefore instructed to find a verdict for the plaintiffs, assessing their damages at the value of the goods seized under the attachment of J. M. McGuire & Co. v. Jones & Fulton at the time of their seizure. (19) You are instructed that a fraud that would vitiate a sale of goods must be in the sale itself, and not in some mere device for putting other creditors off their guard, and pre-been in hand paid equal in value to the property conveyed, but largely in excess of the debt actually due, is fraudulent and void when accepted by the grantee as to other creditors. Knight v. Capito, 23 W. Va. 639 (1884).

And a conveyance of one eighth of a ship for less than one half of its value, absolute in form and intended to be treated as absolute as to third parties but which was not so in fact between the parties but intended as security only, is fraudulent as against existing creditors, and when set up by the purchaser, as an absolute sale he will be charged absolutely and not on condition of payment to him of the consideration for the conveyance. Thompson v. Pennell, 67 Me. 159 (1877).

So, a violent presumption of a secret trust is raised by a conveyance by an insolvent debtor to a creditor of all his property in payment of a debt which is less than one fourth of the true value of the property, and about one fourth of the price which a purchaser offered and stood ready to give, which will invalidate the conveyance in the absence of anything to rebut it. Shelton v. Church, 38 Conn. 418 (1871).

And the execution by a debtor of a deed, upon the eve of his departure from the state and shortly after the receipt of intelligence materially affecting his credit, of property worth more than double the amount of the debt to be secured, to a creditor, the bill of lading for a part of the property having been antedated by the grantee for the purpose of overreaching another creditor who had previously obtained a bill of lading and who permitted the grantee to take, use, and sell the property contrary to the tenor of the deed, or connived at his doing so, sufficiently shows collusion between the debtor and the creditor to injure and defraud the rest, to prevent the creditor from being entitled to any prior lien by virtue of his deed. Wright v. Hencock, 3 Munf. 521 (1812).

And evidence that a sale by a debtor who had obtained goods by false pretenses and with intent not to pay for them, to a third party through an agent of the purchaser who had knowledge of the insolvent condition of the vendor, in consideration of the satisfaction of an indebtedness of the vendor amounting to $3,000, the purchaser giving a check for the balance of the purchase price of $10,000, after which he immediately sells the same to another for $500 less, when the goods are sold at auction and he is paid from the proceeds of the auction sales, no inventory having been taken at either sale, warrants a finding that the first purchaser had notice or knowledge of the fraudulent intent of the original vendor. Grossman v. Walters, 33 N. Y. S. R. 921 (1890).

And in Zeigler v. Carter Bros., 94 Ala. 291 (1891), a conveyance of property worth $850 in consideration of an antecedent debt of $850, was set aside as fraudulent and void as against creditors, where, soon after the conveyance, the grantee leased a part of the property to the grantor, who had no apparent means, and who at once erected a livery stable thereon worth $400 or $500 which was held in his wife's name but superintended and managed by the husband.

And in Hamlin v. Wright, 26 Wis. 50 (1870), a conveyance of land in settlement of partnership accounts, the land being worth several times the amount of the pretended balance, was held, in connection with the continued use and retention of profits by the grantor and other circumstances, to 31 L. R. A.

be sufficient to invalidate the conveyance as against creditors.

So, a conveyance by a debtor of his entire stock of goods, fixtures, etc., and credit given upon his debt therefor and the execution upon the same day of another conveyance to the same creditor of all his notes, accounts, and outstandings for the purpose of further securing such indebtedness, must be considered together as parts of the whole transaction; and where the value of the property transferred thereby greatly exceeds the debt to be paid or secured, it is a badge of fraud in fact, the effect of which is to be left to the jury. Baylor v. Brown (Tex.) 21 S. W. 73 (1893).

Whether or not more goods were intentionally received by a creditor in payment of his claim than were reasonably required to satisfy his debt, and whether the transaction was open and fair, solely for the purpose on the part of the purchaser of collecting a just debt, or whether there was also a fraudulent purpose to which the purchaser was privy, are questions for the jury. Blankenship v. Willis, 1 Tex. Civ. App. 657 (1892).

And a direction of a verdict upholding a transfer by which a preference was given to one creditor over another is erroneous where there is a conflict in the evidence as to whether more property was transferred than was reasonably necessary to pay the preferred debt. Pierce v. Lowder, 54 Mo. App. 25 (1893).

And in Wood v. Keith, 60 Ark. 425 (1895), the fact was recognized that necessity might compel a purchase of more than a sufficiency to pay the debt.

Where a creditor takes more property than is necessary to satisfy his claim, paying for the balance, however,—at least in a case in which the property can be severed,—he loses his position of a transferee in payment of a debt, and is placed in that of purchaser for an independent consideration in which mere notice or knowledge of the fraudulent intent of his vendor will charge him with participation therein though he does nothing in aid of it.

Thus, a creditor who takes goods from a failing debtor in payment of his indebtedness cannot go beyond obtaining satisfaction for his own debt. If he pays part of the consideration in cash the transaction is governed by the same principles which apply to purchasers on an entirely new consideration. Harris v. Russell, 93 Ala. 59 (1890).

And where a creditor takes payment of his indebtedness from a failing debtor in property, without paying any cash consideration therefor, pursuant to a combination and conspiracy between him and others not creditors by which other property is also taken for which a cash consideration is paid by the others, the creditor is affected by the principles which apply to the others, and the whole transaction is governed by the rules applicable to sales by a debtor. Ibid.

The right acquired by a creditor who takes property of his debtor in satisfaction of his claim of a value greater than the claim, paying the balance, must be tested and controlled by his attitude as a purchaser only, and if the transaction cannot be sustained as a purchase, it must fall both as a purchase and a settlement of the debt, there being but one entire transaction. Sanger Bros. v. Colbert, 84 Tex. 608 (1892).

So, a creditor, who, knowing that other creditors will be hindered and delayed, receives more of hisventing them from investigating the doings of the debtor, though plaintiffs' agents may have advised Jones & Fulton to throw the agent of Voorhees, Miller, & Rupel off his guard intentionally, by ordering from him a bill of goods that was not a fraud that entered into the bill of sale or affected it; and this is particularly so if the advice was not acted on. (20) Fraud must consist in acts done with a fraudulent intent, not in mere intent which is not carried out; and the secret motives of a debtor, however fraududebtor's property than is reasonably necessary for the payment of his claim, paying a moneyed consideration for the excess, becomes a purchaser from the failing debtor and helps him to place his property beyond the reach of other creditors by giving him an equivalent therefor which they cannot subject to their claims, thus invalidating the transaction. Black v. Vaughan, 70 Tex. 47 (1888); Smit v. Jacob Straus Saddlery Co. 2 Mo. App. Rep. 880 (1886).

And a sale by a debtor of $47,000 worth of property to his creditor for the purpose of satisfying a debt of only $17,000, leaving a balance of about $30,000 after applying the indebtedness, is a sale of property and not a conveyance in payment of a debt within the rule that the knowledge of the creditor of the fraudulent intention of his debtor does not prevent him from receiving payment of an honest debt. Hanchett v. Goetz, 25 Ill. App. 445 (1887).

So, a purchase by a creditor to whom $5,700 was due, of the debtor's entire stock, knowing that he was insolvent, of which he paid $1,000 in cash, leaving $500 of his own debt unsatisfied, is a purchase for an advanced consideration, and not a mere securing of his own demand, and will be set aside as fraudulent as against the creditors. Leinkauff v. Frenkle, 80 Ala. 136 (1885).

And a mortgagee who purchases the mortgaged premises, agreeing to assume prior debts and to pay unpaid taxes on the land, which is worth $200 more than the amount of all the mortgages and taxes, does not take as a creditor taking conveyances to secure his debt, but as a purchaser, and his action must be controlled by rules applicable to purchasers of insolvent debtors. Allen v. Stingel, 95 Mich. 195 (1893).

Where a creditor purchases enough property from his debtor to pay his claim and more besides, paying a consideration for the remainder, the sale will not be upheld as against creditors unless it was made under such circumstances as would validate it if made to any other person. Allen v. Carpenter, 66 Tex. 138 (1886).

In Allen v. Carpenter, supra, Greenleve v. Blum, 59 Tex. 124 (1883), infra, k, was distinguished upon the ground that in that case it appeared that the creditors had every reason to know that their debtors were selling to them and getting the advantage of the surplus over and above their debts for themselves in order to defraud their other creditors.

And a purchase made by a creditor with knowledge of the vendor's fraudulent purpose to hinder, delay, or defraud his other creditors of more than enough to pay the debt due, is a participation by the purchaser in the fraud of the vendor, thus assisting in the accomplishment of such purpose. Roerber v. Bowe, 26 Hun, 554 (1882); McVeagh v. Baxter, 82 Mo. 518 (1884); Hart v. Sandy, 30 W. Va. 644 (1884).

In Roerber v. Bowe, supra, Dudley v. Danforth, 61 N. Y. 626 (1874), supra, III. c, was distinguished upon the ground that the purchase and sale were made in good faith for the purpose of paying an honest debt, but the court afterwards criticised that decision, saying that its doctrine seems to be in conflict with the statute itself on the subject of fraudulent transfers, and should be restricted to cases precisely similar and not extending beyond them.

And a sale by an insolvent corporation, made by the members of its executive committee to two of its trustees who had knowledge of its insolvency 31 L. R. A.

and received the property in payment of a debt much less in amount than the value of the property, is fraudulent and void as a matter of law. Third Nat. Bank v. Elliott, 42 Hun, 121 (1886).

So, a purchase by a creditor of a debtor of his entire stock of merchandise with knowledge of his insolvency and indebtedness, to other persons in consideration of the satisfaction of the debt due the creditor and $1,000 paid to the debtor in cash, is fraudulent and void as to other creditors. Oppenheimer v. Halff, 68 Tex. 409 (1887).

And a purchase by a creditor of all his debtor's property to satisfy his claim against him when the property amounts to more than the claim, giving his note for $1,820 for the difference payable one year after date, when the debtor was insolvent and known to be so by the vendee, is fraudulent and void as against creditors. Seger's Sons v. Thomas Bros. 107 Mo. 635 (1891).

And that goods were purchased by a creditor from his debtor, amounting to $233.87 more than his debt, which sum was paid in cash, knowing that the vendor was going down hill and was indebted to others and unable to pay, is sufficient to uphold a verdict setting aside the transfer upon the ground of fraud. Meyberg v. Jacobs, 40 Mo. App. 128 (1890).

So, a transfer of property worth at least $330 by a debtor to a creditor in payment of debts aggregating $185.80, is fraudulent and void as to other creditors where the creditor has knowledge of the debtor's insolvency and that the transfer was intended to defraud other creditors. Stuart v. Smith (Tex.) 21 S. W. 1026 (1893).

And a sale by an insolvent merchant who was under indictment, to one of his creditors of his entire stock of goods worth about $800, in satisfaction of a debt due such creditor of about $600, and for $200 in cash, the cash payment having been taken to enable him to flee the country, which purpose and the existence of other debts were known to the vendee, is fraudulent and void as to other creditors. Williams v. Moore Bros. 6 Tex. Civ. App. 340 (1894).

And a creditor who takes the entire stock of goods of his debtor, amounting to more than $700, to pay a debt of $203, knowing that the debtor was hard pressed, the debtor's utter want of credit and pecuniary embarrassment being a matter of general notoriety in the community in which they lived, is sufficient to charge the purchaser with notice of the fraudulent purpose of the seller, if not to show that he was a participant in such fraudulent design. Edmundson v. Silliman, 50 Tex. 106.

And a purchase of three tracts of land at an aggregate price of $1,000, of which $800 was paid in cash and the balance in satisfaction of the creditor's antecedent debt, is fraudulent and void as against creditors, although the debtor refused to sell a single parcel separately, where the sale was made by the debtor with the known intent of converting his land into money, not for the payment of his debts, but to procure family supplies and enable him to carry on his business, the creditors having knowledge of his embarrassed condition and notice of facts sufficient to charge them with knowledge of the fraudulent intent. Levy v. Williams, 79 Ala. 171 (1885).

A purchasing creditor in securing the payment of his debt from a debtor must not unnecessarily hinder or delay other creditors or impair their lent, do not vitiate the disposition of his property, provided such property is applied to the payment of debts at a rate which the law deems reasonable; and, when property is applied to the payment of debts at a rate equal to what it would bring at a fair public sale to the highest bidder, that rate is reasonable. (21) If the plaintiff took the goods at such a price as they would have brought at a fair public sale to the highest bidder, the transaction would not be invalidated because they advised Jones & Fulton to put rights by placing it in the power of the debtor to effectually screen part of the proceeds when he has knowledge of facts sufficient to create a reasonable belief of such intention. Ibid.

And it is not necessary that a creditor who takes a transfer of his debtor's property in payment of his debt, of value considerably greater than the amount of the debt, should have been influenced by a fraudulent intent in order to avoid the transfer, or that he should have intended to assist the debtor in defrauding his creditors, or that he should have had actual knowledge that such was the debtor's intention; it is sufficient to affect him with notice, if by ordinary prudence he might have known it. Humphries v. Freeman, 22 Tex. 45 (1858).

Thus, a purchase by a creditor from his debtor of property for which he pays a large sum in cash in addition to his claim is invalid where the sale was made with the intent upon the part of the vendor to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors, and the vendee participated in the fraud or had knowledge thereof, or information of such facts as would have put an ordinarily prudent man on inquiry. Sellers v. Bailey, 29 Mo. App. 174 (1888).

And a creditor who purchases property of his debtor in excess of the amount of his claim, who knew of the embarrassment of his debtor and that execution had been levied on his property, and that a part of the property had been purchased in the name of a third person, and who had a private understanding with the debtor that he should have the privilege of paying within a reasonable time and reclaiming his property, is put upon inquiry as to the motive of the vendor. Humphries v. Freeman, 22 Tex. 45 (1858).

So, a purchase of the stock of goods in a store by an employee therein who knows that the proprietor is insolvent and had been refused further credit, in payment of a debt due him, who takes the stock of the debtor in another store in order to induce the debtor's consent, giving his notes for the balance, is fraudulent and void as to creditors. Montgomery v. Bayless, 96 Ala. 342 (1892).

And a transfer of merchandise by a debtor to a creditor clearly exceeding in value the sum due, the creditor knowing this fact and that the debtor was insolvent and had other creditors, and paying the debtor a sum of money to induce him to make the conveyance, whereby other creditors are prevented from enforcing their claims against a part of the property not necessary to pay such creditor's claim, are fraudulent and void as to other creditors. Oppenheimer v. Halff, 68 Tex. 409 (1887).

Such a transaction is invalid whether the excess is appropriated by the creditor to his own use or paid to the debtor in money or negotiable paper. Blankenship v. Willis, 1 Tex. Civ. App. 657 (1892).

And a conveyance by an insolvent husband to his wife of property worth several times the amount claimed to have been advanced by her will be set aside where her testimony was contradictory as to why the conveyance was made, and she knew that the money advanced by her was merely a part of the price paid to the original vendor, and that the conveyance was to a large extent voluntary, though she claimed to be ignorant of the value of the land. Reese v. Shell, 95 Ga. 749 (1895).

A creditor who takes property of his debtor of a value greater than the amount of his debt, satisfying his claim and paying the balance, is a purchaser for a valuable consideration, however, and before the transaction can be avoided as to him, it must appear that he had notice of the fraudulent intent of his immediate grantor, and the burden of proof to establish such notice rests with the party attacking the transaction. Sanger Bros. v. Colbert, 84 Tex. 668 (1892).

And a sale by a debtor to his creditor of a larger amount of goods than was necessary to pay his debt will be upheld as against creditors where the vendee did not know and was not in possession of facts which would arouse the suspicion of an ordinarily prudent man and put him upon inquiry as to the fraudulent intent of the vendor. Allen v. Carpenter, 66 Tex. 138 (1893).

The question as to whether a purchase by a creditor from his debtor in payment of his claim of more property than is necessary to pay his claim when the property is not divisible and such purchase is rendered necessary by its situation, will be regarded as an independent purchase or a transfer in payment of a debt requiring something more than mere knowledge of the debtor's intent to defraud to charge the creditor with participation therein, seems to remain undecided.

There is a dictum in McDonald v. Gaunt, 30 Kan. 603 (1883), however, in which the rule that a purchase by a creditor of a debtor in payment of his claim of property in excess of the amount thereof is invalid where the circumstances attending his purchase are such as would put an ordinarily prudent man upon inquiry which if prosecuted would disclose a fraudulent intent, was confined to cases in which the property is easily separable.

And in Wood v. Keith, 60 Ark. 425 (1895), it was held that the knowledge of a creditor who purchases property from an insolvent or failing debtor in satisfaction of his debt, of a fraudulent intent of the debtor as to other creditors, does not affect the validity of his purchase if he does not aid him in defrauding his other creditors, and paid a fair price and purchased only to the extent of satisfying his debt, unless necessity compelled a purchase of more than a mere sufficiency.

And in Chamberlain v. Dorrance, 69 Ala. 40 (1891), it was held that a sale of property by a debtor to a creditor to apply in payment of his claim, which largely exceeds the value of the property without reservation, is valid as against creditors, though the debtor was then insolvent to the knowledge of the creditor and the property sold was substantially all he had.

In the above case there is nothing to show whether the property was or was not severable, but the assumption that it was not so might be based upon the fact that if it were severable the decision would be squarely in conflict with numerous cases above cited holding mere knowledge upon the part of the creditor of the fraudulent intent of the debtor to be sufficient to charge him with participation therein.

1. Allowance of fair price.

A creditor, in purchasing property from his debtor who is insolvent and attempting to dispose of his property to defraud other creditors to his knowledge, must act with the utmost good faith, and must pay or allow an adequate price for the property purchased. Lewis v. Hughes, 49 Kan. 23 (1892).

And a creditor who with full knowledge of an attempt of his debtor to defraud his creditors takes advantage thereof and obtains the property of the their money into their pockets, and not to pay it to their creditors, if you find that such advice was given. Fraud consists in acts, and bad advice touching other property cannot vitiate a sale." Plaintiffs excepted to the refusal of these instructions.

The court, at the instance of the defendants, gave eleven instructions to the jury, two of which are as follows: "(9) If you believe from the evidence in this case that the plaintiffs by their transactions with Jones & Fulton in the purchase of the goods, acquired debtor at less than its value, cannot be regarded as a purchaser in good faith. Ibid.

So, in Hickman v. Trout, 83 Va. 478 (1878), a conveyance for a grossly inadequate price without security was held, in connection with the continued possession by the grantor and an unusual length of credit and other circumstances, to warrant the conclusion that the grantor entertained a fraudulent design known to and participated in by the grantee.

But a creditor may accept a conveyance of property from his debtor at a fair and reasonable price in payment of his claims, though he knows that the debtor will be left without means with which to pay other creditors. Seaman v. Nolen, 68 Ala. 463 (1880); Curran v. Olmstead, 101 Ala. 602 (1894); Bates v. Vandiver, 102 Ala. 249 (1894); Crawford v. Kirksey, 55 Ala. 282, 28 Am. Rep. 704 (1876); Ford v. Williams, 3 B. Mon. 550 (1843). And see supra, III., c., Knowledge of fraud, insolvency, etc.

A sale of goods by a debtor to a creditor in satisfaction of debts justly due, for a price not less than their real value, made with intent to defraud creditors on the part of the vendor, is not subject to objection on the ground that the fraud was participated in by the purchaser, though he knew the effect would be to prevent the collection of their claims. Gilkerson-Sloss Commission Co. v. Carnes, 56 Ark. 414 (1892).

And a sale by an insolvent debtor to a creditor in payment of an honest debt at a fair and adequate price without reserving any benefit to the vendor, is valid though made with a fraudulent intent of which the purchaser was cognizant. Hornthall v. Schonfeld, 79 Ala. 109 (1885); Wood v. Keith, 60 Ark. 425 (1895).

So, in Christian v. Greenwood, 23 Ark. 258, 79 Am. Dec. 104 (1861), it was held that a creditor who buys property of an insolvent debtor to secure his demand must allow a fair price.

And in Hodges v. Coleman, 76 Ala. 103 (1884); Wilson v. Fawcner, 38 Ill. App. 438 (1890); Ellis v. Valentine, 65 Tex. 532 (1886); Chipman v. Stern, 89 Ala. 207 (1889); Rankin v. Vandiver, 78 Ala. 562 (1885); Brown v. Foree, 7 B. Mon. 357, 46 Am. Dec. 519 (1847); Keith Bros. v. Hiffelfinger, 12 Neb. 497 (1882); Sigler v. Knox County Bank, 8 Ohio St. 516 (1858); Bamberger, B. & Co. v. Schofield, 160 U. S. 149, 40 L. ed. 374 (1895),—the element of a fair price was also considered in the decision of the cause.

And the payment of a fair price seems to have been one of the grounds upon which many transfers in which the purchaser or mortgagee has assumed the payment of the claims of other creditors have been sustained. See supra, III., d.

g. Security greater in value than debt.

The mere fact that the security given is more than is necessary is not of itself any indication of fraud. Colbern v. Robinson, 80 Mo. 541 (1883).

The law does not limit the amount of the security which a creditor may take from his debtor as against other creditors. West Coast Grocery Co. v. Stinson (Wash.) 43 Pac. 35 (1865).

A creditor may take adequate security by way of a mortgage upon the personal property of his debtor to secure his debt. Morse v. Steinrod, 29 Neb. 108 (1890).

And a chattel mortgage given by a debtor to secure a creditor is not fraudulent or void because more property is covered by it than would be necessary simply to satisfy the creditor's claim. Sloan v. Coburn, 26 Neb. 607, 4 L. R. A. 470 (1889).

Or solely because the property mortgaged was of a value two or even three times greater than the debt. Kilpatrick-Koch Dry Goods Co. v. McPheely, 37 Neb. 800 (1893).

And a mortgage given upon $4,300 worth of goods to secure an indebtedness of only $1,800, is not rendered invalid as against creditors by reason of the margin between the debt and the security, as the statute provides that the creditor may enforce his right notwithstanding the mortgage. First Nat. Bank v. North, 2 S. D. 480 (1892).

The mere fact that a mortgage covers more property than will secure the debt is not alone a circumstance from which the jury might presume the mortgage to be fraudulent as to creditors. Downs v. Kissam, 51 U. S. 10 How. 102, 13 L. ed. 346 (1850).

The rule would seem to be that the disproportion between chattels mortgaged and the amount secured thereby affords no basis for a presumption of fraud, but is a mere matter of evidence to be accorded such weight as in the light of certain circumstances it is entitled to receive in the determination of a question of fact. Grand Island Bkg. Co. v. Costello, 45 Neb. 119 (1895); Kilpatrick-Koch Dry Goods Co. v. Strauss, 45 Neb. 793 (1895).

And on an inquiry as to whether a mortgage was given in good faith and solely for the security of a just debt, or for the purpose of benefiting the mortgagor at the expense of other creditors, it is competent to show that the mortgagee having notice that there were other creditors took a mortgage covering substantially all of the debtors property,—a great deal more than enough to afford him ample security,—or that by the arrangement, he unreasonably postponed the collection of his demand, allowing the mortgagor in the meantime to retain and use the property, or that the mortgaged property which was retained and used by the mortgagor was perishable, or of such a character as to be profitable in its use. Howell v. Carden, 99 Ala. 100 (1892), dictum.

But a conveyance of property greatly in excess of sufficient security would be a fraudulent disposition of property as to the mortgagor's creditors. Morse v. Steinrod, 29 Neb. 108 (1890).

And a mortgage upon property, the fair value of which is much more than the debt to be secured, can only be allowed to stand as against creditors when it is entirely bona fide, and the burden of proof in this respect rests with the mortgagee. Holt v. Creamer, 24 N. J. Eq. 181 (1881).

And a mortgage by a failing debtor of nearly his whole estate to one of his principal creditors, the property mortgaged being 50 per cent more in value than the debt secured, stipulating for two or more years delay in its foreclosure, is void as against creditors, where the mortgagee knew that there were other creditors who would be hindered, delayed, and probably defeated thereby. Reynolds v. Welch, 47 Ala. 200 (1872).

And a mortgage executed by an embarrassed or insolvent debtor as security for a debt less than the value of the mortgaged property which was made payable in nine annual instalments, followed by a second mortgage upon the following day on the same property to the mortgagor's wife, who was the mother of the first mortgagee, is fraudulent and void as against a creditor of whose debt the all the property of Jones & Fulton except the amount which the evidence in the case shows that the said Jones & Fulton had in the bank and their accounts, and that said plaintiffs counseled or advised the said Jones & Fulton to keep the said money themselves, and not to pay the same to their creditors, and that such advice or counseling entered into said transactions between said plaintiffs and the said Jones & Fulton as an inducement for said Jones & Fulton to make said transaction with said plaintiffs, and that said Jones & first mortgagee had notice. McDowell v. Steele, 87 Ala. 493 (1888).

So, a mortgage by a debtor on his real estate and a chattel mortgage of his entire personal property, given to secure his largest creditor, to whom he owed $1,800 not yet due, is a fraudulent disposition of property where the stock of goods was worth $4,200 and the real estate was valued at $1,500 and he was indebted to other creditors to the amount of $5,000. Brown v. Work, 30 Neb. 800 (1890).

And security on property worth from $15,000 to $17,000 for an indebtedness of from $1,200 to $2,000 and an advance of $800, the creditor knowing of the insolvency of the debtor, cannot be regarded as a bona fide purchase within the statutes of fraudulent conveyances. Herman v. McKinney, 47 Fed. Rep. 758 (1891).

And a conveyance of real estate, absolute on its face, made to secure a debt actually due at a nominally high price and of a value far beyond the amount of the debt, with intent to cover the property from creditors, is fraudulent and void and will not be allowed to stand as a security for what was actually paid. Miller v. Tollison, Harp. Eq. 145, 14 Am. Dec. 712 (1824).

And where a creditor holds a mortgage upon the property of his debtor which largely exceeds in value the amount of the debt, and he thereafter enters into a scheme to prevent the creditors from receiving the surplus over and above his claim, it would be a fraud from its inception which would invalidate the whole transaction from the first to the last including the chattel mortgage, and vitiate the title to the goods acquired thereunder. Hadley v. Adsit (Kan.), 42 Pac. 836 (1895).

So, a mortgage by a debtor to a creditor, given for such length of time as will raise the presumption that it was given for the purpose of delaying or hindering creditors, or which is so disproportionate to the debt secured as to operate as a cover to shield the property from seizure under process of law, was spoken of as being fraudulent as against creditors, in Eureka Iron & S. Works v. Bresnahan, 66 Mich. 489 (1887).

A creditor is not guilty of fraud where he obtains security for the amount actually due by chattel mortgage covering no more property than is necessary to secure his debt, however, though the debtor acts with intent to defraud creditors. First Nat. Bank v. Naill, 52 Kan. 211 (1893); Byrd v. Perry, 7 Tex. Civ. App. 378 (1894).

And though he knows that it is the purpose of the debtor in giving the mortgage to defraud other creditors. Byrd v. Perry, supra.

And a finding that a mortgage was not fraudulent will not be disturbed on appeal where it appeared that it was given to secure a note for a balance due on the dissolution of a partnership and the value of the property mortgaged was not in excess of the debt secured, and that it was understood that any surplus remaining after paying the debt should be applied first to the debt of the complaining creditor and should then go to the mortgagor's relatives, though the intent of the mortgagor was to get the property out of reach of his creditors until he should be able to make sales and pay their debts. Parker v. Roberts, 116 Mo. 657 (1893).

So, in Willis v. Heath (Tex.), 18 S. W. 801 (1891), the fact that the debt equaled the value of the property was treated as an element of the validity of the conveyance.

h. Security for overstated debt.

The doctrine has been asserted that a mortgage taken for a greater amount than the debt due the mortgagee is a fraud upon the mortgagor's other creditors and is invalid as against them. Showman v. Lee, 86 Mich. 556 (1891).

But it is thought that the prevailing rule is that the giving of a mortgage for a larger sum than the actual indebtedness to the mortgagee does not render the mortgage void in law. Hoey v. Pierron, 57 Wis. 262 (1886); Frost v. Warren, 42 N. Y. 204 (1870); Wood v. Scott, 55 Iowa, 114 (1890); Bush v. Bush, 33 Kan. 536 (1885).

And that a mortgage stating the debt intended to be secured at an amount greatly beyond what is due is at most prima facie evidence of fraud which may be overcome by showing fairness of intention on the part of the mortgagee. Stover v. Herrington, 7 Ala. 142, 41 Am. Dec. 86 (1845); Heim v. Chapel (Minn.) 64 N. W. 825 (1895).

And it avoids the mortgage only when given willfully in connivance with the mortgagee and with an actual design to impose upon and defraud general creditors. Davis v. Schwartz, 155 U. S. 631, 39 L. ed. 289 (1894).

And that the overstatement in a conveyance of its consideration, not intentionally, but on account of a mistake of fact or law, when in fact the value of the property conveyed does not exceed the amount of the actual indebtedness, will not render the transaction fraudulent and void where there is neither an actual intent to defraud nor a legal fraud resulting from a transfer of more property than is sufficient to pay the debt. Freybe v. Tiernan, 76 Tex. 286 (1890).

Thus, the taking of a note and mortgage by a creditor for a larger sum than the debtor owed does not show a participation in the fraudulent intent of the debtor which will invalidate the transaction, where it was the result of a want of accurate knowledge of the amount due. Lycoming Rubber Co. v. King, 90 Iowa, 343 (1894).

And an overstatement of a debt in a chattel mortgage given to secure that and other debts does not invalidate the mortgage as against other creditors where it was due to the fact that the parties did not know the exact amount at the time the mortgage was prepared, and had no ready means of ascertaining it. H. T. Simon-Gregory Dry Goods Co. v. McMahan, 61 Mo. App. 490 (1895).

So, a mortgage given by a failing debtor to a bona fide creditor for considerably more than is due will not be deemed to be fraudulent and void as to creditors where the mortgagee did not know that the mortgagor was insolvent or contemplated insolvency. Carson v. Byers, 87 Iowa, 606 (1885).

And a note and mortgage designed to take up an old note and mortgage given in good faith to secure a bona fide indebtedness made upon the understanding that all the credits which were upon the old one should be placed upon the new one, thus overstating the amount in the mortgage, is not fraudulent and void in toto where such overstatement was made in good faith and without any intent upon the part of the mortgagee to hinder, delay, or defraud the mortgagor's creditors. Hughes v. Shull, 33 Kan. 127 (1885).

A mortgage executed by a debtor in failing cir-

Fulton, acting upon such advice of said plaintiffs, did appropriate said money to themselves, and thus deprived their creditors of it, and that said Jones & Fulton were at the time insolvent, you should find for the defendants in this case." "(11) If the jury circumstances, for a sum known to be in excess of what is actually due to the mortgagee, however, is presumptively fraudulent. Kellogg v. Clyne, 54 Fed. Rep. 606, 12 U. S. App. 174 (1893); Davis v. Schwartz, 155 U. S. 631, 39 L. ed. 289 (1894); Heim v. Chapel (Minn.) 64 N. W. 825 (1895).

And the burden of proof rests with the mortgagee to show that the mortgage was executed in good faith and for an honest purpose, and to explain the discrepancy. Lombard v. Dows, 66 Iowa, 243 (1885); Heim v. Chapel, supra.

Taking a mortgage for an amount in excess of the debt which it is given to secure, or of the assumed liability, is a badge of fraud, and amounts to fraud in law where the purpose is to protect the debtor's interests from other creditors. Patrick v. Riggs (Mich.) 63 N. W. 532 (1895).

And the fact that a chattel mortgage largely exceeds the debt which it is given to secure may be considered on the question whether the creditor's intention was in good faith to secure himself or to hinder, delay, or defraud other creditors. Olmstead v. Mattison, 45 Mich. 617 (1881).

Thus, a mortgage by a debtor to a creditor for a grossly exaggerated demand, designed by the debtor to cover his property from the demands of honest creditors, the creditor participating in the design and knowing the debtor's purpose, is fraudulent and void as against creditors. Stinson v. Hawkins, 16 Fed. Rep. 850 (1893); Cordes v. Straszer, 8 Mo. App. 61 (1879).

And a mortgage made for a larger amount than that actually owing by a sum of about $340, which excess was paid for the purpose of delaying and defrauding other creditors, is fraudulent and void. Ferris v. McQueen, 94 Mich. 367 (1892).

And a mortgage on a large amount of property for the payment of $90,000 when but $4,000 was due to the mortgagee, is fraudulent as against creditors. Hubbard v. Turner, 2 McLean, 519 (1841).

So, a deed of trust given by a debtor to his creditor to secure a debt with the intent to delay, hinder, and defraud his creditors, in which the creditor permitted the debtor to include not only the debt but an amount in excess thereof, agreeing to account to the debtor for such excess, shows a participation by the creditor in the debtor's fraudulent intent which will defeat the deed. Alberger v. White, 117 Mo. 347 (1898).

And a mortgage, in fixing the consideration for which the parties have magnified a comparatively small debt into a very large one with the fraudulent intent to cover and conceal from the mortgagor's creditors a part of his property, is altogether void, although as to another part of his property it was meant to be an actual security for an honest debt. Holt v. Creamer, 34 N. J. Eq. 181 (1881).

And a chattel mortgage in which the express consideration is greater than the real indebtedness, which is given and taken for the purpose of protecting the mortgagor's property from his creditors, may be held fraudulent and void as to such creditors though as between the parties the maker would be estopped from denying the indebtedness purporting to be secured thereby. Taylor v. Wood (N. J.) 4 Cent. Rep. 133 (1896).

And a bill of sale by a failing debtor to a creditor reciting a cash consideration of $2,250 where the transfer was to pay the mortgagee for debts and liabilities assumed, in the aggregate about $1,800, will be set aside as fraudulent and void in the absence of an explanation of the false recital as to consideration. Brasher v. Jamison, 75 Tex. 139 (1899).

So, in Adams v. Niemann, 46 Mich. 135 (1876), it was held that a mortgage is not fraudulent when given to secure no more than the mortgagee's actual claim, and taken without fraudulent intent.

So, mere knowledge or notice of the debtor's circumstances and intent would appear to be sufficient to constitute the creditor a participator in the fraud.

Thus, a chattel mortgage for a greater amount than is due, taken from one known by the mortgagee to be in failing circumstances and pressed by his creditors, is conclusive evidence of fraud. Butts v. Peacock, 23 Wis. 359 (1868).

But see Wood v. Scott, 55 Iowa, 114 (1880), in which it was held that such a mortgage is a badge of fraud, but is not conclusively presumed to be fraudulent.

And see also Bentz v. Rockey, 69 Pa. 71 (1871), infra, III., e., Amount of property taken.
